She said that at this point, a judge is considering briefs by both sides on the facial constitutionality of the state statute in Shawnee County District Court.

The case is also filed in federal court. However, Hackney said they are also awaiting the outcome in the district court.

After the judge rules, there would certainly be an appeal by the losing side, Hackney said.

Legislators say Finney plan unfair to some taxpayers

CHRISSE VENDEL
Collegian Reporter

State legislators examining Gov. Joan Finney's tax proposal said it needs work to be fair to lower- and middle-income tax payers.

The broad and encompassing proposal covers 112 separate categories, hits every service and many exemptions, and is supposed to raise $700 million.

Rep. Kent Glasscock, R-Manhattan, said the $700 million is a point of discussion because relying on that much money from only sales tax is not structure fair.

"Do we really need to raise $700 million? That's a big tax increase, the biggest in the history of Kansas," he said.

To determine the appropriate size of the tax program, it needs to be based on how much property taxes will be rolled back and how much of an increase will be added to current spending, Glasscock said.

"I support raising state and local sales tax, mitigated by a raise in income tax to bring progressivity to this tax proposal," he said. "As far as the measurement of each, I can't be sure."

Recently, the House has broken into three sub-committees to take a broader look at the tax structure. One committee will look at the classification of the tax proposal, the second will examine the sales tax and roll-back and the third will consider local options.

Rep. Sheila Hochhauser, D-Manhattan, said the first committee will delineate what services will be taxed based on how progressive or regressive they are. Progressive taxes affect the wealthy more than the low-income individuals, while regressive taxes fall disproportionately on the poor.

"Services such as engineering, accounting, and attorneys — to some extent — are considered progressive," she said. "Laundry cleaning and lottery tickets are more regressive.

"The object will be to hone down the list of services that may hurt the middle and lower class people," she said.

The sales tax sub-committee will take a careful look at each sub-category of sales taxes with careful analysis of the tax, the effect on the people and the Kansas economy, Glasscock said.

"I have a feeling this tax proposal will not be imposed unless the committees are sure it won't be counterproductive," he said.

Glasscock said Finney's plan lacks consideration of administering ramifications.

"The governor's secretary of revenue said Finney had added six employees to administer the new tax," he said. "When Iowa added a similar plan, they added 200 employees."

A service tax similar to the one on Finney's proposal has been implemented and called off in other states, such as Massachusetts and Florida, Sen. Lana Oleen, R-Manhattan, said.

"Kansas needs to be careful if this tax is implemented, and the people answer against it," she said.

Oleen said both lower-revenue and increased expenses are to blame for the tax increase.

"Kansas' programs are funded one-half by the state and one-half by the federal government. With the federal deficit, the Kansas programs are still there, but the financial support is not," she said.

Oleen also said the Legislature overspent.

"We are a state that cannot operate in the red," she said. Our choices are to either coast along or meet our commitments with an increase in taxes."

Oleen said this is especially important to Manhattan because the city is very dependent on state dollars.

Club aerobicizes for heart association

VICKI KNIGHT
Collegian Reporter

Members of The Ladies Club, a Manhattan fitness club exclusively for women, spent Wednesday aerobicizing in Dance for Heart.

This was the second year the club sponsored the event, which is a benefit for the American Heart Association.

Deena Dipman, partner and manager of the club, said one of the reasons for doing this is to allow the club to give something that relates to fitness back to the community.

Dance studios, recreation facilities, spas, health and exercise clubs participate in Dance for Heart as part of a nationwide effort to fight heart disease and strokes.

Coordinators and sponsors promote the event to dancers using a packet of materials provided by the American Heart Association. Dancers obtain pledges or donations and may qualify for prizes depending on how much money they raise.

All monies raised go to support scientific research on heart disease and community education programs designed to promote heart-healthy lifestyles, an information handout said.

The club sponsored the benefit last fall, but decided to move it to February because local dance studios sponsor Dance for Heart in the fall. Dipman said she thought by sponsoring it at different times, competition for donations would be lessened and more money would be raised.

It's also been nice to tie it in with Valentine's Day, she said. Dipman said since her dad died of a heart attack, she feels very good about being a part of it.

Participants had the option of exercising in as many as eight classes held during the day. As an incentive for participation and donations, each of the eight classes had drawings for prizes from the club and local merchants.

Julie Miller, Manhattan resident, obtained pledges for the aerobics she did.

"I feel really strongly about supporting the American Heart Association. These types of events are the only way they will be able to get enough money to research and prevent heart disease," she said.

Miller also said she thinks people are more willing to donate money for something like exercising, because they see the participant is really trying to do something to help.

Liza Kauk, senior in nutrition and exercise science, leads a 5:30 p.m. aerobics class Wednesday at the Ladies Club as part of Dance for Heart. This is the second year the fitness club exclusively for women has held the fundraiser for the American Heart Association.

Professor juggles hats as composer, pastor, keyboardist

Boyer commits himself to progress consciousness at K-State

SUZANNE BROWN
Collegian Reporter

James Boyer, professor of curriculum and American ethnic studies, is a wearer of many hats. He's an educator, a composer, a keyboardist, a pastor, a member of a number of professional societies and a member of numerous organizations.

He said an overriding theme in his life is his commitment to the progression of the consciousness of the African-American experience at K-State, in Kansas and across the country.

Boyer is a native of Orange County, Fla. After receiving his education degree, Boyer taught high school in Orlando. He then moved on to the University of Houston before being invited to K-State where he said he hoped to provide some leadership in multicultural programs for teachers.

Currently, in ordinary semesters, Boyer teaches three courses. Each concerning ethnic and multicultural diversity — none of which existed before he came to K-State.

But, it was in 1972 that Boyer became the first African-American faculty member in the College of Education.

"The then-dean of education had contacts in Washington and with the legislative people who were involved with school desegregation," Boyer said. "So, I came, and for 10 years I wrote proposals and got grants to train for effective school desegregation with Kansas and Missouri teachers.

"I still love Florida, but the only reason I won't go back is because I feel there's so much work to be done in Kansas," he said. "I'm committed to the evolving consciousness of the African-American experience in Kansas."

Veryl Switzer, associate director of intercollegiate athletics and assistant vice-president for institutional advancement, said Boyer is a valuable part of the University.

"I have known Dr. James Boyer at K-State for more than 19 years," Switzer said. "Throughout his tenure, he has had a profound impact on diversifying education and making it more inclusive of people of color. He is known nationally for his scholarly work and curriculum reform in education."

Boyer is also a member of the Advisory Council of the Equal Educational Opportunity of the Kansas State Department of Education. He has been active with the National Alliance of Black School Educators, the National Congress of Black Faculty and is a founding member of the National Association of Multicultural Education.

"I am a member of these organizations because not only do they keep me abreast of the research and development going on with my people," he said, "but I need that affiliation to maintain some sense of reinforcement and adequacy."

Boyer, who has been actively involved in President Wefald's Human Rights Campaign, said they hoped to expand the consciousness of not only African-American people but of Hispanics, Native Americans and the handicapped.

"We're doing some good things at K-State," he said, "but we're not doing nearly enough."

"Though I've been a Kansas taxpayer for 18 years, it was almost as though the attitudes of some people — and underscore some people — was we're doing you a favor to let you teach here, to let you live here, to let you function here," Boyer said.

"When, as an American member of the work force, not only do I have a right to be here, I am needed here to correct the gross exclusion of the African-American presence at Kansas State."

He said in order to do this, he has involved himself in a number of areas.

One of these areas is music — where he excels as a musician and composer.

"My area of teaching has to do with African-American gospel music," Boyer said.

He said he is teaching songs he learned as a child to young black men so they know them, remember them and experience them in their own lives.

Boyer is also working on a committee with the program in Black American Culture with the Smithsonian Institution.

Boyer said he sees the African-American experience as being very broad. He said he thinks people need to approach it from all different perspectives such as having African-American authors of children's stories read to all children, more exhibits of black art, cable TV programs and news stories addressing the African-American experience.

He said blacks were led in the past to believe they didn't have anything to contribute to society.

"Today we're beginning to turn that around with observances like African-American history month," Boyer said. "But, it's a slow process."

"I have seen an administrative softening within central administration of the issues that African-American students face, through forums with administrators," Boyer said. "I have seen a growing interest in Ebony Theatre, the arts. I see a gradual

Union Station welcomes all, even studiers

There's sentiment among some students that the Union Station management has withdrawn the welcome mat to students who are studying. Unwelcome to the point that the "rules were changed" to exclude studiers from this space in the K-State Union.

Nothing could be more false. We encourage and want all students — individuals and groups — to use the Union Station as a place to meet, talk, read and eat while they study. We have not deviated from the station's original goals.

It is true the Union Station was constructed to provide an entertainment alternative to students, just as the Stateroom is primarily a place to eat. We welcome studiers in both areas and have no plans to exclude them.

The refurbishing of the 1960s Catskeller and Dive into a modern 1990s non-alcoholic bar and entertainment area came after a thorough market feasibility study and student opinion survey were conducted. We secured the professional help of K-State's Planning and Evaluation Services office to conduct the survey which was sent to a random sample of 750 students during the 1987-88 school year.

Students gave us their opinions on what new evening and weekend programs should be offered at the Union if space could be remodeled. At the top of the list was an alcohol-free bar.

We proceeded slowly to involve students in every step of the process. The plans for constructing a campus non-alcoholic bar received extensive publicity. We made numerous visitations to living groups and student organizations to outline the plans and get input.

The enthusiasm generated by the plans was extremely encouraging to us. K-State Union funds totalling approximately $300,000 have been spent to give K-State the very best facility in the Big Eight Conference. K-Staters can be proud of the Union Station.

We therefore built the Union Station for the student body.

Certainly, the two camps — those who study and those who socialize — can coexist in the Union Station, as they do in the staterooms and did in the Catskeller.

Some say the Catskeller's main purpose was for studying. This is incorrect. In the 1960s, when the Union constructed additional space, the former bowling lanes were converted into the Catskeller. Its concept was taken from the old European rathskeller — a public establishment located below street level.

After a campus contest to name the area was held, the winner combined "Wildcat" and "rathskeller" to get Catskeller. Union Program Council sponsored programs there like folk singers, comedians and contest nights. The area also featured a phonograph album player for daytime music. But when organized programming was not held, the space was open to studiers.

We recognize that with the shortage of chairs and study space in Farrell Library, the K-State Union has become an even more popular place for studiers. Consequently, during the last three semesters we have made increased seating outside the Stateroom a priority, going from 304 seats to 493.

Seating in the old Catskeller was 188, while the Union Station accommodates 220. The seating on the second floor concourse went from 52 to 93; first floor concourse from 18 to 76; the courtyard from 22 to 46 and the recreation area from 24 to 58. The capacity of the Stateroom is unchanged at 900.

We welcome and encourage everyone to give us their opinions and suggestions for program and facility improvements. The K-State Union is the STUDENT union of K-State. Our motto of "Host to the campus" stresses our service to everyone.

We will have a suggestion box located in the Union Station next week. You can also contact the leadership of the Union Governing Board or the management of either the K-State Union or Union Station. Every suggestion will be given consideration.

Washington suits use war to their advantage

While America is showing the enemy over there its hardware in an effort to win the Persian Gulf War, some government officials are taking advantage of this opportunity to further their own cause.

Military backers, who were hard-pressed when the Berlin Wall fell and took the Cold War with it, are now exploiting the fact that we need billions of dollars worth of high-tech military hardware to ensure American influences globally.

While American front-line grunts are crawling in the sand half a world away, some Washington suits are trying to promote their newest military plan, a plan that can have no bearing on the outcome of this war.

On Capitol Hill, Defense Secretary Dick Cheney and President Bush have built quite a platform for the United States' futuristic Strategic Defense Initiative (SDI) on the success of the Patriot missile systems. They claim the Patriots are part of SDI and were developed as such.

Although there is a thread of truth there, most of the ball of yarn is just that, a ball of yarn spun by manipulators.

The truth is that Patriot missiles were actually developed before the Reagan administration, and Reagan was the president who announced official SDI plans. The only ties Patriots have to SDI are some software created after the fact.

It seems national government officials are riding the wave of the Patriot's current success in the gulf war in order to repopularize an administrative hope of SDI.

With the economic pressure of a possible recession building, Bush saw the opportunity to toot America's military horn and land a billion-dollar pet military project for the future. And he took it.

Another perspective

Rep. Kerry Patrick, R-Leawood, has introduced a bill that would require a woman convicted of heroin or cocaine possession to use Norplant, a birth control alternative.

The plan is similar to a California judge's ruling requiring a woman convicted of child abuse to have the contraceptive device implanted in her arm.

If the Kansas bill passed, it would have serious ramifications. The punishment itself is so unusual that one would have to question its ethical nature.

Patrick claims the bill was intended to prevent the birth of "crack babies." It seems to be a way for the state to reduce its costs. Instead of financing the bill, the state should use the cost of Norplant for better drug and pregnancy education and prevention.

In addition to stripping a woman of her biological rights, the bill has sexist and racial implications. Studies have shown that a man's reproductive capabilities are also affected by the use of cocaine or crack. However, there is no bill being introduced concerning a man's reproductive rights.

Studies also have shown that poor minorities are convicted of drug possession more often than poor whites. Thus, it seems that the bill would target impoverished minority women. This kind of discrimination should not be passed into law.

In related legislation, Patrick proposed the state pay women on welfare $500 to have the Norplant device implanted. The state would pay the women $50 each year to continue its use.

This proposal would be an acceptable incentive to encourage women to practice birth control because its use is purely optional.

However, these options have not been introduced yet, and Patrick continues to push for mandatory implants. Unfortunately, the bill that is being pushed is not the answer.

'Dummy' would prove helpful today

"As I did stand my watch upon the hill I looked towards Birnam, and anon, methought, the wood began to move."

William Shakespeare (1564-1616), English dramatist.
Today's military briefing at Allied Command Headquarters, Riyadh, Saudi Arabia, Col. Charles Doppelman presiding:

Brad Seabourn

Collegian Columnist

"Could I have your attention please. Thank you. For today's briefing, we will go directly to Q and A and begin entertaining queries from the reporting pool. Brigadier General Roger 'Leadbottom' Kelly will be your host this afternoon. General Kelly ..."

"Thank you, Chuck. First question please."

"General, there has been considerable debate about how well the bombing campaign is going. Can you give us some assessment on the extent of damage the Iraqi military has incurred, and how effective their use of deception and decoys has actually been?"

"Before I answer that, I believe it would be helpful to give you some background on strategic military deception."

"The Chinese military strategist, Sun Tzu, sometime during the fourth century B.C., wrote the military classic 'The Art of War.' It was the first known attempt to formulate a rational basis for the planning and conduct of military operations."

"In his treatise, Sun Tzu wrote: 'All warfare is based on deception. Therefore, when capable, feign incapacity; when active, inactivity. When near, make it appear that you are far away; when far away, that you are near. Offer the enemy a bait to lure him; feign disorder and strike him.'"

"Now, the Persian Gulf War is an excellent example of what is now the advanced and highly sophisticated art of deception. Science, and its application of infrared spectroscopy and high-altitude satellite image analysis, has redefined the methods by which armies conceal and deceive."

"One of the most important techniques in tactical deception is the use of camouflage. Although the technique has been practiced for hundreds of years, the word first came into use in World War I and was derived from the French verb 'camoufler,' meaning 'to make up for the stage,' though it has antecedents dating from the sixteenth century via the word 'camouflet,' meaning 'a practical joke.'"

"In a general sense, camouflage is the art of concealing the fact that you are concealing. We, of course, make extensive use of camouflage in our military. We camouflage our trucks, planes, tanks and artillery. We camouflage every piece of military equipment right down to the latrine. A military joke goes, 'Do you know why you can never find any toilet tissue in the latrine when you need it? Because it is camouflaged.'"

Loud, raucous laughter from the reporting pool.

"As most of you are aware, all our soldiers in Operation Desert Storm wear camouflaged clothing designed in both color and composition to provide concealment during daylight, and to suppress infrared detection during night. They wear 'desert sand' camouflaged 'boonie' hats and desert 'cammi' shirts and pants, or 'BDUs,' as we call them. They even wear 'cammi' T-shirts and undies."

"They may also wear or carry accessory camouflaged gear, such as a camouflaged scarf, wristwatch, flashlight, wallet, cigarette lighter, cigarette case, make-up case, binoculars, pen/pencil, memo-pad and yes, even 'cammi' condoms."

"Cammi condoms are not standard military issue, of course. In fact, I have only seen a camouflaged condom one time. It was at a small Gas-N-Guns convenience store in the deep south in a town by the name of Bubba-ville, Louisiana, where camouflaged T-shirts and headgear are standard wear for church and beer-chugging contests."

"Just as a side-note, 'USA Today' (Jan. 2) reported that our soldiers in the desert sands of Saudi Arabia are finding that condoms, not necessarily camouflaged, are an easy way to keep sand out of the barrel of an M-16. In fact, the use of condoms to protect our GI's rifles is so popular that they are the hottest selling item at the PX. The convenience of course is that when the shooting starts there is no need to remove it. Just blast away."

Again, laughter from the reporting pool.

"Another method used to deceive the enemy is the use of dummies or decoys, which goes back hundreds of years. The turning point of the Venetian's attack on the city of Ragusa in 1171 came after they set up a fort of cardboard in a dominating position to threaten the defenders. In 1513 the Flemish defenders of Tournai painted and set up lengths of canvas which resembled fortifications in order to deceive the English troops of the extent of the defenses."

"Of course, one of the more stunning examples of the use of decoys in war was the deception scheme used before the British attack at El Alamein during World War II so that a false axis of attack was indicated by means of dummy vehicles, tanks and ammo dumps, while the real offensive was prepared in great secrecy elsewhere."

"Now then, in answer to your question, the problem with assessing the effectiveness of our bombing campaign in destroying strategic Iraqi military targets is that the Iraqis have made excellent use of techniques in concealment and deception, techniques they largely learned from the U.S. military in our brief partnership during the Iran-Iraq War."

"Apparently, the Iraqis have many decoy tanks and artillery pieces. Some are inflatable, some are simply cardboard cut-outs, and others are old or damaged equipment that have been doctored to look usable. They have painted dark, irregular-shaped patches on aircraft runways to give the appearance of bomb damage when none has occurred. Saddam Hussein even has a number of 'Saddam look-alikes' to confuse and hopefully foil any assassination attempts by the international coalition, as well as his own forces."

"So to get right down to it, we don't really know for sure what the hell we have damaged, how much is damaged, or even how much is left to damage, and if you really want the honest truth ..."

"Thank you general, thank you very much. That will be all for today."

"Ladies and gentlemen. What you have just witnessed is the unveiling of the latest in high-tech military deception. 'General Kelly' is the actually the latest development in artificial intelligence. He is what the military has dubbed an 'Anglo-Serviceman Simulator' (ASS), and is currently being deployed in the Kuwaiti theater of operations."

"Colonel, can you tell us how many of these units have been deployed?"

"Sir, what is the cost of one these ASS units?"

"Colonel, sir, how long has this technology been in development; who manufactures it and who designed this extraordinary technology?"

"I am sorry ladies and gentlemen, I can't tell you a thing. We don't answer those types of questions. And that will have to end our briefing for today."

One reporter to another:

"What did you make of the briefing today, Jack?"

"I don't know about you Bill, but I heard more interesting information and honest commentary from the 'dummy' in 15 minutes than I have learned from all the generals I have listened to since this whole mess started."

Professor studies llamas' hearts

ARLOAH FAIRCHILD

Looking into a microscope to study a tissue specimen of an animal or giving a symposium concerning congenital genetic effects are ways Horst Leipold, world-known genetic expert, spends his time.

Leipold, professor of pathology, who has studied genetic defects for 30 years, came to K-State in 1970.

He has done genetic research on domestic animals such as cats, dogs, cattle and horses, said Brenda Pritchard, medical technician in pathology, but is currently working with genetic defects of llamas.

"Leipold is very involved with his work," Pritchard said. "He has to be because of the intensity of his work."

Leipold refers to the group of people he works with as a team, and he as the team leader.

"He shares everything he has done with the team members," Pritchard said, "and he makes everything team work."

David Steffen, graduate student in pathology, said Leipold is a good person to work with.

Leipold said he was asked by llama breeders to do a study on possible congenital genetic defects of llamas.

"I'm very impressed by the breeders," Leipold said. "It speaks well of the llama people if they want to know what problem the breed might have."

He said one of the problems he's researching is a heart defect that has been found in llamas not common in other domestic species.

"Some bone defects have also shown up in the llamas," Leipold said. "There are not more or less than in other domestic species, just a different kind of defect."

The study of genetic abnormalities with llamas will continue for at least two or three years, Leipold said, because it takes some time to get results.

He said there will soon be llamas at K-State to use for his research, but for now he and his team get information from llama breeders around the United States.

Pritchard said the team is studying tissue samples from different types of specimens — some from live llamas and some from llamas that have been put to sleep or that died at birth.

K-State is currently working on making a place that will be a suitable home and environment for the llamas, with humane but controlled conditions, Leipold said.

"My main concern is if we keep them here, we must keep them in their required environment," Leipold said. "The best way to do that is by the book."

Tammy Winger, second-year veterinary science student, said Leipold knows everything there is to know about congenital genetic defects.

"Even though he has several doctorates he can still explain things in student terms," Winger said.

Ensembles combine to perform jazz music

SEAN MORAN

Two K-State ensembles and the Manhattan High School jazz band will perform at 8 tonight in McCain Auditorium for a final performance before the Kansas Music Educators Association's state convention Feb. 21-23.

—Gary Mortenson ensemble director

Gary Mortenson, director of the ensemble, said the highlight of the concert will be the premiere performance of "Signal" by K-State's trumpet and horn ensemble. "Signal" is a piece created by Gregory Danner, professor of horns at Southwestern Louisiana, in memory of composer Aaron Copland.

"I asked Danner to write it," Mortenson said. "I'm directing both the horn and trumpet ensembles this semester, so I asked him to write a piece to combine the ensembles."

Mortenson will also direct another piece titled "Theme and Four Variations" by Lyle Merriman. It will be performed by the K-State Brass Ensemble.

The concert will also feature K-State's Symphonic Wind Ensemble. Stanley Finck, assistant professor of music, will direct "March" from Symphonic Metamorphosis and "Symphony #2" by David Maslanka.

Finck said he singled out the performance of "Symphony #2" because it is a work that is in manuscript, but has yet to be published.

"It's a plus for the students to play some things they aren't going to come across if they're teaching, unless they're at the college level," said Finck.

The Manhattan High jazz band, the Bluenotes, will also be tuning up for KMEA by performing five numbers. The Bluenotes are directed by Rod Manges.

The concert is partially sponsored through the Fine Arts fee and is free of charge.

Bush proposes highway plan; state officials criticize

By the Associated Press

WASHINGTON — President Bush proposed Wednesday a $105.4 billion, five-year plan to prepare the nation's highways and mass transit systems "for the next American century."

But state highway officials said the proposal was inadequate, would raise state taxpayers' costs and will be rewritten in Congress.

Mass transit officials said they have been shortchanged. Environmentalists contended the continued emphasis on highways will dramatically increase oil consumption and threaten air-quality improvements.

Others criticized the bill's encouragement of tolls to pay for new and repaired bridges and highways.

But Bush and Transportation Secretary Samuel Skinner said they believe the legislation is properly balanced and that its highway provisions are needed to fix deteriorated roads and bridges "so that America can stay competitive in the global economy of the 21st century."

Skinner said each $1 billion spent on highway construction creates 30,000 to 50,000 jobs.

"It is not dead on arrival, but it will not pass as arrived," Frank Francois, executive director of the association, said.

"The concept is good," Hal Rives, president of the Association of State Highway Transportation Officials, said. "It streamlines the entire program. But the funding is clearly inadequate to meet our national transportation needs. And what money is there is not fairly distributed."

The bill proposes spending, in addition to several minor programs, $87.17 billion on highways and $16.3 billion for mass transit over the next five years.

The federal government would pay 75 percent of the cost of repairing existing roads and building new roads in this system.

It is not dead on arrival, but it will not pass as arrived.

—Frank Francois
executive director

The only higher priority would go to completing the unbuilt 1 percent of the interstate system and to making critical repairs.

A lower priority would be given to 700,000 miles of important roads that would be grouped in an Urban and Rural Program. State governments would have to pay 40 percent of repairs and construction of such roads.

Unsafe and deteriorating bridges would also be targeted for repair or replacement.

Lady Cats lose 11-point lead, game, 71-68

BILL LANG
Sports Reporter

To listen to K-State Lady Cat coach Susan Yow, one would think her team had just wrapped up another victory.

But words can be deceiving, as the Lady Cats lost to the University of

CU 71, Lady Cats 68

Colorado, 71-68, Wednesday night at Bramlage Coliseum.

"This is a tough loss," Yow said. "In the Oklahoma game (which K-State lost 88-56), we knew we were going to lose even before we lost it."

"We really played hard," she added. "It's the first game we've lost that we've played this hard."

K-State, looking to avenge its 75-74 Jan. 4 loss at Boulder, em-played several players from the bench in hopes of wearing out the Colorado players.

"We got some quality time from our bench and we needed that," Yow said. "We got a really good team effort tonight and we did a lot of positive things."

K-State struggled from the onset of the game. The Lady Cats connected on 11-of-24 shots from the field — for 45 percent — in the first half and surrendered several baseline shots and committed nine personal fouls early.

"I told the girls in practice that we have to play the baseline tougher or we're going to get burned," Yow said.

In the first half, the Lady Buffs were able to connect on 8-of-19 shots from within nine feet.

"I told our players that if they don't protect the baseline they are either going to give up points or commit fouls," Yow said. "And we gave up a lot of inside points tonight."

Those inside points totaled 38 for Colorado, as Debbie Johnson — a native of Lorraine — tossed in 22 points with 10 of her shots being fired from 15 feet or less.

In the second half the Lady Cats built an 11-point lead, with 8:45 left in the game, only to let it slip away.

"When we got up by 11 in the second half, we got away from the things that got us the 11-point lead," Yow said.

Diana Miller was the leading scorer for the Lady Cats with 24 points. Nadira Hazim tossed in another 19.

K-State, with the loss, drops to 14-8 overall and 7-4 in Big Eight play.

Colorado relishes new role as Big 8 women's spoiler

TODD FERTIG
Sports Reporter

For a team that hasn't lived up to its preseason billing, the Colorado Lady Buffs have found some measure of consolation against the K-State Lady Cats.

Colorado's 71-68 win in Bramlage Coliseum Wednesday night dealt a severe blow to the Lady Cats' hopes for a Big Eight Championship. At 7-4, 1½ games behind front-running Oklahoma State, K-State will have the Lady Buffs, more than any other team, to blame if they fall short in the standings.

It was, after all, this same Colorado team that handed the Lady Cats their first conference loss of the season. If OSU holds onto its lead, the Lady Cats will have to look no further than the two dates with Colorado to see where their chances began to slip away.

Picked to win the Big Eight prior to the season, the Lady Buffs entered the contest at 5-5 and had been relegated to the role of spoiler. The new role seems to be to their liking, however — at least in contests with the Lady Cats.

Depending upon five sophomores and a freshman, Colorado coach Ceal Barry isn't surprised that her squad hasn't fulfilled the prediction made last fall.

"I definitely think that was too much to expect of us," Barry said. "There's no way we were ready to play at that level."

Barry, who guided Colorado to first- and second-place finishes in the conference the past two seasons, said she is pleased with the performance of the team during this rebuilding year.

"We've got a young team that took some time to learn what to expect from around the Big Eight and to adapt to playing together," Barry said. "But now we're seeing how to go in and play these teams the second time around, and have learned how to play the full 40 minutes and to maintain composure when you get behind."

Hanging close in the first half — despite 17 points by Diana Miller and 11 by Nadira Hazim — the Lady

MIKE VENSO/Staff

Julia Begley, Sheila Cherry and Lynn Holzman watch as the Lady Cats falter in the final minute of the loss to Colorado.

Bufs snatched a 31-30 lead just before intermission.

A spurt in the second half moved the Lady Cats to an 11-point lead, and appeared to have the Lady Buffs on the ropes with 8:45 left.

But the Lady Cats suddenly stalled, going scoreless for the next 3½ minutes. A nine-point run quickly brought the Lady Buffs back. Balanced scoring in the second period and a defense that held Miller and Hazim to a combined 15 in the second half gave Colorado the comeback win.

Sophomore Amy Mathern, who added 10 points, was specifically assigned to stop Miller in the second half. Barry described her effort as crucial to the win.

"You can't stop Diana. She still got 24 on us. But Amy really slowed her down, and helped us get back in the game," Barry said. "Amy's a very good athlete, and she has great endurance. You've got to have great endurance to stay with Miller, because she never stops."

Last season, the Lady Cats knocked off the defending Big Eight champs in Manhattan 71-67, ending Colorado's 17-game conference winning streak. Senior Debbie Johnson, who led the way for Colorado with 11-of-16 shooting, said the game in Bramlage was one the Lady Buffs had their eyes on all season.

"I think this was a big win for all of us. We were looking for some revenge after losing here last year," Johnson said. "Most of us played together last year, and we are really coming together now at the end of the year."

Buffaloes escape cellar

DAN WICKER
Sports Reporter

BOULDER, Colo. — And the winner is: the Colorado Buffaloes.

In the battle of the two Big Eight Conference cellar teams, Colorado escaped with an 85-71 victory to leave K-State in sole possession of eighth place Wednesday night in the Coors Events Center.

K-State hung tight against Colorado, which led the entire second half, climbing to within two points with 3:40 remaining in the game.

From that point on, K-State managed only four points to Colorado's 14.

"It's been over a month since we've been in the left-hand column, and it feels good to win a game," Colorado coach Joe Harrington said. "I wasn't sure if it was going to happen after the first 20 minutes, but I thought we came out in the second half and really played some good basketball."

It was Stevie Wise who responded so well for Colorado. After being held to only 12 points in the loss to K-State in Manhattan, Wise nailed the Wildcats for 28 points, with 16 coming in the second half.

And Wise was not the only threat Harrington had in store. Asad Ali came off the Buffalo bench to net 11 second-half points en route to 13 in the game.

While Colorado was canning 53 percent of its shots in the second half, K-State was again suffering from the field, hitting 38 percent in the last 20 minutes.

But even with the poor shooting, K-State was able to keep the game within reach. Colorado began to make a run at the 5:11 mark, when Ali converted a conventional 3-pointer and added two more free throws to give the 'Buffs a seven-point cushion.

Keith Amerson responded for the 'Cats by getting back-to-back buckets on his way to 15 points. And John Rettiger added a charity shot to pull K-State within two, 69-67.

Rettiger then missed a chance to pull K-State within one, and that point was the beginning of the end.

K-State was forced to send Colorado to the line, and the 'Buffs promptly hit eight in a row to drop the Wildcats to 12-10 on the season, and 2-7 in the Big Eight.

"It was the same kind of game (as the game in Manhattan). It was four points with four minutes to go," K-State coach Dana Altman said. "We missed a couple of free throws here that would have cut the lead. They hit all of their free throws down the stretch."

Jeff Wires was the main man keeping K-State alive. Wires scored a career-high 23 points on 8-of-11 shooting and 6-of-6 from the line.

"I don't get any satisfaction out of playing hard and scoring a bunch of points with our team losing," Wires said.

Colorado started the night sizzling from the field. Wise got the Buffaloes going by hitting four treys in the first six minutes of the game to help Colorado build a 21-12 advantage in a sloppy first half of play.

But K-State battled back behind Wires, who after being whistled for his second foul only 1:32 into the game, came in to score 11 points and bring the 'Cats within one at the 4:01 mark in the first 20 minutes.

Jean Derouillere hit two free throws to give K-State its first lead, 32-31. It was 36-36 at the half.

The win moves Colorado to 13-10 on the season, 3-6 in the Big Eight. K-State will be in action again this Saturday when it travels to Lawrence to meet arch-rival Kansas.

Cope takes position at USC

TODD FERTIG
Sports Reporter

Bob Cope, an assistant coach under Bill Snyder and K-State's defensive coordinator for the past two seasons, was named the new defensive backfield coach at USC Wednesday afternoon.

Cope, who has been visiting USC since last week, was announced by the USC sports information department as the replacement to former defensive back coach Bob April.

Snyder announced Cope's resignation to the team Tuesday, and Snyder's reorganization of the defensive coaching staff was released Wednesday afternoon.

Snyder promoted secondary coach Bobby Stoops and linebacker coach

Jim Leavitt to co-defensive coordinators. Stoops, who has two years of experience at K-State, will handle the defense of the passing game. Leavitt, a member of Snyder's staff for one season, will be responsible for defense against the run. Snyder also announced that Ben Griffith, who joined the staff last season, will become the defensive line coach.

The decision was a difficult one, Cope said Wednesday night. He assured there were no unsatisfactory conditions that caused his departure.

"It was very difficult, because I love K-State and enjoyed living in Manhattan," Cope said. "President Wefald and Steve Miller are doing as good a job of building the program as anyone could possibly do. And working with Coach Snyder and the team was a real privilege.

"As far as the boys are concerned, I sure hated to leave them, because I love them and appreciate all the work they've done."

Cope said he'd known USC coach Larry Smith and his staff for several years and kept in constant touch with them over the years.

"It was one of those unique opportunities as a coach, the chance to be a part of Coach Smith's staff and to be a part of the program and the tradition," Cope said. "USC is one of those major programs that every coach dreams of being a part of."

Cope said he discussed the decision with Snyder and hoped to receive the opportunity to talk with the team when he returns to Manhattan this weekend.

Valentine's Day Special

Denny Mildener, senior in hotel and restaurant management, lines a cakepan with flour before making a cake in the Quality Control Food Lab in Justin Hall Wednesday afternoon. The cake will be donated to the Flint Hills Breadbasket for Valentine's Day.

Student puts love in cakes, not baking

HOPE SWARTZ
Collegian Reporter

Valentine's Day is about letting people know you care.

Denny Mildener, senior in hotel and restaurant management, spent yesterday afternoon using his baking skills to let those at Manhattan Emergency Shelter Inc., Teen Outreach Center and Seniors' Service Center know someone does care.

The Hospitality Management Society decided to make Valentine's Day cakes for the Flint Hills Breadbasket. The Breadbasket donated the supplies and Mildener supplied the manpower.

"I said I was going to do it no matter what," Mildener said. "I wanted to supervise. I never thought I'd have to actually cook."

Part of Mildener's curriculum is a systems class where he cooks at a community service center.

"Last Thursday, I cooked for a food shelter and it was really quite fun," Mildener said. "We were supposed to have 12 people, but only eight were there. There's one little boy down there that's just started talking. It makes you realize how lucky we all are. You learn that everyone's human. Just because they don't have what we do doesn't mean they are any less important."

Mildener said he was going to start with one cake, and if that one turned out OK he would try another.

"I just got to thinking about my parents and grandparents, and if I were home this is what I'd do for them on Valentine's Day," Mildener said. "I'm going to make myself feel really good. Inside I'm going to feel like a million bucks."

Red roses red-hot item

DAVE MCCULLAGH
Collegian Reporter

Roses will once again be the flower of choice this Valentine's Day.

Florists throughout Manhattan have hired extra help to handle what is annually their busiest day.

"This is a busy time, the weather's good and there are still a few lovers in the world," Bill Patzell, of Manhattan Floral Co., said.

"We've been very busy, especially with K-State, most students seem to have a girlfriend," Susan Doughty, manager of Steve's Floral in Aggieville, said.

With the war in the Persian Gulf, yellow roses have been more popular the last couple months.

"The military people have been buying more yellow roses, but we have been able to handle it," Doughty said.

"We have sold more yellow roses in general, but for Valentine's Day, red is the most popular," Diana Havenstein, of West-loop Floral, said.

Yellow or red roses are the most popular flower on Valentine's Day.

"Men buy most of the flowers and they know roses better than any other flower," Patzell said.

"The rose is the most romantic flower," Havenstein said. "Traditionally, people associate a red rose with love."

The prices for these symbols of love range from $6 for a single rose to about $50 for a dozen red roses arranged in a vase.

Day reminds some of loss

Communication gap, distance cause relationships to fail

MIKE MARTIN
Collegian Reporter

For some people, Valentine's Day will be a reminder of a relationship they would rather forget.

Bad relationships can result from such things as not communicating to not having anything in common, John Robertson, a staff psychologist for University Counseling Services, said.

"Most people in a bad relationship feel like they are giving more than they are receiving," Robertson said. "They are not getting what they need from the other person."

A bad relationship caused by two people having nothing in common is not unusual, Cynthia Willis, assistant professor of psychology, said.

"While religion may be important to some, it may not be to others," she said.

This is called the social exchange theory, Willis said.

"One person may perceive the costs are more than the rewards and want out of the relationship," she said.

Deciding you want out of a relationship is more difficult than actually getting out of the relationship, Robertson said.

"It means at some level, they have failed at setting out what they wanted to do," he said.

For college students, if one person is not as involved in the relationship as the other, the less-involved person will usually take one of the semester or holiday breaks to end the relationship, Willis said.

If both students are really in-olved, then they don't care when the termination happens, she said.

Once the bad relationship has ended, both will experience various stages of recovery.

"A feeling of shock is what people will go through after the first day of the breakup," she said. "This can be followed by a denial stage in which people will try and minimize the effect of the breakup."

"What could I have done to do better?" is what people will ask themselves in this stage," she said.

Other stages people will go through are anger, which causes them to feel resentful and sad; remorse, which makes them feel sorry; and finally, loneliness and then acceptance, she said.

stuck in one of the various stages, causing them to stay miserable forever, she said.

Robertson said people may also suffer from low energy, physical fatigue, unusual sleep patterns and low levels of concentration.

Finally showing forgiveness is a sign that you are over the relationship, Willis said.

"If you don't, you're going to hate them the rest of your life," she said.

"As for Valentine's Day, it raises expectations for relationships, and in turn can be a down day instead of an up day," Robertson said. "Valentine's Day is a good day to evaluate the relationship, talk to the other person and ask very direct questions."

Being happy and fulfilled should be the emphasis of the relationship, he said.

The No.1 issue brought to the counseling service is the relationship issue, he said.

The service provides groups to discuss the problems so people can find ways in which to make relationships more fulfilling, he said.

Both Robertson and Willis agree that being involved in and ending a bad relationship is hard on the people involved.

Ending the relationship is a decision that takes time to make.

"Breaking up is not easy," Willis said.

change in the consciousness of faculty and students, but not nearly at the level I would like.

"There is still to some people, a feeling that if it says black, it's only for black people. But, if it says white it's for everybody," he said. "This exclusionary mentality is a major problem at K-State."

"To correct these problems, we need to construct a campaign where students talk to students, faculty talk to faculty, administrators talk to administrators, classified staff talk to classified staff," Boyer said. "There has to be this collaborative interaction all the time, not just in February."

In the fall of 1976, Boyer and his wife co-founded the Fellowship Temple. It is a part of a national body called the Church of God in Christ. Boyer said he started the church because he saw a need and the most powerful channel of cultural expression for African-Americans, in his eyes, is the church.

"It is our labor of love," Boyer said. "This is my gift to humanity and I've been doing it for over 14 years now."

Star signs fun, false in reality

Astrology history puts Earth in center

JENNIE DILLON
Collegian Reporter

Many people are interested in their daily horoscopes, curious to find out what the future holds for them. They watch the newspapers for clues, read books to help them understand what the signs will do for them.

Astrology, the theory that the movements of the stars, planets and sun rule people's lives, began in Mesopotamia about 150 B.C. It is based on 12 houses known as the Zodiac and revolves around the misconception that the Earth is the center of the universe.

"Horoscopes and astrology are just a bunch of baloney," Larry Weaver, professor of physics, said. "The stars are zillions of miles away and can't have any effect on us on the Earth."

Four thousand years ago, the thinking was quite different, he said. The ancients believed the stars did control events on Earth because there was no other explanation.

For example, when a river flooded at the same time each year, certain stars were visible in the sky, making it easy to believe that the stars affect the Earth, he said.

Horoscopes published in daily newspapers and magazines are usually based on birth signs alone. They are very generally written to include as many people as possible.

"I think most people have an interest or fascination with horoscopes because they are like fortune-tellers," Jenny Adams, sophomore in pre-veterinary medicine, said. "Everyone wants to know what will happen to them in the future."

"I try and read my monthly horoscope to see what I have to look forward to during the month," she said. "I think they're kind of funny. Of course none of it comes true."

Another defect in the reliability of astrology concerns the position of the stars today compared to their positions 4,000 years ago. The gradual shift in the sun's orbit has caused the Zodiac to shift by an entire house, throwing astrological calculations off by one month.

"I think our minds are built to find patterns and symbols," Weaver, who also teaches astronomy, said. "I think people, me too, are prone to see coincidences."

Diamonds can't guarantee love

SCOTT FOWLER
Collegian Reporter

Valentine's Day is the perfect occasion to express affection and love for a loved one by giving nature's treasures.

"Candy is sweet and flowers are nice, but only jewelry lives to say love another day," Charles Elliot, owner of Reed & Elliot jewelry store, said.

Elliot said many qualities need to be examined when purchasing a diamond. He said a gem is established by its intrinsic beauty, durability and rarity.

It is a science and the purchaser is at the mercy of the person they are buying it from, he said.

Diamonds, rubies, emeralds and sapphires are precious gems. Semi-precious gems would include opals, onyx and pearls, and a third category of gems are synthetic, which are man-made, Dave Thomas, owner of G Thomas Jewelers, said.

Thomas said he thinks Valentine's Day is one of the most important days on the calendar in a woman's heart. If a guy did not give his girlfriend an engagement ring for Christmas, Valentine's Day is the next appropriate time, he said.

The thought behind the whole engagement process is what is important, not the ring the couple gets. A customer can purchase the same quality gem for $300 as he could for $3,000. The difference would be in the size the gem was cut, Thomas said.

"Don't sacrifice quality for quantity. The size of the stone, obviously, shouldn't make the marriage," he said.

Elliot said he also believes quality is the most important.

"Quality never needs an apology, it always meets and fulfills expectations," he said.

Dave Duerfeldt, owner of Duerfeldt Jewelry, said some students elect to purchase a birthstone or fashion ring for their friend.

"It's a big statement without getting into an engagement ring," he said.

Most girls come in with an idea of a general style that is appealing to them, Duerfeldt said.

Finney looks for Kansans' opinions

Governor concedes success of tax proposal

By the Associated Press

TOPEKA — Gov. Joan Finney, conceding her proposal for property tax relief has been greeted with a cool response from lawmakers, said Wednesday she is circumventing the Legislature and taking her case directly to the people.

"It hasn't been given a fair hearing," she told a meeting of Associated Press editors and broadcasters. "I will continue to press and press hard for property tax relief," she said.

She conceded her proposal to repeal 35 exemptions from the state's 4.25 percent sales tax and impose a similar tax on 77 professional services, has been given a cool reception.

"There is a new air around the Statehouse," she said. "It's a different approach to government. I know this is frustrating for them."

Finney said, however, lawmakers are making a greater effort to provide Kansans with property tax relief than they have in the past two years. But she repeated her vow of not playing politics with tax relief.

"I know the game; I know how it's played," she told the newsmen and women. "But I've told the members of the Legislature that I don't want to play the game. Legislators don't break a governor, the people do."

She said she is flexible about how to fund property tax relief, saying if lawmakers do not like her ideas, they can come up with their own.

"I'm not worried about how it's funded," she said. "I want it done — it must be done this year. We cannot dilly dally any longer."

She also said if the Legislature does not pass a bill that would allow voters to pass laws through petition initiative, then it will be a campaign issue in the 1992 election.

"I think the people have tremendous insight," Finney said. "I feel they must have this right."

She said support for petition initiative among the voters she has met around the state is very strong.

A House committee is presently hearing a proposal that would allow Kansans to place proposed laws on the ballot if there are enough signatures of registered voters comparable to 5 percent of total votes cast in the last statewide election. It would require signatures of 8 percent of the votes cast to place an amendment on the ballot.

Professor Gary Merrill is the curator of Kansas' largest collection of bryophytes — 8,000 of them. The Reed Bryophyte Herbarium is named after former K-State student Mary Reed who began collecting specimens for her master's degree.

Bryologist collector of mosses

KATE DIETRICH
Science/Health Reporter

Mosses, unlike majestic trees or sweeping prairie grasses, don't usually command much attention. Unless, of course, you are a bryologist.

For Gary Merrill, associate coordinator of Konza Prairie and K-State's resident bryologist, mosses and liverworts are interesting enough to deserve a lifetime of study.

And now, due to a transfer of 3,000 specimens from University of Kansas last October, Merrill is curator of Kansas' largest collection of lichens, mosses and liverworts. Mosses and liverworts are also known as bryophytes.

The Mary "Minnie" Reed Bryophyte Herbarium at K-State holds 8,000 samples of these low-growing plants from Kansas and around the world.

Merrill said Reed began collecting mosses late last century as she researched her master's thesis at the Kansas State Agricultural College. Two hundred of her specimens survive in the K-State collection today.

Her thesis, "Kansas Mosses," remained the definitive work on the subject for 75 years. After receiving her master's degree in 1893, Reed went on to California and Hawaii to study and teach marine biology.

Merrill came to K-State in 1987, having previously served as an associate curator at the New York Botanical Garden. In honor of Reed's pioneering work as his predecessor in Kansas bryology, he established and named the Reed Bryophyte Herbarium.

But as a student of plants that live in cool, moist conditions, Merrill was unsure he could continue his studies in warm, dry Kansas.

"In the beginning I was surprised by everything," Merrill said of his unexpected discoveries. He found that over 150 species of mosses grow in Kansas, contrary to the belief that mosses do not exist on the prairie.

Belief that grasslands can't support mosses may stem from studying non-functional prairies, Merrill said. Prairies are disturbed ecologies; they need grazing and periodic fires to ensure survival of the various plant species that grow there.

Merrill has found a dozen species that appear to thrive in a disturbed ecology. They may have evolved to depend on fires to clear undergrowth so they can establish themselves.

Other mosses manage to exist on grasslands in spite of the dry weather. It's the climate near the ground that matters for mosses, Merrill said.

KSPA has contest

MEREDITH JONES
Collegian Reporter

One of five regional journalism competitions sponsored by Kansas Scholastic Press Association will take place today at the K-State

Union. Ron Johnson, director of Student Publications Inc., said 421 students will be attending the contest from 29 high schools. This number is up from last year. contest organizers will compile 575 entries, up 126 from last year, and will compete in 14 journalism categories. There will be five classes: 6A, 5A, 4A, 3A and 2A and 1A combined.

Four other regional contests will take place across the state either

Thursday or Friday. These contests will be at Lawrence, Hays, Pittsburg and Wichita.

Top finishers will compete at the University of Kansas in May for the state competition.

Jackie Harmon, contest registrar, said all students have secret code numbers to provide anonymity to the students and to ensure fair judging. She said all judges are professional and are not associated with any of the schools.

Police find gun used in murder

By the Associated Press

MARSHALL, Mich. — The gun used to kill a TV anchorwoman who was haunted by a male admirer was found, and the investigation has narrowed to one suspect.

Diane Newton King of WUHQ-TV in Battle Creek was shot twice Saturday night as she turned to get her two young children out of her car in the driveway of her farmhouse.

"At this time, the investigation is starting to focus on an individual suspect," said Robin Ivey, administrative assistant for Calhoun County Sheriff Jon Olson.

Ivey said the suspect is male, but would not say if he is the anonymous admirer who harassed Newton King last year with repeated telephone calls and a threatening letter.

"We have not really connected nor have we eliminated the letter and phone calls to the crime," Ivey said.

The gun, a .22-caliber Remington-Scowmaster rifle, was found late Monday on the property of Newton King's home. Authorities would not say if it was found inside the house or in surrounding fields.

Newton King, 34, lived at the farmhouse with her husband, former police officer Bradford King, and their 3-year-old son and 3-month-old daughter.

Ballistic tests conducted Tuesday confirmed the gun was the murder weapon, but fingerprint test results are not expected until next week, Ivey said. Seven shell casings also were found, she said.

Newton King told authorities last October she had received repeated harassing telephone calls from an anonymous admirer.

After she declined to see him, the man sent Newton King a threatening letter. Authorities have not released the letter's contents.

Program offers group help

DARLA GOODMAN
Collegian Reporter

A new program to assist students struggling with classes began this week. The Academic Enrichment Program, offered by the Academic Assistance Center, targets students who were not expected to have difficulty in college.

About 70 second-, third- or fourth-semester freshmen students were contacted because they had ACT scores or grade point averages from high school or other colleges that did not indicate they would have problems.

Their first semester grades at K-State, however, showed a class to help them develop their academic skills would be beneficial, said Judy Lynch, associate director of the Academic Assistance Center.

Minority students often experience this type of difficulty, and most of the students involved in the program this semester are minorities. Mordean Taylor-Archer, assistant dean for graduate development and assistant provost for multicultural affairs, said the program is starting with a limited group of people, but will hopefully expand next year when results can be evaluated and funds become available.

Ideally, she said, the program will include all students who could benefit from the class.

About one-third of the students contacted about the program have indicated an interest in taking the course, which is worth two hours of credit.

Taylor-Archer said students who attended an informational meeting about the program were excited about the University offering a program to help them.

Participants in the program meet with a peer counselor one hour a week and in a study group three hours a week, Lynch said.

The program is modeled after the Learning Skills Seminars the center offers to incoming freshmen who need help with study skills and the athletic assistance program offered by the center.

The classroom portion focuses on general study skills, habits and techniques and encourages critical thinking, writing and talking. Lynch said many students do not know how to apply what they learn in class and express their own opinions.

The classes, which have about 12 students, will be visited by various faculty members to allow students to see instructors as real people.

Class instructor Anita Cortez, learning specialist with academic assistance and educational supportive services, said half of the class time will be spent in presentations from outside sources to help students learn the networking systems on campus.

"I find it really exciting because the students have a lot to offer. They're really interested and motivated."

—Anita Cortez
learning specialist

Students will also learn how to study for specific subjects. The rest of the class will be spent in a lecture format.

Cortez said she is impressed with the desire of the students to learn.

"I find it really exciting because the students have a lot to offer. They're really interested and motivated," she said.

The weekly meetings with a peer counselor provide the students with an outlet for discussing problems. The counselors are juniors, seniors or graduate students who have already worked in the Learning Skills Seminars.

Study groups are formed for specific classes and led by peer counselors to go over notes, text readings and prepare for exams together.

Through the study groups, students begin to feel more a sense of belonging and community, Taylor-Archer said. This emphasizes the University's commitment to enhancing diversity.

"We show them through a course — how to take notes, read the text and how to prepare for a test," said William Feyerherm, assistant dean of arts and sciences. "The idea behind a group is, if you're committed to the group, you know you're going to be there."

Taylor-Archer said the program aims at the retention of all students. Recruitment is enhanced by the retention of students.

Cortez said she sees student retention as a benefit of the program that will enhance the University as a whole.

"They give something back to the University by their being here," she said. "I see it as a kind of reciprocal enrichment."

K-State to coordinate state dance conference

DARLA GOODMAN
Collegian Reporter

Irish folk dancing, ballet, jazz, tap, mime and ballroom dancing are a few of the attractions at the 1991 Kansas Dance Network conference, which the K-State Dance Program will be host of Saturday and Sunday.

Judy Chitwood, director of the dance program and on-site coordinator for the conference, said about 140 people will be attending the workshops in Ahearn Field House and Nichols Hall.

In addition to the workshops, scholarship auditions will be held to allow dancers from Kansas to compete for scholarships from prestigious schools such as the Martha Graham School, the Nikolais/Louis Foundation for Dance and the Atlanta School of Ballet.

The Kansas Dance Network has worked with the schools to offer scholarships to provide more opportunities for Kansas dancers to study professionally, because most schools have not traditionally come to the Midwest to audition, Chitwood said.

Some of the scholarship winners will be chosen directly by judges at the conference, while others will be narrowed down to two or three finalists and the final selection will be made by the schools, she said.

A showcase performance on Saturday evening in Nichols will feature performers and choreographers from K-State, Emporia State and studios from across the state.

Chitwood said the showcase performance allows people interested in dance to see what everyone else in the state is doing.

The workshop topics are not limited to techniques of the various types of dance, she said. They also include discussions on how to teach dance to pre-school children, career choices in dance and how to publicize work affordably.

"It has to be inclusive for every age span," Chitwood said.

"We also try to offer things the normal student might not have in the normal classroom setting," said Mary Halverstadt, executive director of the KDN.

This is the fourth annual conference of KDN and the second to take place at K-State. The conference will be at K-State for the next several years as well, Halverstadt said.

The network was started in July of 1987 when a group of 27 people got together to talk about the opportunities for dance in Kansas, Halverstadt said. It became an official organization in 1988.

The network's membership of about 220 people includes anyone who is interested in expanding the cultural opportunities in Kansas.

"It's not for just professionals — it's for anyone who is interested in dance. You don't have to be a trained dancer to be involved," Halverstadt said.

KDN also sponsors workshops throughout the year for dance teachers, better body workshops for the public that deal with stress management and classes for physical education teachers that teach them how to use rhythm in the classroom.

Aggieville adds diner, shops

Stores to sell environmental items, antiques, clothing

By the Collegian Staff

Aggieville's shopping variety has expanded with the addition of four new stores, featuring products from all ends of the spectrum.

The Earth Store on Moro will offer products for the environmentally conscious consumer and a clearing house for information from environmental groups.

Co-owners Laurel Nichols and Mitchell Leggs plan to open for business in April.

The store will offer a barrage of merchandise including recycled paper products, appliances and gadgets that assist in environmental conservation, such as the mini-flush toilet water reduction tool.

Cosmetics and biodegradable household products such as laundry detergents will also be offered, none of which have been tested on animals.

Nichols said some gift items, and hopefully a few logo products will be for sale.

"All our products are earth friendly," Nichols said. "We believe this is a service people in Manhattan can use."

A new eating establishment, The Super Diner offers a change of taste at budget prices, featuring authentic Pakistani and Indian foods.

Those who crave mutton kurma could purchase a plate for $2.49 with some complimentary naan for 89 cents.

Tandori chicken with raita (skinless chicken marinated in vinegar with yogurt and spices) is the most expensive item, topping the menu at $2.99.

The diner offers monthly meal plans and is open from 11:30 a.m. to 8 p.m. daily.

Owner Morgan Chilson stresses quality in referring to her new consignment store, Exactly Right, on Laramie.

"It's not like a thrift store," she said. "I'm very picky and I won't accept torn articles or junk."

"People may bring in things they want to sell and receive a percentage of the sale back," she said.

Exactly Right offers antiques, crafts and vintage clothing, including old hats and a variety of other goods.

Chilson, a 1986 K-State graduate, got the idea for the store after seeing a successful consignment shop in her Virginia hometown.

The shop is open Monday through Friday from 11 a.m. to 6 p.m., Thursday until 8 p.m. and opens Saturdays at 10 a.m.

TCBY yogurt shop celebrated its grand opening with a ribbon cutting ceremony on Monday.

The store sells a variety of yogurt flavors as well as banana splits, shakes and crepes. Dieters may buy Slimfast shakes from $1.89 to $2.29.

Manager Gail Herrington said they offer pies, cakes and Belgian waffles, all made fresh every day.

TCBY is open 11 a.m. to 11 p.m. daily.

Angry senators want highway moved

Construction temporarily discontinued to see if reservation can be avoided

HOPE SWARTZ
Collegian Reporter

Senators angered by service stations on the Pottawatomie Indian Reservation selling gasoline without state sales tax to passing motorists, are trying to move U.S. Highway 75 east of that reservation.

The Kansas Senate recently passed a resolution to temporarily discontinue construction of U.S. Highway 75 between the cities of Mayetta and Holton to determine the feasibility of moving a portion of the highway one-half-mile east of the reservation.

George Wahquahboshkuk, Pottawatomie tribal chairman, said the highway currently runs through the reservation. The tribe never sold the land to the state, they just deeded it over for the highway. The tribe is willing to allow the state to use more land for the expansion of the highway.

The reservation and its people were not subject to state taxes, Wahquahboshkuk said. The federal government, while establishing Kansas boundaries, set aside land on which Indian tribes could exist as an Indian nation, subject only to the federal government.

There are three tribal gas stations along the present route of highway 75 that do not include the 16-cent state motor fuels tax on their retail pump prices.

Wahquahboshkuk said he considers the issue of moving the highway a less financial one and more based on discrimination, being left out of any decision to move the highway.

"I was asked to attend the initial road expansion meeting, but we were never informed of the proposal to move the road, which seems to be the norm," he said. "We always find these things out in the newspapers."

"We did ask them if they would hire our people that were unemployed and needed work to help build the road," he said. "But they said that they wouldn't because they haven't received any federal grants for that kind of thing."

Sen. Don Sallee, R-Troy, a member of the Senate Transportation Committee who authored the resolution, said there were several reasons for the proposed highway move.

People have built new homes along the highway, and the new route would have no houses in its path, which would make it cheaper and less destructive, he said. The terrain of the proposed route has less hills and is therefore more conducive to building a road. The move would also cut down on the need for access roads because the area along the present highway is so heavily populated.

But Sallee said moving the highway east would end the problem with the service stations.

"It (the alternate route) also doesn't give the big problem that Kansas has, which is non-Indian and non-tribal members having access to motor fuels that are not subject to gas tax," Sallee said.

"They would have to prove to me that there is a large cost difference. I don't believe that they've looked at it. It's too soon."

—Sen. Don Sallee

Of the motor fuel tax taken in at gas stations, 40 percent goes to the state highway fund, and the remainder is given to the county in which the gas is sold, he said.

The tribe began drawing up plans to begin a gas tax two years ago, Wahquahboshkuk said. The tribe is implementing an 8-cent gas tax, a 10-percent sales tax, a cigarette tax and an income tax.

Sallee said the proposal is just in the preliminary stages. The department won't even be authorized to look at it unless it passes the House of Representatives.

Sallee said the cost of the project is going to play a major factor in whether the move takes place.

"They would have to prove to me that there is a large cost difference," he said. "I don't believe that they've looked at it. It's too soon."

Patrice Pomeroy, public information officer at the Department of Transportation, disagreed.

"The road will have to be redesigned and resurveyed," she said. "The cost to start all over again will be substantial."

Estimates for the current project, without the movement to avoid the reservation, are divided into three sections of road.

The first part will run from the north end of Topeka to the Jackson County line. That section will be five miles long and cost about $13.4 million. Pomeroy said her department is in the process of obtaining the houses and buildings along this section, which will need to be relocated for the expansion.

Bids for this first section will be let in February 1992, she said.

The next eight miles will run to Mayetta at a cost of $20.4 million and should be ready for bids January 1993. The estimated cost for the 9.3 mile expansion from Mayetta to Holton, which runs through the reservation, is $25 million. It's scheduled for bids in March 1993.

Wahquahboshkuk said he was asked to testify before the House Tuesday but was not allowed to properly address the issue.

"Two gas station owners along the current highway were also there, and they were allowed to speak for half an hour," he said. "I was told I had three minutes, of which I was only allowed to speak for one-and-a-half minutes."

The current highway has been marked on road maps as far back as 1918, Pomeroy said.

Cigarette logos hidden in games

By the Associated Press

NEW YORK — Marlboro cigarette logos have been found in children's video games around the country more than a year after Philip Morris said it would demand an end to the practice.

In a spot check in mid-January, Associated Press reporters found the Marlboro logos in arcade games in Denver, Miami, Phoenix, Salt Lake City, Nashville, Tenn., and New York. The games were manufactured by Sega of South San Francisco, Calif., which also makes home video games.

In some games, the logos have been altered slightly, so that a word like Marlboro may appear in a typeface identical to the Marlboro logo, against the Marlboro red-roof background. At the normal speed of game play, the logos appear identical to Marlboro logos.

Philip Morris said it had not agreed to the use of its Marlboro logo, because to do so would appear to be promoting cigarettes to children. It said then that it would demand the logos be removed. Sega said it would comply.

Jewish students pray for peace as war goes on

PAUL NOEL
Staff Reporter

Concern for coalition forces in the Middle East is felt by all religions.

Hillel, the Jewish student organization, set up a table outside the K-State Union Stateroom to show moral support for the forces in Saudi Arabia and inform people about the history and geography of Israel.

"We're concerned with peace," David Margolies, faculty adviser for Hillel, said. "We wanted to use this opportunity to let people know Israel would like peace and let people know we're with the rest of the community in praying for peace."

The information center was open from 10 a.m. to 3 p.m. Wednesday. Margolies said the table will be out again next Wednesday and that he hopes it can be in the Union every Wednesday.

Margolies said he felt people did not know enough about Israel and wanted to give them the chance to learn about it and its role in the gulf war.

Israel is less than one-eighth the size of Kansas, and is all but overcome from the past 40 years of war, he said.

"We're here to provide maps of Israel, information and someone to talk with," he said.

Many people wanted information they did not know the answers to and others disagreed with Hillel's stance.

Margolies said there were two types of disagreements. Some people thought the United States shouldn't be bombing Iraq and the group's presence showed a favorable position to it, he said.

Another disagreement concerned Palestinians. He said some people thought Saddam Hussein's invasion of Kuwait would give the Palestinians a place they could call their own.

"Although Saddam Hussein is trying to use that excuse, it's not the real reason for the invasion," Margolies said. "He didn't go into Kuwait because he's a nice guy."

Army uniforms key to survival

Designer uses 6 colors for camouflage

JENNIE DILLON
Collegian Reporter

The uniforms of today's high-tech Army may not seem important, but they are indeed a key factor for survival in the desert.

The current six-color design being used in the gulf has been around since 1980 with 10 to 12 variations, said Rosemary Lomba, a clothing designer in the Life Support Systems Division at the U.S. Army Natick Research, Development and Engineering Center in Nantucket, Mass.

Designing camouflage is a long process involving computers and evaluations, Lomba said. Many different color combinations are used to come up with just the right pattern. The pattern must then be tested for visibility and practicality.

"The best way is to take it out and put it in a desert scenario," she said.

Uniforms are evaluated in the field during night and day situations, Lomba said. Results are determined from an average of all observations made.

Testing also involves compatibility in all units of the armed forces. Known as interservice stan-dardization, all departments are consulted during testing to ensure a cost-effective uniform that will be used by all servicemen. The process of designing and testing normally lasts four years, Lomba said.

The best way is to take it out and put it in a desert scenario.

Life Support Systems Division

Although standard green camouflage uniforms can still be seen in the gulf, they do not pose any threat to U.S. soldiers.

"They (desert uniforms) haven't caught up with them yet," said Lomba. "Ultimately they (the soldiers) will all have them."

The Army is currently working on a new three-color pattern, which will be released in April. Whether or not it will be used in the Persian Gulf War depends on the amount of time U.S. forces will be stationed there.

OPERATION DESERT STORM

Iraqi mines create physical, psychological threat in gulf

By the Associated Press

RIYADH, Saudi Arabia — When allied soldiers jump off for the ground attack into Kuwait, one of the most daunting obstacles they are likely to face is the simple land mine — a psychological as well as physical weapon.

Mines and obstacles have been part of the tactics of war for centuries and American officers here have little doubt that breaching Iraqi minefields will be a major task for ground forces attacking into Kuwait.

"It's pretty massive — mines, wire, trenches and now oil," one American colonel said, referring to what the allies will face if they move across the Saudi-Kuwait border in an attempt to oust the Iraqis.

Mines serve a number of purposes. First, they are used to deter, slow or divert an attacking force and disrupt a commander's plans and timetable. Second, they can bring great psychological stress on attacking troops.

Mines are terrifying. Large ones cripple or destroy vehicles. Others blow off the feet and legs of infantrymen. Some pop up out of the ground waist high and explode. Mines even can be filled with nerve agents or mustard gas.

The explosives usually are used in conjunction with obstacles such as wire and ditches.

Burning ditches, one of the expected obstacles along the border, can be surmounted by bulldozing sand into them and covering the flames. Burning oil causes large amounts of smoke that not only obscures the view of the attacking force, but that of the defending army as well, said U.S. military sources.

The sources decline to go into any other detail concerning the breaching of Iraq's burning ditches.

Land mines can be set off by pressure on them, by the magnetic influence of vehicles passing over them and by the vibration of vehicles. Anti-personnel mines can be set off by pressure or by trip wire.

The science of breaching is practically as old as that of laying minefields. Many of the techniques used today date from World War II.

Breaching can involve the use of explosives to detonate the mines. Combat engineer vehicles, which move through a minefield at 3-5 mph, can be outfitted with bulldozer blades to move the earth, or front end rakes and heavy rollers. Mobile bridges can be used to span ditches. Bangalore torpedos — long, thin pipe bombs — can be used to destroy wire.

One of the more recent techniques is what is known as a mine-clearing line charge. That is a rocket that fires across a minefield, dragging behind it a ropelike demolition charge that drops across the field. When exploded, it clears an area four yards on either side.

The charge is followed by a bulldozer, then proofed with a 10,000-pound roller. Troops then pour through the gaps.

All of these breaching techniques, of course, are frequently carried out under enemy fire.

'Enemy' excellent, full of suspense

STACEY HARBISON
Collegian Reviewer

Obsession is something most of us can relate to—either being obsessed with someone, or being the victim of someone else's obsession.

That's what "Sleeping With the Enemy" is all about.

The movie, a Nancy Price novel adaptation, displays the obsession one man has not only with his wife, but also with his living habits. He is a perfectionist to the bone, and if something isn't perfect, someone is going to pay.

I found myself wondering, as I watched Martin beat Laura, why any woman in her right mind would stay with a man like that. But fear is a strong emotion, and can prove to be its own motivation.

Julia Roberts is enchanting in her portrayal of Laura, the abused wife whose only means of escape is to stage her own death and start a new life.

Only it's not that easy. It takes months of planning and waiting before the timing is right for Laura to attempt an escape—but she succeeds.

The plot thickens as the pieces begin to fall into place and Martin, her husband, discovers she is alive and begins to track her down.

Laura changes her name to Sara, settles down in a new town and falls in love.

At least she didn't totally fall for this new guy, Ben, right away. Some might be able to relate to her hesitation about trusting someone again and I found it gave a more realistic ring to the movie.

But the good times don't last long because Martin finds her.

I'm not going to give the movie away, we knew all this from the previews anyway, and the previews were the only reason the movie was somewhat predictable—except for the ending.

But despite being predictable, the movie was excellent.

The acting in the movie is superb and extremely believable. "Sleeping With the Enemy" is full of suspense, laughter and a little romance.

At times, the movie was so intense the audience jumped, yelled and cheered together. We knew who the enemy was.

So do the good guys win? I can't tell you that, but I can tell you that it is an excellent movie and one that is worth seeing.

♥ Pam P. ♥
It's hard to believe
That one year ago
With roses in hand
I arrived in a limo.
The roses were red
And so was your dress
A rock you'd soon have
Was everyone's guess.
I still can't believe
That one year ago
I was on bended knee
In the back of a limo.
The chauffeur at the wheel
We cruised the streets
Just you and me
In the back seat.
It's hard to believe
That one year ago
I popped you the question
In the back of a limo.
With a tear in your eye
Not an answer was heard
But with your hug and a kiss
It was not in a word.
It's hard to believe
That in eight months more
We'll be carrying out our vows
We started the year before.
So hurry up October
Nineteen ninety-one
That's the year you and I Start our life as one.
Happy Valentine's Day.
Love, K.T.

Rangers charged in murder

By the Associated Press

NAIROBI, Kenya — Two park rangers were charged with murder Wednesday in the 1988 slaying, dismemberment and burning of a young British tourist in one of Kenya's best-known game sanctuaries.

Jonah Magiroi, 28, and Peter Ki-keen, 26, both Kenyans, remained mute in a five-minute court appearance on charges of murdering Julie Anne Ward, an amateur wildlife photographer, in the Masai Mara Game Reserve.

The prosecution told Chief Magistrate George Omondi-Tunya documents detailing the charges were incomplete and the two were not required to enter pleas. They were ordered held for a further court appearance Feb. 27. The two face the death penalty if convicted.

Ward's charred lower left leg and lower jaw were found in the sprawling game reserve in southwestern Kenya Sept. 13, 1988, a week after she was reported missing.

A vehicle the 28-year-old woman rented was found abandoned about 10 miles from her remains.

Police initially said the woman was killed by wild animals as she set out on foot from her disabled vehicle to seek help, but were unable to explain the burning of her remains.

Ward's father, John Ward, insisted his daughter was murdered and pressed his own investigation. His efforts led to a 23-day inquest in Nairobi in 1989. The presiding magistrate held that Julie Anne Ward had been murdered, but failed to establish how or by whom. He ordered the case reopened.

Two Scotland Yard detectives who were invited to help in the renewed investigation recommended in March 1990 that two unidentified rangers be charged with the murder. They said the rangers were on duty at the time Julie Anne Ward disappeared and were in the area not far from where her remains were discovered.

But Kenya Attorney General Mathew Muli said the detectives had provided insubstantial evidence and asked them to continue their probe. They submitted a final report in September.

The Student Senate was serenaded with Hispanic folk songs and picked a Mr. and Ms. Valentine on a night when few items appeared on the agenda.

It was appropriate the folk group of Ian Bautista, sophomore in pre-law; Uzziel Pecina, senior in modern languages; and Alex Britos-Bray, junior in animal science, sang to the Senate, because earlier in the evening the Senate approved nearly $1,500 to help the K-State Hispanic American Leadership Organization support a regional Hispanic of Today Conference Feb. 24-25.

B.J. Garcia, senior in political science and student coordinator of the HOT conference, said HALO has already raised $14,000 to have the conference. The money from the Senate will be used to cover planning cost not envisioned by HALO.

In other business, the Senate gave the first reading of a constitutional amendment to clarify student initiatives, referendums and plebiscites.

Derek Nelson, business senator, said under the amendment, signatures from 10 percent of the student body on any issue would either put the issue before the Senate for a vote within two weeks or place it before the student body in a special ballot within four weeks.

The amendment would also allow the Senate to refer a measure for approval by the student body as a referendum.

Finally, the plebiscite, a student body poll, would allow the Senate to get a sense of student opinion, Nelson said.

"A lot of it came about because of Gov. Joan Finney's initiative proposal," Nelson said. "We looked at our initiative process and found it was poorly written. This is a way to clarify and improve the process."

The amendment will be considered for adoption next week.

Regents propose tuition increase

Farrell renovations, language test debated

CHRISSY VENDEL
Collegian Reporter

TOPEKA — A possible tuition increase, faculty language competency, and a consultant's report on Farrell Library were some items on the Kansas Board of Regents' agenda at a meeting Thursday in Topeka.

The Committee for Tuition and Fees proposed a 10 percent tuition increase for residents and a 12.5 percent for non-residents at the regents' three largest schools, including K-State.

Regent Rick Harman, Shawnee Mission, said the tuition increase is necessary to close the gap between tuitions at peer institutions.

"It will create problems internally unless we have tuition that averages with our peers," he said.

There was disagreement over the increase in non-resident tuition, because it could deter students from coming to Kansas universities.

Other points of disagreement involved the allocation of the increased tuition for equipment and the possible elimination of engineering fees after the increase in tuitions is authorized.

Harman said he wanted the engineering departments to get their fair share of tuition if the engineering fee is dropped.

Stanley Koplik, executive director of the regents from Topeka, said it would be important to allocate money for equipment fees. Otherwise, universities will just use it to relieve pressure from the general fund.

On another issue, K-State Provost James Coffman said although there was no action taken during this meeting regarding Farrell Library, the consultant's report on its renovations is an item of long-term importance for K-State.

"The regents now officially have the report, and we can start working with them to improve Farrell," he said. "It's a step in the right direction, but it is going to take time."

Also affecting K-State is a proposal by the Students Advisory Committee, made up of regent student body presidents. They suggested three resolutions to help improve the language competency of non-native teachers at regent schools.

Right now, to be an instructor, non-natives must pass an English skills test and score at least 220 out of 300 points. If a score is between 190 and 220, the person is allowed to teach on a probation status that requires enrollment in an intensive English course and passage of the skills test at the end of the year.

The first resolution would stipulate a student be present during an interview of a non-native.

"This would allow better judgment of language competency, since the student wouldn't have prior subject knowledge, which could create the appearance of higher competency," Andrea Roberts, student body president of Emporia State University, said.

The second resolution would require a score of 240 on the English skills test, rather than the original 220.

The third would reduce the probation period from one year to one semester.

"Faculty language capacity permeates every aspect of learning," Roberts said. "Not being able to understand a professor is a common complaint every student body president hears."

The board voted to put the discussion on the table for the March meeting.

Todd Heitschmidt, K-State student body president, said he was surprised at some administrators' objections, but was pleased with the way the board wants to handle the SAC's proposals.

"We didn't expect to solve all the problems, but at least now they have to address the problem," he said.

Heitschmidt said although the topic has now formally come up, it is going to take the K-State students to back the SAC up.

"If anyone has ever had a similar problem with inability to understand an instructor, they should write a letter or call the student government office and let us know," he said.

The information gathered through students will be used to help pass a solution at the regents' March meeting.

K-State President Jon Wefald said in the last three years, the provost's office had only received five complaints regarding non-native instructors, and each was handled on its own merit.

"The next 30 days will allow us to focus on the problem," he said. "I'm keeping an open mind to see if one of several solutions could work."

Wefald said he understood there might be a silent majority out there who have problems but neglect to lodge formal complaints.

"I'm sure a lot of students, especially freshmen, don't understand what their options are if they have a problem with an instructor," he said.

Other topics on the board's agenda were qualified admissions, funding for the Kansas College of Technology/K-State merger and the Legislative audit of K-State and WSU.

Harman said he met with the Board of Education about qualified admissions and was disappointed with their inability to communicate.

"They didn't realize the qualified admissions proposal was up for legislation," he said. "We need to bridge these gaps, because we need their support."

The regents approved a lease-agreement proposal for the funding of the Aeronautical Center on the KCT campus. The proposal came from a Joint-Building Committee of the Kansas Legislature. The other option was to ask the state for the needed $2 million up front.

Under the 20-year lease-purchase agreement, the Salina Airport Authority will construct the building, and ownership of the building would be transferred to the regents at the end of the period. Final execution of the lease and actual construction will have to wait for approval by the full Legislature.

Another lengthy discussion involved the Legislative audit for spending of the Margin of Excellence funds at K-State and Wichita State.

War debate extends from Student Senate to UN

Security council meets in closed session

By the Associated Press

UNITED NATIONS — The U.N. Security Council opened debate on the Persian Gulf War on Thursday in its first closed-door session in 15 years.

Iraq's envoy condemned the U.S. bombing deaths of civilians in Baghdad and gave no sign Iraq would vacate Kuwait.

China called the reports of civilian casualties and massive destruction caused by allied raids in Iraq extremely grave and offered its own plan for achieving a peaceful solution.

The debate was the first on the war by the 15-member council, which in November authorized the United States and its allies to use military force to drive Iraq from Kuwait after Jan. 15.

The council adjourned Thursday night after 3½ hours of debate and will reconvene today. At least 30 speakers were on the list for a debate that could continue for days.

Cuban Ambassador Ricardo Alarcon said his government was drafting a call for a cease-fire and establishment of a committee to recommend ways to end the war this month.

The Persian Gulf crisis began when Iraq invaded Kuwait on Aug. 2. Allied bombing raids began on Jan. 17. A U.S. air attack on Baghdad killed hundreds of civilians in an underground shelter Wednesday. The allies said the bombed target was a military command and control bunker.

Thursday's session was closed at the insistence of the United States, Britain and other countries who said the spectacle of a noisy debate and criticism of allied tactics would encourage Iraqi President Saddam Hussein.

A transcript of Thursday's meeting was to be made available today. Normally, the United Nations gives a detailed running account while the meeting is under way.

Diplomats at the meeting said Iraqi Ambassador Abdul Amir Al-

Anbari accused the coalition of war crimes. Al-Anbari, Iraq's highest-ranking diplomat in America, did not mention the word Kuwait or give any indication Iraq would end its occupation, they said.

See related story/Page 12

Iraqi diplomats said Al-Anbari's text compared President Bush with Mongol invader Huloko, who sacked Baghdad in 1258.

Saudi Ambassador Samir Shihabi told the Security Council Iraq has rejected all council calls to quit Kuwait.

"No usurper in all history was given the chance and time, which was given to the Iraqi regime to desist from its adventures and evacuate Kuwait," he said, according to a text given to the AP.

Shihabi said his government and 27 others in the coalition were trying to implement U.N. resolutions demanding Iraq's withdrawal from Kuwait.

Controversial yellow ribbons taken from southeast campus entrance gate

KIMBERLY KOHLS
Staff Reporter

Yellow ribbons were put on Higinbotham Gate, now they are gone.

The ribbons were put on by Student Senate and Student Government Services last week. Wednesday, the ribbons were off of the entrance gate at the southeast corner of campus.

"After the Faculty Senate rejected a resolution to put yellow ribbons on the gate, Todd Heitschmidt (student body president), and I talked and I wrote a resolution to put ribbons on the it," said Senator Derek Nelson, sophomore in business education. "The first reading of the resolution was about two weeks ago."

"President (Jon) Wefald then told us we were free to place ribbons on the gate so I withdrew the resolution," Nelson said.

Nelson is not sure what happened to the ribbons on Wednesday, but he said he wants to replace the ribbons.

The problem is yellow ribbon is scarce in Manhattan and the state.

When Nelson wrote the resolution to put ribbons on the gate, he made it clear the ribbons showed support for the troops and Senate was not taking a pro- or anti-Persian Gulf War stand.

"There was a small group of senators who were afraid of the meaning of the yellow ribbons," Nelson said.

The ambiguity of the meaning of yellow ribbons is the reason Faculty Senate did not put ribbons on the gate.

"Different people interpreted the meaning differently, and we didn't want to take a stand as a whole Senate," said Wayne Nafziger, Faculty Senate President.

"I am sorry to see that they are down," Nafziger said.

Clerk gives woman bag of cash

AUGUSTA, Ga. (AP) — A woman was left hungry but temporarily $1,000 richer when a clerk at a fast-food restaurant accidentally gave her a bag of cash instead of two burgers.

Sarah Cross said the cashiers were counting money when she drove up to the Wendy's drive-in window Friday on her way to see her husband, Aaren, who was in a hospital.

She said she opened the bag in her husband's room at the hospital and found the money.

"He asked me if I had said holdup or hamburger."

"I said, 'I think I said hamburger — I hope I said hamburger.'"

Cross had a nurse call Wendy's, and a policeman went to the hospital to exchange hamburgers for the cash.

Children send valentines to orphans

HUTCHINSON (AP) — When Romanian orphans receive donated clothing and medical supplies in April, they'll also find belated Valentine's Day cards from Kansas children.

The International Order of Foresters is asking students to donate valentines for delivery to Romanian orphanages, said Wayne Smalling, a spokesman for the Hutchinson chapter of the IOF. The valentines will be included with supplies of medicine, bedding and clothing from the group, he said.

City celebrates robbery anniversary

LIBERTY, Mo. (AP) — Legend says the James gang rode into Liberty 125 years ago and pulled off the first daylight bank robbery in American history.

In memory of the alleged event, more than 30 people gathered Tuesday at the restored Jesse James Bank Museum on the Liberty town square, where the robbers are said to have taken more than $60,000.

"In February 1866, 13 men on the 13th day rode into this small Missouri town and into history," building owner Jack Wy-more said during a ceremony.

The bank, built in 1858, was restored 25 years ago and is now a museum and county office building.

Though it has never been confirmed that Jesse James was among the robbers, the holdup is widely believed to have been committed by him and his brother, Frank, and their outlaw gang.

Widow charged in husband's death

OLATHE (AP) — The widow of a local man has been charged with first-degree murder and conspiracy to commit murder in her late husband's death.

The charges came less than a week after LaJuan Clemons was sentenced to life in prison for the murder of Charles Howell.

Faye Howell, 37, who now lives in Kansas City, was charged Wednesday in Johnson County District Court, and was held in the county jail on a $200,000 personal recognizance bond and a $300,000 cash or surety bond.

Clemons, 26, also of Kansas City, was convicted of shooting Howell twice in the head at pointblank range with a 12-gauge shotgun Feb. 8, 1990.

Wind causes car pileup, injuries

GOODLAND (AP) — At least 27 people were hospitalized Thursday after dust clouds caused a multi-car pileup on Interstate 70 east of Goodland, officials said.

The Kansas Highway Patrol closed the westbound lane of Interstate 70 for three hours after blowing dust suddenly blocked drivers' visibility. At least 18 cars were involved in the pileup, dispatchers said.

Officials at the Northwest Kansas Regional Medical Center in Goodland said 22 people were treated there.

Coalition sponsors vigil, discussion

The Manhattan Coalition for Peace in the Middle East has scheduled a silent vigil for 11:30 a.m. today in the K-State Union Plaza, said Talat Rahman, associate professor of physics and a coalition organizer.

No speeches will be made at the vigil, which is intended to remember civilians and soldiers from all countries who have died in the Persian Gulf War, Rahman said.

The coalition is sponsoring a panel discussion at 3:30 p.m., Saturday in the Manhattan Public Library, at Poyntz and Juliette avenues.

Another coalition panel discussion is scheduled for noon, Wednesday in the K-State Union Courtyard, Rahman said.

An information table will be set up in the Union during the vigil, so people interested in reading more about the war may pick up literature. People who wish to talk to coalition members about the conflict may do so during the vigil, she said.

Blood drive needs campus donations

1,400 volunteers needed for Red Cross goal

MARLA ROCKHOLD
Collegian Reporter

To meet their goal, the American Red Cross from the Wichita region needs at least 1,400 volunteers to donate one unit of blood during its blood drive at K-State Feb. 19-22.

The bloodmobile will be set up in the K, S and U rooms in the K-State Union from 9 a.m. to 3 p.m. during those days.

The Red Cross depends on collecting 350 units of blood every day throughout the state to supply about 150 hospitals, said Cindy Burke, director of health education at Lafene Health Center. To get this blood, the Red Cross has three mobile units sent out to different places every day.

The Red Cross is bringing all their mobile units to K-State for this drive, Burke said. "They put a lot of stock in that our faculty and students will donate to get the needed units."

K-State has consistently been the largest blood drive contributor in the State.

"I really feel it's because a good share of the students come from a small rural community and were previously involved in blood drives. They tend to be more caring, giving individuals," Burke said.

Volunteers should just relax and come with a positive attitude.

consultant for blood services

Last semester's blood drive was really frustrating, she said. Only 1,093 units were donated. A reason for this decline is because many students were selling their plasma.

Donating blood is more important than donating plasma, Burke said. One unit can be broken down four ways — possibly saving four lives.

Burke said the gulf war will probably bring out more volunteers. At this point, however, the Red Cross feels they have enough (blood) to send to Saudi Arabia. If a ground war breaks out, they may need more.

Machelle Mize, consultant for the blood services in Wichita, said their region has already sent 200 units of blood to the gulf. Until the military asks, they will not send more.

The process of donating blood can take up to an hour and a half, Burke said. This includes filling out forms, waiting and the actual donation. Drawing the blood takes an average of 10 to 15 minutes.

Giving blood is sometimes scary but is a very painless thing, Mize said.

"Volunteers should just relax and come with a positive attitude," she said.

Blood donors can take precautions to ensure a comfortable experience.

"The important thing (before donating) is to get a good night's sleep, don't drink the night before and eat before coming," Burke said.

Database to help students buy, sell textbooks

ULRIKE DAUER
Collegian Reporter

Book trading via computer will be possible for students in early May.

Southwind International, an educational and environmentally-oriented organization with headquarters in Manhattan, is installing a database for used textbooks to help students in selling and buying their textbooks at a more appropriate price.

"Last semester the plan came up to help students who are always frustrated when selling their books back to the bookstore," Paul Davidson, junior in social science and member of Southwind, said.

"I was always annoyed by how the bookstores handle this," Sherry

Sperman, sophomore in sociology and political science and international director of education at Southwind, said. "We want to provide alternatives."

Through this contact database people can then get in touch with people who are interested in their books or who sell the books they need themselves, Davidson said.

This service will cost $1, he said, but students will be able to get a better price for their books than through the bookstores.

"We developed guidelines for the price they can ask," Davidson explained. "The price for a book should not be more than 10 percent over the price the bookstore pays for used books and can be 10 percent under the price for a new book."

"This means savings for the people who are buying," Davidson said.

"People get a better turnaround, they pay less and get more," Sperman said.

She said a similar service already exists in other university cities, where it is usually provided by fraternities and sororities.

The database will probably be ready for use in April, she said. Southwind still has some problems with the list. They are going to keep two separate lists for in- and out-putting.

"This semester will be trial and error, we need to see how it works," she said.

Funding discussed at ad hoc meeting

Jodell Lamer
Collegian Reporter

Representation and funding were topics of discussion by the Student Publications Ad Hoc Committee at its meeting Thursday afternoon.

The committee members discussed representation on the Board of Student Publications. Currently, the board has four students who are elected at-large each year in conjunction with student government elections.

Two faculty members are appointed to the board by the University president. The director of the A.Q. Miller School of Journalism and Mass Communications serves as the chair and does not vote.

"Students have a 2-to-1 power ratio in decision making," said Travis Stumpff, senior in political science and chairman of the committee.

The board decided to recommend in its preliminary report that no changes be made in representation on the board.

Students have a 2-to-1 power ratio in decision making.

—Travis Stumpff
committee chairman

On the funding issue, members discussed justification for a possible increase in the Student Publications fee. Revenue from the increase would be used to replace Student Publications equipment.

Ron Johnson, director of Student Publications, answered questions from committee members concerning price lists and funding options.

Johnson said one of the proposed computer systems that would be funded by an increased fee, the Mycro-Tek system, was not a viable option for Student Publications due to its higher cost when compared to a Macintosh computer system.

The committee decided to submit a preliminary report to the Student Affairs Committee and a final report within a week.

The Student Affairs Committee will decide if the proposals made in the final report will be sent to Student Senate for consideration.

Senate would have to vote on any fee proposals by March 15 in order to meet a deadline set by the regents for fee proposals to be put on its calendar.

Cards symbolic of hegemonic stupidity

"Pity this busy monster, manunkind, not. Progress is a comfortable disease." -- e. e. cummings, prescient American poet.
 "Bogus!" -- Donatello, Teenage Mutant Ninja Turtle.

I know I gave the columnist's oath that I would no longer address the futility we have stupidly and mistakenly involved ourselves in as a nation/self-proclaimed world cop, namely the Persian Gulf War, but certain matters have come to my attention that just could not be overlooked.

I don't know what happened. I was finally beginning to rediscover morsels (albeit microscopic) of faith in human competence, when I happened to breeze through my daily paper Tuesday morning, Jan. 12. Harmlessly, I was trying to keep abreast of the war's developments as far as America is telling it, when on page A7, in a section reserved for ditties containing no literary, journalistic or functional value above pure trivia, I was blindsided by startling news.

There, in plain black and white, was an unbelievable account prefaced by a meager headline reading "Collect Schwarzkopf, Scud missile and all 88 war cards."

(Pause for a moment while I run to my front porch and scream at the top of my lungs in utter frustration. ... O.K., I'm back.)

It seems the Topps Co., known worldwide for its variety of collectable trading cards — most notably for its colorful baseball and football personalities and rudely stale squares of bright pink gum — announced it would unveil a new line of Persian Gulf War trading cards this week. This latest award-winning feat of capitalistic adventure will contain in each package several "full-color cards of the key figures and major weapons of Operation Desert Storm..."

I know our country has done some extremely idiotic things in its illustrious history, but this might indeed take the apple pie. War cards. War trading cards. Just think about that for a moment. What fine instruments of death do you want memorialized and sold to children alongside boxes of Teenage Mutant Ninja Turtles and New Kids on the Block? Maybe the AH-64 Apache? The F-15E Eagle? Or perhaps the M1 Abrams assault tank? Most likely, all will receive their due commemoration. Gee, 88 cards may not be enough, Topps. We sure do have quite a spectrum of destructive toys.

At least I'm sure that if one would wish to find the invaluable information concerning the firepower, speed and killing potential, our youngsters will need only to flip the glossy on its back for a healthy set of facts and figures. Each back could also contain a toll-free number directly ringing the local recruiting office so free-spirited patriotic progenies could not only support their country by trading their personal stockpiles with friends at recess, but could also reserve themselves a special place on the battlefield when they reach fighting age.

While you're at it, Topps, I hope you add in small print the cost of each weapon, just to let the young ones know what multi-million dollar eradicators they'll someday be driving. I know I'd be a little bit more careful about potholes if I were aware that my B-52 cost Capitol Hill about $35 million or about 2,187,500 compact discs. Likewise, the Tomahawk II cruise missile card should somewhere read that the U.S. has fired over 250 of these high-tech gems, costing $1.3 million per shot. (I don't think I need to do the CD conversion here as well. You get the idea.)

Out of the 88 cards, I wonder if there will be any dedicated to the 12 Americans and 18 Saudi Arabians reported killed in action or the 28 American MIAs or the eight American POWs Operation Desert Storm has fostered thus far.

I'm also curious to see if Topps will take the time to include one or two Russian satellite photos of southern Kuwait taken Sept. 11 and 13 of this year. These photos that appeared on the front and following pages of the Jan. 6 issue of the St. Petersburg Times show absolutely no Iraqi military buildup in any capacity whatsoever. Perhaps the nice shot of Kuwait's most strategic air base devoid of any Iraqi aircraft or activity (taken five weeks after the invasion, mind you) would make a valuable trade equivalent to two smiling Colin Powells and a nervous "President Bush declares war" action card. Yeah, you're right. Probably not.

What I would like to suggest instead of trading cards, if some ambitious company wants to clear a profit and be functionally astute, is to begin manufacturing Operation Desert Storm condoms. Just in time for next year's Valentine's Day, each individually-wrapped, commemorative camouflaged contraceptive could likewise depict a glorious and patriotic America through shots of battle scenes, leaders and weaponry. We might as well protect ourselves across the board, and besides, proceeds could go toward reducing the mammoth war deficit. Something needs to.

Maybe a formal Pentagon statement could also be printed somewhere on the packaging: "Military analysts have concluded that this condom, fortified with Nonoxodol-9, is effective in repelling and destroying intrusive and tyrannical invaders, not to mention chemical attacks by crazed dictators." Why, we could even have a few hundred thousand collector's editions made up in the spitting image of the President and Old Glory respectively. As Bush continues to sacrifice American troops to Phallus, I sure can't think of a better place to stamp Bush's face right now while he's screwing me and the rest of the country.

Upset? Want to scream? Good, me too. Think about it. This isn't Nintendo, and it's not rocket science. Our (fabulous?) country is going to print trading cards glamorizing a war, and some company is going to make millions. Wake up! How does that make you feel?

(I need to run to the porch for a little longer this time. I'm going to be hoarse before this thing is all over...)

It's apropos that e. e. cummings finishes the poem I began this column with by writing "...listen: there's a hell/ of a good universe next door; let's go." Unfortunately, we're hopelessly stuck in this one, however pathetic it may seem at times. Because of this, I included the token quote by TMNT Donatello. In this time of hegemonic stupidity, it appears more people are listening to him than to anyone else.

In the meantime, while this stupidity blows over, if anyone wants to join me on my front porch, they're more than welcome. It's going to be a long war. I've got plenty of room, and I think the neighbors have finally gotten used to the noise.

Audit deserves welcome, but K-State must be wary

K-State should welcome, yet be wary of, the state's audit of the third and final year of the Margin of Excellence.

If the taxpayers' money was squandered or misallocated in past MOE funding, adjustments will have to be made to ensure state funds are being allocated in a manner that will benefit all Kansans.

The MOE audit was requested by Sen. Eric Yost, R-Wichita, and unanimously approved by the legislative Post-Audit Committee. This bicameral and bipartisan committee is strictly freestanding, and they make sure legislation's implementation meets the intent of the legislature. They are a fiscal watchdog for the taxpayers.

Legislators from both political parties should agree that auditing state programs is a good idea for the taxpayer. This allows lawmakers to monitor and provide accountability for the tax money being spent by state funded institutions.

MOE funding is extremely vital to enhance K-State programs and fund faculty salaries. K-State must maintain quality faculty and equipment, or students will get an inadequate education.

Even though we should welcome the audit, in the past legislative session K-State was overlooked and underfunded.

Because of this past precedent in state legislative funding negligence, K-State students should also be wary of any tricky ploys by the legislators to gut MOE funding with convenient excuses buttressed by an audit.

Yet, K-State should cautiously welcome the audit because it is the state law, and it makes good business sense to audit state funded programs. K-State should also look out for these vitally needed funds.

Let's wait for final results of the audit with anticipation — and apprehension.

If surgical surgery were like surgical bombing.

Vigil planned

Editor,

The plight of the innocent civilians in Iraq and Kuwait is worsening with each passing day of the Persian Gulf war. In the Feb. 4 issue of the Manhattan Mercury, an Associated Press story reads, "There is still no electricity in Baghdad and only intermittent water supplies. There is also a severe shortage of food, kerosene and gas."

This coupled with the news of the killing of at least 500 innocent civilians, mostly children and women who were taking refuge in a bomb shelter during a single air raid on Baghdad, should make every reasonable person question the objectives of the war.

Obviously, many people did just that, and some of them are well suited to know the real story of the war. For example, the French defense minister and the commander of the Italian navy in the gulf have resigned to protest the conduct of the war.

The Manhattan Coalition for Peace in the Middle East is sponsoring a peace vigil this Friday, Feb. 15, (11:30 a.m.-1 p.m.) at the K-State Union Plaza to call for an immediate cease fire in the Persian Gulf and to negotiate for comprehensive peace in the Middle East. Everyone is welcome to join.

Station defended

Editor,

I have been reading with amazement the arguments against the Union Station in the letters to the editor recently. It seems these students have hardly given the station a chance to accomplish its purpose. After all, it only opened last month.

The Union Station was conceived, planned and created as an alternative to Aggieville. It is a place where those students who either are too young to be served alcohol or don't drink alcohol, for whatever other reason, can go to listen to good music, eat some good food and drink the non-alcoholic version of their favorite drinks. I think it's an idea whose time has come.

I also think K-State is lucky to have the student union it has. Do you realize your student union is rated among the 10 best in the nation? It takes a lot of hard work and effort by the staff of your student union to maintain that high level of quality. For the last 35 years, the staff of the K-State Union has been motivated by the goal of best serving the K-State students, faculty and staff.

K-State students, if you think you have it so rough in trying to find a good place to study, go visit some other campuses and compare their student unions to the K-State Union. I think you will be very surprised to find out just how many study places the Union provides you. After all, not only are you allowed to study in the Stateroom, courtyard and yes, the Union Station, you also have a newly refurbished second-floor concourse, and the Cat's Pause Lounge on the second floor. The student union was originally designed to be a gathering place, a socializing place for students. Studying is allowed as a service to the students, not as the primary purpose of the Union building.

Finally, an aside to Dwayne Lively, you write you are "filling the financial coffers of the Union." Do you realize the Union does not make a "profit" as the corporate world understands the term? All revenues generated by the operations of the Union departments are fed directly back into the continuing operating and improving of those departments. Everything the staff of the Union does is done with the intention of improving our service to the K-State community.

God bless America

Editor,

So many times in the past few months I have read something in the paper or heard it on the news, something that just rubbed me the wrong way. It's because I'm a military wife, who believes her husband is in Saudi Arabia for all the right reasons. So often I wanted to speak my mind. Well, Cia Verschelden made me break a vow to myself not to open my mouth. She placed the last piece of straw that broke this camel's back.

For two years I have faced things that I wouldn't have had to face had I been married to a civilian. My husband joined the U.S. Army because he could not find a job that could support us and guarantee us some sort of stability.

We were separated for four months when I was pregnant so he could go to boot camp and advanced training. We were stationed in Kansas, 1,500 miles from our life-long home of Rhode Island. I handled that; we would go home to visit. Then, we were told that he would be joining the soldiers in Saudi Arabia; the Big Red One was needed there, and I could even handle that. It was his job, and we believed our government was doing the right thing.

What I can't handle is someone telling me that all soldiers do is kill people. There are so many different jobs in the military. I couldn't possibly list them all. My husband was trained as a field medic, he helps wounded soldiers. That's what some of your tax money goes to. Did you know that? It goes to training our soldiers. It also goes to their monthly paychecks; they don't work for free. There are so many other things besides weapons that your taxes pay for.

I don't see what is so wrong with singing "God Bless America." Is this country that bad? There are so many freedoms here it seems you take advantage of, or else you wouldn't complain so much. You should thank God you don't live in the Baltic states where young people were killed for their demonstrations against their government. You should thank God you won't go to jail like the young Chinese students from Beijing who voiced to the world their problems with their government. Or maybe you should thank God that you don't live in a country ruled by a madman who tests chemical weapons on his own people.

So ask yourself, just once, is this really that horrible of a country? Is it that terrible to sing "God Bless America?" Think long and hard, Mrs. Verschelden, are you ready to pack up and find another country to live in? Well, are you?

On the home front ...

Although Junction City business prospects have declined since the deployment of the 1st Infantry Division, business owners said they are determined to survive.

Ted Bridges, owner of Bridges Upholstery, said his business is bad, and they miss the Fort Riley soldiers. Junction City is different since the soldiers have left, he said.

"At night we sit in the living room and there are no cars on the streets, it is really quiet," Bridges said. "I really believe in what the soldiers are doing, and I hope they get back real soon — and safely."

D's Army Surplus is located just outside the eastern gates of Fort Riley in Ogden. They sell new and used military surplus items to the soldiers and military buffs.

Owner Mike Dorton said his business, though steady, has dropped off a little, but he expected this to happen when the troops left for Saudi Arabia.

Dorton was a Vietnam veteran and served in the U.S. Army from 1972-1978 as an armour crewman. He said he is also an adamant supporter of returning the POWs and MIAs from Vietnam, and he is now concerned about the men and women in the Persian Gulf.

"I support what we are doing over there," Dorton said. "The only job I have held of any purpose was being a soldier. I am a soldier at heart, even though I am not one now."

"It goes beyond the 'No Blood for Oil' the protesters are saying. What about the murder, rape and pillage of Kuwait?" he said.

"It is about freedom," he said. "Let the military run the military. I just wish we would get it over with, and the troops can come back home. When we fight, we should fight to win."

Dorton said he is angry about the media coverage of the war, because he feels the journalists in Saudi Arabia and Iraq are abusing their jobs.

"I think the media coverage sucks — and you can quote me on that," Dorton said. "I see a lot of speculation, and they are taking advantage of using the war to sell media. They should be more professional."

Pam Dorton, Dorton's wife, said she believed the liberation of Kuwait was a worthy cause. She said she is concerned about the casualties now, and what we can expect in the future.

"I feel pain for the losses people will have to suffer," she said.

Gerda Smith, owner of the JC Bar and Gerda's Five Star Lounge, said her business prospects have varied since the deployment. The JC Bar on North Washington caters to civilians, and business hasn't declined much. At Gerda's Five Star Lounge on Grant Ave., however, business was mainly Fort Riley soldiers and has been very slow.

Smith said she saw many friends leave for Saudi Arabia, and she is concerned for their welfare.

"I am currently writing 25 of my good friends over there. They are like my children to me," she said. Jill Newmeyer, daytime bartender at the JC Bar, said although the war saddens her, she realizes it is her husband's job to be there.

"Nobody wants to see someone's husband go over there and fight," Newmeyer said. "We pray they come back."

A customer in the bar who identified himself as "Black Cloud" said he heard an announcement that reflects his mood about the ongoing war.

"I heard on the radio, 'Kick theirs, save ours, come home.' Remember, I am repeating what I have heard," he said.

James Carrico, president and chief executive officer of the Junction City Chamber of Commerce, said Junction City is looking for new and different ways to meet the challenge of business. The chamber of commerce is offering seminars on new business opportunities.

"Those businesses that catered to the single soldier will have to find a new market niche," Carrico said. "It

Baseball squad to open play

SCOTT PASKE
Sports Reporter

If K-State coach Mike Clark could schedule a game with the 1927 New York Yankees, he would. He figures the only way to find out the caliber of a team is to play the best.

But he can't, so K-State will open against No. 7 Arkansas for the second straight season.

The Wildcats and Razorbacks will play a doubleheader Saturday at George Cole Field in Fayetteville, Ark. The series concludes with a nine-inning game on Sunday.

"I love starting with them," Clark said, "because if we have anything broken, they show us what we need to fix."

Finding necessary repair work has been difficult for Clark in preseason workouts. With six returning starters and 15 lettermen, practices have involved less teaching and more perfecting.

"It's been a little scary for our staff," Clark said. "In the past, we've been really inexperienced, and now, we've got guys who have been around for three years."

"We're used to breaking things down and showing them the way it's supposed to be done. They're doing it the way it's supposed to be, and we don't quite know how to react."

The 'Cats' experience may have unlimited value this season because it is accompanied by a winning attitude. K-State capped its third consecutive 30-win season under Clark in 1990 by qualifying for the Big Eight Conference Tournament in Oklahoma City.

The 'Cats finished second in the conference with a 13-11 record and earned a berth in postseason play for the first time since 1985.

"It was huge," said Clark, who was chosen as Big Eight coach of the year for his effort. "Before, we kind of used mirrors when we were talking with people about the program. We used to have to say that this can be done and that can be done."

"Now, we can show them the proof."

The unexpected finish didn't leave a big impression with preseason pollsters. K-State was picked to finish fifth in the Big Eight by the Sporting News, a fact that doesn't concern Clark.

"Maybe it's a compliment," Clark said. "It's the first year since I've been here they haven't picked us last."

Despite the wealth of experience, K-State will have to fill a big void left by departed pitcher David Hierholzer. Hierholzer, a two-time All-Big Eight selection, finished last year with a 3.13 ERA in 15 appearances.

In 12 of his 14 starts, Hierholzer took K-State into the seventh inning. He threw eight complete games, providing an asset Clark is not sure he will have this season.

"We'll probably have a lot of guys who give us five to seven innings, then let the bullpen finish up," Clark said. "We haven't had anybody really step forward as a legitimate No. 1 pitcher."

If anybody is close, it would be senior Kent Hipp. Hipp, a transfer from Barton County Community College, was a solid backup to Hierholzer last season.

Hipp posted a 5-3 record, but was dominant in four Big Eight starts, finishing with a 2.57 ERA. He was a second team All-Big Eight pick despite missing the last month of play due to injury.

Clark announced Wednesday that Hipp will start Saturday's opener, with Sean Pedersen taking the mound for the nightcap. Junior Chris Hmielewski will start Sunday's nine-inning contest.

"Our pitchers have been inconsistent in our simulated games so far," Clark said. "They've been all over the zone. Hopefully, we'll be able to correct (that) by the time the season starts."

If the pitching staff can keep the ball in play, several veterans will be behind them to help. Junior shortstop Craig Wilson, the 'Cats' leading hitter last season with a .328 average, started in all 57 games.

Wilson was picked by the Sporting News as the second-best professional prospect in the conference.

Also back is Hmielewski, who started in 45 games at first base when he wasn't pitching last year. Hmielewski tied outfielder Brian Culp for the team lead in home runs with seven, and also won three games on the mound.

'Cats face KU while hoping to regain form

DAVID SVOBODA
Sports Editor

What a difference a week makes.

Heading into last Saturday's Big Eight contest with Iowa State, the men's basketball team had captured back-to-back Big Eight games, including a blowout of then-ranked Oklahoma on national television.

Since that confidence-building victory, however, there have been a pair of shocking, bitter defeats that have left the 'Cats in uncharted waters — solo possession of last place in the league.

"A week ago, things looked like they were in pretty good shape," said K-State coach Dana Altman, who saw his team drop its first five Big Eight tilts before winning the next two in succession. "But now, they're not so good."

And things may not get better any time soon.

That's because the Wildcats, 12-10 overall and 2-7 in the Big Eight, will travel to Lawrence Saturday to face 11th-ranked Kansas, 18-4 and 7-2.

Beware the Phog.

"They play awfully well at Allen Fieldhouse," Altman said of the Jayhawks, who are coming off a key road win at Missouri that kept them alone in first place in the Big Eight.

So how, then, can the struggling 'Cats stick with the torrid-of-late Jayhawks?

"We'll have to rebound them," Altman said. "And right now, we're just not shooting the basketball well. We have to shoot it better."

It's relatively easy, right?

Probably not, since the Jayhawks are 12-0 in Allen this season. KU hasn't lost at home since Feb. 13, 1990, a 15-game winning streak.

The 'Cats have won two of the last three meetings in Lawrence, but Kansas has now won three straight games in the series, and all have been in impressive fashion.

The most recent KU triumph came Jan. 29 in Bramlage Coliseum. The 78-69 win was keyed by the strong play of Alonzo Jamison, who had 20 points. Jean Derouillere had 20 to pace K-State.

"Alonzo's had a fine year and he played very well against us in the game here," Altman said.

Altman said he and his staff are doing their best to keep the spirits of the team up despite the recent adversity.

"It's part of the game," he said. "Things don't always go as you would like."

Lady Cats hope to get back on winning track against NU

ERIC BROWN
Sports Reporter

The unknown can lead to sleepless nights spent tossing and turning, but eventually the answers must come forward.

Three weeks ago, Coach Susan Yow was unsure of the quality of her Lady Cat team. After a strong road trip, her team was upset at home Jan. 19 by Iowa State.

Yet, even then, the date etched in her mind that the team would show its face was not until today, Feb. 15.

"I feel like my verdict on the team was still out until Feb. 15," Yow said.

With recent play of the team, she may be wishing for an extension to that deadline. At least, she'll be hoping the answers will begin to be seen today rather than be carved in stone due to prior events.

The journey through those last few weeks has definitely been rocky. After the Cyclone loss, the Lady Cats rebounded with a four-game winning streak highlighted by knocking off nationally ranked Oklahoma State to recapture a share of first place.

Yet, no sooner had the Lady Cats regained the top spot, they were stung on the road by seventh-place Oklahoma.

Rebounding from the loss, the Winners perform consistently, and that's very hard to do. That's probably why so few teams are successful at it.

— Susan Yow
Lady Cat coach

Lady Cats repaid Iowa State with a much-needed victory in Ames.

Cured, right?

Wrong.

K-State, 7-4 in the Big Eight and 14-8 overall, returned to the land of sub-par performances Wednesday. This time Colorado was the pesky underdog that gnawed away a crucial game from the Lady Cats.

Saturday, the Lady Cats will once again enter Bramlage Coliseum against a lower-placed opponent in Nebraska. If the Lady Cats are to challenge for the conference championship, they'll have to play better on a regular basis.

"Winners perform consistently, and that's very hard to do. That's probably why so few teams are successful at it," Yow said.

This also has something to do with why the Lady Cats are struggling to gain respect on the national level, which can only be alleviated by coming away with wins against lesser opponents.

A home game Saturday at 7 p.m. vs. the Huskers, 6-4 in Big Eight play and 15-9 overall, would appear to be just such a contest. However, NU coach Angela Beck brings a talented group to Manhattan, and they loom as a formidable opponent. They return all five starters from last year's seventh-place team.

"Nebraska has a very good team," Yow said. "They are much improved from last year. They had a down year last year, and they're not going to have a down one this year."

It's the presence of newcomer Meggan Yedsena that has changed the Husker tide to that of greener comfields.

"Basically, their improvement is because of a point guard they signed who's come in and just changed the complexity of their team," Yow said. Yedsena is averaging 7.9 points and 6.1 assists per game in making a strong bid at Big Eight Newcomer-of-the-Year.

Sophomore Karen Jennings is leading the Huskers with a 19.3 scoring average. Her 22.4 average in Big Eight play ties Lady Cat Nadira Hazim for the conference lead.

Track squads to host juco, four-year teams

JENIFER SCHEIBLER
Sports Reporter

Athletes from several universities and junior and community colleges will showcase their talents at the KSU Open track meet today and Saturday in Ahearn Field House.

The meet will provide the teams competing a chance to get the kinks out before their respective conference, regional or district meets, K-State coach John Capriotti said.

He said the Wildcat athletes will be doing the same.

"We're using this meet as a tune-up for the Big Eight Indoor," he said.

Although the meet is held one week before the Big Eight meet in Columbia, Mo., Capriotti said he expects it to be highly competitive.

"The athletes may not be competing in the same events they will be competing in at the Big Eight meet, but the competition will still be there," he said.

Along these lines, Capriotti said some of the distance runners will be competing in shorter races to get in some speed work before next weekend.

"It will be a good meet," he said. "There will be good people in every event."

The K-State teams have not competed at home since Jan. 19 and return to Ahearn with several indoor national qualifiers.

Fans will also have the opportunity to see several All-Americans and Big Eight champions compete for the purple and white.

Returning home for a meet will be a welcome change for the athletes who feel good about competing at home, Capriotti said.

"It's a lot easier when you don't have to travel," he said. "They will get to sleep in their own bed the night before the meet."

The field for the meet will include four-year schools KU, Nebraska, Oklahoma State, Southwestern Missouri State, Central Missouri State, Abilene Christian, Oral Roberts, Wichita State, Emporia State and Pittsburg State.

The meet will begin tonight at 6 p.m. with the two-mile run, one-mile run, 3,000 meters, high jump, long jump and the shot put being contested.

Rugby team deserves national respect

Rankings may not do team justice

Bill Lang
Sports Reporter

It's the day after Valentine's Day. I've just got to say this, and I apologize if I upset your stomachs.

My love for athletics knows no boundaries. Sounds kind of mushy, don't it? Well, to watch this particular team play — and just play for the sheer enjoyment of it — is really a treat.

Through the years, K-State has sported many teams that have made the national ranks. Track teams, cross country, men's and women's basketball. This team, though, may rank as one of the best of all time.

What makes these guys love a game like this, a game in which nose cartilage is not a valued commodity? Ladies and gentlemen, meet the Kansas State University/Fort Riley Rugby Football Club. In layman's terms, the group is simply the K-State Rugby Club.

Club sports at K-State have increased in the last few years. This University now sponsors a water ski team, lacrosse team, men's and women's soccer teams, rodeo, parachute and a number of others, including men's and women's rugby.

As of this school year, there are 11 club sports. Although each team does not represent K-State via the athletic department, they do receive allocated funds from the Student Governing Association.

The men's rugby team decided to forgo asking for funds for this year, instead opting to pay for most of the season out of their own pockets. What they have done on this very limited budget is only rise to the top of the ranks in the collegiate level.

In one rugby publication, which recapped the fall season, K-State was ranked fifth. This ranking, however, took place before the match with Kansas last fall. K-State ran over, around and through the Jayhawks, 21-0, and ended their fall season at 12-4.

Although the rankings for this year have not been published, they would probably end up at third. The top two teams in the country are Army and Navy.

Military schools practice five times a week, have top flight coaches and due to all their other conditioning, are in much better shape than most teams in the country.

K-State's standings, though, might cause an adjustment to training schedules around the country.

This team practices two to three times a week and can regularly beer seen in many drinking establishments around town. Believe me, I know.

Steve Jackman, club president, said the military schools are much better and larger, but K-State has the technique and speed to contend with anybody.

The fall record was good enough to qualify the team for the Collegiate Westerns that will take place April 6-7 in Lawrence. The winner of this tournament will go on to the Collegiate Final Four in Houston in late May.

And for those of you who are looking for possible budding stars in this game for men, keep an eye on the fol-

Rock star makes pitch at Orioles fantasy camp

By the Associated Press

After finishing next-to-last in offense last season, the Baltimore Orioles are looking for more hits. So why not have Joan Jett join the team?

The 30-year-old left-hander, better known for hit songs than base hits, spent a week at the Orioles' spring training camp in Sarasota, Fla.

"I always said I'd be the first major league female," Jett said, "but that didn't happen."

Jett was born to be a big leaguer.

Or at least she was born with a big league name — Larkin. She could have joined Barry and Gene in the box scores, but then she changed her name and sought fame in a different field.

Two weeks ago she joined 100 guys and three other women on a field of dreams at Orioles camp. Jett was born in Rockville, Md., and she caught baseball fever when she was 8.

"The first game my dad took me to see was a game in Memorial Stadium," Jett said last week in a raspy voice during a break in a recording session. "Jim Palmer was pitching against the A's and threw a no-hitter."

"I follow them religiously," she said. "I can't wait an hour after the game. I'm on a 'sports-phone' every 10 minutes."

Jett could not have been pleased with last season, when Baltimore dropped to fifth place with a 76-85 record. So she put on her No. 9, grabbed her Rawlings gloves and her cleats and headed South.

You would think a rock star would be used to being the center of attention, just like pitchers. But standing on the mound was a different experience for the 5-foot, 5½-inch, 115-pounder.

"Everyone's watching me," she said. "It's not like I'm not used to it. It's different when you're on stage and in your element. I have my band around me there."

"It was real ecstasy," Jett said. "I was really nervous to do it. Once you get out there, you're in every play."

Under the tutelage of former Orioles pitcher Moe Drabowsky, she prepared for the big fantasy game at the end of the week.

"You get so nervous when you're on the mound," Jett said. "You have to calm yourself down. Now I know why pitchers talk to themselves out there."

She pitched two innings, allowing two hits and two runs, striking out one and walking one. But only one run was earned.

Tuttle reservoir bald eagle winter refuge

More than 500 birds migrate to Kansas waters annually

BETSY HIDALGO
Collegian Reporter

A special flock of birds that comes to Tuttle Creek Reservoir each year for winter vacation does not quack.

Bald eagles come to many lakes and reservoirs in Kansas, including Tuttle, starting in November and leave in the end of March or April, John Zimmerman, professor of biology, said.

"The open water draws the eagles to Tuttle because they feed on wounded or dead duck and dead or alive fish," he said.

Chuck Bever, a biologist for the Kansas Wildlife and Parks, said when the lake freezes over, the eagles cannot get to the fish, so they go to the out-flow tubes where there is running water where they can catch the fish.

"At the north end of the lake where it is shallow, they congregate to feed where the dead, sick and dying fish and ducks are," he said.

A large number of bald eagles come to Kansas to stay for the winter, Jerry Horak, threatened and endangered species program specialist, said.

"There are between 500 and 600 bald eagles in Kansas living on reservoirs and lakes for the winter," he said.

David Rintoul, associate professor of biology, said there are a number of the eagles out at Tuttle now, but they will soon go back north to nest until next winter.

"There were around 70 at Christmas," he said. "I am sure that the number has not changed much since then."

Right now, there is a lot of open water at Tuttle because the lake is thawing, so they are harder to spot, he said.

The eagles have been spotted at all times of the day, but are most commonly seen at sunrise, Zimmerman said.

"The early morning is the best time to see the eagles because they wake up and are hungry just like you and I are in the morning," he said. Usually, the eagles nest in the north during the springtime, but one couple has decided to take residence at Clinton Reservoir outside of Lawrence, Horak said.

"At Clinton Reservoir, a couple has nested for the past two years and has had five offspring," he said. "Two were produced in the first year and three in the second."

Bald eagles do not start reproducing until they are about four years old and only have two chicks a year, he said.

The eagles build a nest in a dead tree over the water so they can have easy access to food, Horak said.

"The problem with the eagles ever nesting at Tuttle is that the dead trees in the lake are rotting and will fall soon so there would not be a habitat," he said.

There is also the problem of availability of trees by the water at Tuttle, he said.

Rintoul said no adults have been spotted during the summer, but young eagles have been seen flying around Tuttle during those months.

Alpha fraternity encourages public service, civil rights

JIM STRUBER
Staff Reporter

The Alpha Phi Alpha fraternity is one of the largest black greek organizations at K-State.

Tony Williams, graduate student in education and Alpha Phi Alpha chapter advisor, said the Alpha's have 114 under-graduate chapters and many graduate chapters worldwide, with almost 100,000 members. He said the Kappa Tau chapter of the Alpha's have been at K-State since 1975. Alpha chapters are located in the United States, Africa, Europe, Korea and the West Indies.

"An informal chapter is being formed in Saudi Arabia," Williams said.

He said the Alpha's principal goal is the promotion of public service. The Alpha's also identify strongly with civil rights issues and encourage black men to finish high school, finish college and vote.

"Go to school — Go to college" has been one of our traditions for over 60 years," Williams said.

Sam Darko, sophomore in animal sciences and industry and Alpha undergraduate member, echoed Williams sentiments. He said the Alpha's dedication to community service projects was their principal goal.

"I feel it's a great opportunity for me to help the community — this is our main priority," Darko said.

Darko said last Halloween they took some children trick or treating in Junction City. In December, they also orchestrated a clothes drive for the needy.

This spring the Alpha's will sponsor the 'Miss Black and Gold' beauty pageant. The pageant is open to every female on campus and the winner of the $500 scholarship can go to the regional and national beauty pageants and win additional scholarship money.

K-State has four black fraternities on campus — Alpha Phi Alpha, Kappa Alpha Psi, Omega Phi Psi, and Phi Beta Sigma.

Prospective members must undergo many criteria to be selected as an Alpha. The Alpha's request background and academic information plus the prospective member must be recommended by active fraternity members, he said.

Next, the active chapter votes on the perspective member. If the person is approved, they participate in a brief orientation period of 16 hours total. Once the orientation is completed the inductee is formally initiated in a secret ceremony, he said.

Once a person is initiated, they are a full member with all the rights and privileges," Williams said.

The Alpha's undergraduate chapter meets every Sunday in Seaton Hall where they discuss chapter business and update each other on personal and fraternity activities, he said.

Williams said alumni chapters are held responsible for supervising the undergraduate chapters. The area or state director of the Alpha's is responsible for approving their paperwork, grade requirements and prospective inductees.

The area or state directors send the paperwork to the national office in Chicago, Ill. The national office also updates the fraternity members periodically with a newsmagazine, he said.

Reginland McGowan, director of Upward Bound and Alpha chapter advisor, said the four black fraternities have many things in common and the same goals. They are also similar in many ways to the traditional white fraternities on campus.

"We are all dedicated to the same goals," McGowan said. "Our purposes are the same, we just have different letters."

Williams said dialogue between the black greek fraternities and the Interfraternity Council is achieving some positive results.

"One of the problems on this campus is we aren't perceived as part of the K-State greek community," Williams said. "However, we are now part of the greek literature that goes out to high schools. This will give a balanced view of greeks at K-State."

The Black Pan-Hellenic and IFC will participate in the Fraternity/Brotherhood exchange later this month. The Fraternity/Brotherhood exchange was basically implemented by IFC and Black Pan-Hellenic to expose each other to the functions and purpose of the different organizations. Fraternity members would spend a week with their adopted fraternity to exchange ideas and make friends, he said.

Veryl Switzer, assistant vice-president for institutional advancement and associate athletic director, organized the original Black Pan-Hellenic concept in the mid-1980s. This year they expanded this concept to incorporate all the black fraternities and sororities together and seek membership in the National Pan-Hellenic council.

The Greek Affairs office and Black Pan-Hellenic council are also working on incorporating all three greek governing bodies into one — The Greek Council, he said.

"A lot of ground work remains," McGowan said. "But the students agree that it should be more of an issue-orientated council that affects all the greek organizations, than a policy making council."

Jenny Barenberg, senior in secondary education—biology and Pan-Hellenic Council president, said that IFC and the Panhellenic Council have increased dialogue with the Black Pan-Hellenic Council.

Barenberg said she was optimistic that both black and white greek organizations could work together on many community and exchange projects.

"Before there wasn't a lot of communication. Now we are very optimistic — we have made a lot of strides. This will allow us to understand each other better, so there isn't a barrier between the two," Barenberg said.

Anne Butler, director of educational support services, said she applauded these initiatives. She is an active graduate member and past undergraduate chapter advisor, of the Alpha Kappa Alpha sorority.

"The opportunity to work on mutual projects and goals is certainly the right step. This might facilitate inter-greek cooperation," Butler said. "There is potential for striking down the cultural barriers between the two groups."

'Colored Girls' reflects society

Shirlyn Henry, Ebony Theater president, Tonya Holden, senior in business administration, and Charlotte Moore, sophomore in pre-law, rehearse 'For Colored Girls' in All Faiths Chapel Thursday night.

ANNE TATUM
Collegian Reporter

In the Ebony Theatre Company's upcoming play, there are no main characters — everyone is equal.

"For Colored Girls Who Have Considered Suicide When the Rainbow is Enuf" will be performed at 8 p.m. today and Saturday in All Faiths Chapel.

Shirlyn Henry is director, choreographer and one of the actors in the production. The senior in theater said she thinks this play makes a statement to society.

"It reflects all women of all races," she said.

The play centers around seven female cast members, all dressed in costumes of different colors. Six of the colors are found in the rainbow, except the color brown, which signifies the earth.

"The costumes and women are the set and the production," Derek Walker, junior in apparel and textile marketing and costume designer, said. "The actors portray colors and the colors reflect the characters."

No lighting and no formal set is used. However, Henry said it is full of music and dance.

"It's about women and their personal testimonies as they relate to their relationships with men," she said.

Lafern Watkins, freshman in theater, said each character has a different story to tell about how they have been hurt by a man.

The production is the brainchild of playwright and poet Ntozake Shange. Henry said Shange wanted to explore realities of different kinds of women.

Tonya Holden, senior in management, said she auditioned for the play last semester because she knew it would be a good opportunity and was a character she could play.

Holden said she advises the audience to come with an open mind and leave the biases at home.

"All men and women have encountered something in their life that has hurt them," she said. "I think if you pay attention you can learn something."

Henry said there are some adult situations and language throughout the play.

"This is not a play for children," she said.

Gulf conflict topic of classroom discussion

JENNIFER HOFFMAN
Collegian Reporter

Across campus many people show their views about the war. Some support the war; some support our troops, and some support peace.

Marlene Howell, instructor in women's studies, and John Exdell, professor in philosophy, are among the few who are "pro-peace" and bringing those views into the classroom.

"On the first day of class we discussed the war," Howell said. "We take time out every week to talk about the war. The war is an experience in the majority of the students' lives."

"There are two reasons I bring war into the classroom," she said. "The first reason is because in women's studies, we take seriously the experiences of women's lives and analyze these experiences from varying perspectives."

"The majority of the people in my classroom are women. When I asked the class if they knew someone on a first-name basis over in Saudi Arabia, 80 percent of the people raised their hands," Howell said. "I can't ignore reality and feel true as an educator."

"The second reason is because people want to maintain an air of normalcy or business as usual approach," she said. "I refuse to participate in the lie that everything is OK. We need to deal with the war somehow because we are teaching, learning and living in wartime."

Both Howell and Exdell said even though they don't agree with the war and bring their views into the classroom, the students are welcome to disagree.

"People are free to disagree with me," Exdell said. "I'm careful not to make my opinion an orthodox. Students who are pro-war do argue in class. They have their rights to their opinions, and I certainly don't grade on them."

Most of the students are glad for the opportunity to voice their opinions in an open forum.

"He gives us plenty of time to voice our opinion in class about the war," said Rob Hendrickson, junior in pre-law. "When we do have discussions, he asks us to cite our sources. He also offers alternatives to the arguments against him, but he doesn't force his views."

Howell said she wants students to take time to think about the war.

"I don't care if the students agree or disagree with me," Howell said. "I just want my students to do critical thinking about the war."

She said she welcomes students to have political views different than hers.

"She lets us talk about the war, but she directs how we are going to talk about it," said Kim Wyckoff, sophomore in English and mass communications. "She gives us a fair chance and is pretty open. Most of the contradiction is among each other."

A former student, who asked to not be named, dropped the class because she felt Howell pushed pro-peace views.

"I was afraid if I wrote a paper she wouldn't look at my opinion objectively," she said. "I don't agree with her opinion. I dropped the class because I was already foreseeing a problem."

Neither one of the teachers have yellow ribbons hanging in their offices.

Howell said by supporting the troops it's increasingly showing support for the war. "Flying yellow ribbons, I'm afraid, is a thinly veiled symbol of a loyalty oath," she said.

"In the last line of a Collegian editorial it said something like this is a way to express pride in our country," Exdell said. "Well, right now I'm not proud of our country, and I can't hang up a yellow ribbon."

"I'm not proud of this war because it's not being fought for a just cause," he said. "It won't have a just effect in the Middle East or in this country. So, I don't think the nation should be proud."

The soldiers aren't responsible and shouldn't be condemned for being there. He said the president, Congress and the people whipping up war fever are to blame.

A lot of people are politically illiterate and are tricked by the television and newspapers about the war, but they don't have to stay that way, Exdell said.

Howell said war is a personal thing.

"War will break hearts and war will break families," she said. "Regardless of any political views every citizen will pay for this war for lifetimes."

Both teachers offer their classrooms as a place to discuss the war. Their opinions are a part of the classroom and their views are just one angle.

"I've always told my students they can stand up and tell me I'm full of it," Howell said. "I may challenge them, especially to develop their critical thinking."

"Right now I have a flag hanging upside down because it's a symbol of distress, and I think our country is in mid-great distress," she said. "When our soldiers come home is when I'll fly it right side up again."

Persian Gulf oil spill threatens water fowl

Clean-up efforts slowed by military action

LAURA BIRRELL
Collegian Reporter

The oil spill in the Persian Gulf may be killing the water birds, but it is part of the war situation.

"Human casualties and destruction take precedence over (the) fate of birds," said Michael Suleiman, professor of political science.

People are environmentally concerned, but the war is the main concern at this time. The oil spill will be critical for the people if the oil affects their water supply, Suleiman said.

The spill could close down the desalination plants that provide drinking water for the Saudi people and allied troops, and clean-up efforts have been hampered, he said.

Right now the oil spill is endangering water birds and will remain a threat to them as long as the oil is present, said John Zimmerman, professor in biology.

The oil becomes matted in the feathers of the birds, and the birds lose the ability to erect the feathers. By erecting their feathers, birds control their body temperature and are able to keep warm. Birds with matted feathers will freeze to death, Zimmerman said.

"It is too recent for an accurate count of birds that have been killed by the oil spill," said Ted Cable, professor in forestry.

David Rintoul, member of the local Audubon Society, said the number of birds killed depends on timing since the Persian Gulf is a migratory stop for many birds.

Robert Robel, professor in biology, said this spill is not the same as the Valdez oil spill because oil properties from every oil field are different. The temperature of the water is also different. The warm water of the Persian Gulf will break down the oil faster than the cold water near Alaska.

The oil spill in the Persian Gulf is also larger than Valdez. According to Newsweek, the loading docks can pump out 100,000 barrels of crude a day, and tankers have leaked 3 million gallons. The Valdez spill lost 10.8 million gallons of oil into the waters of Alaska.

Wine label supports troop

DAVE MCCULLAGH
Collegian Reporter

Fields of Fair winery has issued a commemorative wine with a label supporting troops in Persian Gulf War.

The bottle, after purchase, is to be saved until the soldiers return home.

Tom Braddy, owner of Dorothy's Land of Oz, a gift shop in Fields of Fair located about 30 miles east of Manhattan, came up with the idea. Braddy said when he was in Vietnam, his father bought a bottle of wine and opened it when he returned.

"I'm just an old Vietnam vet trying to do something to support the troops," Braddy said.

Braddy said he had his 21st birthday while in Vietnam. Because they couldn't share a father-son toast on his birthday, his father bought a Willie the Wildcat commemorative bottle of wine and shared it when he returned, he said.

"I still have the bottle. It will be 20 years old this May."

Although Braddy said he didn't expect the idea to be so well-received, it has been popular and several people have sent copies of the label to friends and relatives in the gulf.

"It seems like everyone coming in knows somebody over there," he said.

Other people at the winery said they also have seen a great deal of interest in the new wine label.

"Sales have been going really well — people seem to love it," said Donna Kohlmeier, Fields of Fair employee. "We have had lots of support — people want to toast friends when they return."

This was the first commemorative wine that has been bottled at Fields of Fair.

"It's the wine that made us popular," Kohlmeier said.

Sales of the semi-sweet white wine are going well.

"I personally haven't sold a bottle, but we are sold out of the first case we got in," said Chris Alejos, employee of Rickel's McMillan liquor store.

"It's a fantastic way to support the troops," said Jeff Chaffee, junior in biology. "I'm going to buy a bottle because I have a friend over there, and I want him to come home safely."

Braddy said they have had one complaint accusing them of being war profiteers, but the rest of the responses have been positive.

"Whether you agree with the bombing or not, it's a way to support the troops," Braddy said. "It's a ray of hope, and I hope we get to open the wine really soon."

Officials discuss Margin funding

By the Associated Press

TOPEKA — Raising cigarette and tobacco taxes is one way to finance the Margin of Excellence program, university presidents and student leaders told members of the Senate Assessment and Taxation Committee Thursday.

However, tobacco industry lobbyists called a bill that would boost those taxes and dedicate the revenue to the MOE unfair and regressive taxation. They said it would require poorer people to pay higher taxes so the children of those more well off can go to college more cheaply.

The committee completed its hearing but took no action on the measure.

The bill, sponsored by Sen. Richard Bond, R-Overland Park, and 15 other senators from both political parties, would increase the state tax on a standard package of 20 cigarettes by 9 cents and boost the state tax on other tobacco products by 5 percent.

The estimated $17.7 million in new revenue the tax would raise would be used to fund the third and final year of MOE increased funding for state universities.

The rest of the tobacco tax revenue would continue to go into the state general fund.

Chancellor Gene Budig of the University of Kansas, representing the Board of Regents' Council of Presidents, said the first two years of funding for the MOE enabled Kansas universities to recapture their competitiveness in attracting and retaining quality faculty members.

Without the third year funding in the current fiscal year, Budig said, there has been regression.

"Unless we get the third year of the MOE we will slide backwards," Budig said.

President Jon Wefald said his school was able to retain 30 percent more faculty as a result of the increased money the MOE provided for salaries.

"We've been able to hire some of the brightest and the best in veterinary medicine," Wefald said. "In the last three to four to five years we have reversed the brain drain. By and large, the best students are now staying in the state."

Student body presidents Andrea Roberts of Emporia State and Michael Schreiner of KU also addressed the committee.

Roberts said failure of the 1990

Legislature to fund the third year of the MOE represented a broken partnership that resulted in a lackluster effort to complete the program.

Schreiner said as a member of the regents' Tuition and Fees Committee he voted to recommend tuition increases starting in the 1992-93 school year.

"I hope the Legislature is willing to make the same commitment that students have made," he said.

Lobbyists for Philip Morris and R.J. Reynolds also testified against the bill.

Colorado's Favorite

We're Colorado's Favorite Ski Resort for lots of reasons. Like more snow. Year in and year out, we average more than any other major Colorado ski area; almost 31 feet per year. That snow means consistently great skiing on our three interconnected mountains. We have the variety to excite any level of skier, from the gentle, well-mannered slopes of Vasquez Ridge to the awesome chutes and bumps of Mary Jane. We keep things moving with 19 lifts, including three quad SuperChairs. The new Zephyr Express will zip you from the bottom to the top of Winter Park in just 7 minutes. Families love our expansive Children's Center, and everyone agrees that we may just be the friendliest ski area in Colorado. For a great value on a Colorado ski vacation you'll never forget. Come Play at the Park!

Flag desecration protested

Veterans groups propose state resolution to Congress

By the Associated Press

TOPEKA — Representatives of veterans groups asked a legislative committee to endorse a resolution urging Congress to propose a constitutional amendment to prohibit desecration of the American flag.

The Senate Committee on Federal and State Affairs heard testimony from supporters of the resolution, who said they were part of a grassroots effort.

"Every poll taken regarding this issue has shown overwhelming support for a constitutional amendment," said Charles Yunker, state adjutant for the American Legion.

He said an amendment would allow states to pass criminal penalties for burning a flag.

The American Legion has named passage of a constitutional amendment to protect the flag as its top priority, Yunker said. He said similar resolutions are being introduced in the legislatures of the other 49 states.

However, Jeanne Littell, a 54-year-old Manhattan woman who said she always gets a lump in her throat when she sees the flag and hears the national anthem, told the committee such an amendment is not necessary.

"We're going to open up a can of worms," she told lawmakers. "I find it very distasteful, burning the flag. But I have great pride in the Constitution, and it has taken us a long way."

She said if people start tampering with any feature of the Constitution, they could end up tampering with the whole thing.

Sen. John Strick, D-Kansas City, a Navy veteran, said he was going to vote for the measure but wondered whether it would do any good.

In 1989, the U.S. Supreme Court struck down a Texas law protecting the flag from desecration, ruling that it was an unconstitutional encroachment on First Amendment free speech rights.

"From the Revolutionary War to Desert Storm, our flag has been the world's symbol of freedom," said Lee Stollus, Emporia, past state commander of the American Legion. "We ask that our flag be kept free from desecration."

He also said the value of any expression in burning the U.S. flag is outweighed by the offense it creates in veterans and people in the military.

However, Sen. Doug Walker, D-Osawatomie, said putting criminal penalties on burning the flag could simply encourage protesters to do just that.

"I think it may have the reverse impact of what we're trying to do," he said.

State Department denies Soviet charge of working to wreck financial system

By the Associated Press

WASHINGTON — The State Department on Thursday dismissed a Soviet charge that Western and Soviet banks had engaged in conspiracy to destroy the country's financial system.

"The story is a transparent effort by Soviet authorities to blame foreigners for economic and financial difficulties that result primarily from the Soviet Union's own domestic policies," spokeswoman Margaret Tutwiler said.

The allegation was made Tuesday by Soviet Prime Minister Valentin Pavlov, who said the conspirators, whom he did not identify, had been plotting to overthrow President Mikhail Gorbachev.

He said the plotters had planned to flood the Soviet economy with billions of rubles, but that the scheme was thwarted by recent monetary measures.

Ed Hewett, an expert on the Soviet economy at the Brookings Institution in Washington, said Pavlov was searching for a scapegoat because he got in trouble on his first major policy step, the sudden recall of all large ruble notes.

While rejecting Pavlov's conspiracy charge, Hewett said the grain of truth in the new prime minister's claim was that in the chaos of the present system, there are possibilities for Westerners to get hold of large chunks of rubles and try to do something with them.

But Pavlov, he said, is just looking for someone on the outside to blame. Certainly for Western investors it has to put a chill down their backs.

An American lawyer who helps arrange business deals in the Soviet Union agreed the claim of a Western bank conspiracy was groundless but added there is a lot of horsing around with rubles.

The lawyer, speaking on condition of anonymity, cited one case in which a Soviet bank was seeking a partner in a bank-to-bank deal involving 50 billion rubles to be exchanged at 20 rubles to the dollar. That would be a small fraction of their official value, which the state sets at about 0.62 rubles to the dollar.

"The charge is ridiculous," Tutwiler said. "It's counterproductive to stir up fears of foreigners and foreign banks. Such statements contradict other Soviet efforts to attract foreign investment and expertise."

She said that during Pavlov's tenure as finance minister, the government printed tens of billions of rubles.

Culp, Blair Hanneman and Scott Stroth — all started in at least 29 games in 1990. Hanneman was second on the team in batting at .323, while Culp hit .314. Culp and Stroth tied for second with 33 RBI.

"One thing you can't teach is leadership, and we have enough guys back who can give us that," Clark said. "We've only got four seniors, but we have several juniors who have played a lot, and that will help us."

The experience should also help in a strong schedule that features 19 of 60 games against nationally-ranked opponents.

"If we're going to take the next step, we're going to have to go in and play that caliber of baseball every day," Clark said. "This is our way of getting ready for that."

is principally the media that expects disaster — a 7-10 percent decline in business was expected. The decline is actually 3-5 percent topside overall.

"Only 730 families have left since the troops have been deployed to Saudi Arabia. That means only 6.5 percent of the families left. There are still many families here, and the family members and troops in Saudi Arabia should not be forgotten."

Wayne Jaecke, owner of JC Cycle Sales, said business is always slow in the winter, so it is hard to say what business would be like if the troops were there.

"About 48 percent of our business is Fort Riley personnel. It appears to be half of what it normally is," Jaecke said. "I will weather the crisis; we will just tighten our belts and hope they come back."

Jaecke said he thinks Saddam Hussein should be stopped, and the news coverage and the protests worry him.

"We created our own monster," Jaecke said. "We helped him way back then. The trouble is, nobody over there will be grateful when we liberate Kuwait. They will still hate us, different culture."

"Everyone's so upset with Peter Arnett, and they claim he is passing on Saddam Hussein's propaganda. They think he is a traitor. Anybody with common sense knows that it is propaganda," he said. "Do you think the United States isn't doing the same thing? It works the same on both sides."

Mary Van Winkle, of Jess H. Van Winkle Inc. Used Cars, said they started their business 27 years ago. Her husband and former co-owner died early last year, so she is now working with her sons, Fred and Victor.

Van Winkle said business has been slow, but it has picked up in the last couple of weeks.

Classic musical to be performed at McCain

By the Collegian Staff

McCain Auditorium will present the musical "Into the Woods" at 8 p.m. Saturday as a part of the McCain Performance Series.

"Into the Woods" is based on a book by James Lapine who originally directed the production on Broadway, and the music and lyrics were composed by Stephen Sondheim, said Richard Martin, director of McCain Auditorium.

Martin said Lapine combines four classic fairy tales including "Little Red Riding Hood," "Jack and the Beanstalk" and "Rapunzel" and creates a fifth tale titled "The Baker and His Wife."

The story hinges around the baker and his wife who can't bear children because of a curse inflicted by a witch. In order to lift the curse, they must take Jack's white cow, Rapunzel's yellow hair, Red Riding Hood's crimson cape and Cinderella's golden slipper, Martin said.

"The story kind of picks up where 'happily ever after' left off," Martin said.

Time magazine has listed "Into the Woods" as one of the 10 best theater productions of the decade and called it Stephen Sondheim's best musical.

Executions up since air raids

Last Kuwaiti report claims 200 citizens put to death in weeks after invasion

By the Associated Press

DHAHRAN, Saudi Arabia — Iraq has stepped up executions inside occupied Kuwait, killing 200 people since the allied air campaign began, a Kuwaiti air force colonel said Thursday.

Col. Abdullah El-Kandari also accused Iraq of adopting a double standard when it came to Iraqi vs. Kuwaiti civilian fatalities.

Iraq has strongly condemned the deaths of Iraqi civilians in allied air raids, but has remained silent regarding the deaths of scores of Kuwaitis reportedly killed by Iraqi forces since it seized the emirate.

"Saddam Hussein is allowing controlled reports to come out of Baghdad, but no photos or reports whatsoever have come out of Kuwait since the Aug. 2 invasion," El-Kandari said at a televised briefing in Riyadh.

El-Kandari said Kuwaitis in Saudi Arabia lost contact with the resistance inside Kuwait a week ago after the Iraqis apparently seized the satellite telephones the Kuwaiti resistance had been using.

He said before the links were cut, the Kuwaitis reported that 200 people had been executed in Kuwait since the allied bombing campaign began on Jan. 17. There was no way to independently determine how many people have been killed in Kuwait by the occupying forces.

Many of those killed had been held for months, El-Kandari said. He said 65 Kuwaitis were killed in the four days prior to the phone line being cut. Some of the corpses were left in front of their family homes for up to 36 hours, he said.

Shed destroyed by sudden fire

Cause under investigation

DAVID FRESE
Staff Reporter

Fire destroyed a shed at 309 Kearney Sunday evening causing about $1,000 worth of damage to the area.

Witnesses said the building, owned by Rex's Tire Co., was completely engulfed in flames before anyone could do anything.

"When we arrived it was totally involved," said Jack Roets, battalion chief for the Manhattan Fire Department. "By the time we laid lines out, the building fell down. This north wind really made that fire burn."

The fire grew so rapidly establishing a cause was difficult, Roets said. "Something like this goes so quick there's not much left for us to go on," he said.

One of the tenants of the house in front of the shed said there was not much to the shed itself.

"When I moved in this house, I looked at the building back there, and it looked so rickety I didn't figure it would stand — so I never put anything in it," Neal Bassett said. "As far as I know, it was pretty much empty."

Bassett said he did not think the building had electricity or fire hazards.

"I don't think there was any wiring in it," Bassett said. "I'm not so sure about that because I thought it looked so rickety I never paid any attention. When I mowed around it was the most time I ever spent near it."

Roets said he could not be sure whether this fire was related to a rash of small arsons in Manhattan over the past few months. But he also said the fire seemed suspicious and remains under investigation.

Manhattan firefighters douse a burning shed at 309 Kearney Sunday night. The fire caused $1,000 in damage and no one was injured. MARGARET CLARKIN/Staff

Vigil honors gulf victims

Sponsors attribute low attendance to Iraqi announcement

ERWIN SEBA
Staff Reporter

About 20 members of the Manhattan Coalition for Peace in the Middle East conducted a vigil Friday on the K-State Union Plaza for the civilian and military victims of the Persian Gulf War.

Talat Rahman, associate professor of physics and a coalition organizer, said the size of the turnout may have been due to the announcement made by the Iraqi leadership earlier in the day, which led many to believe that the war was over or soon would be over.

"I got a call at six in the morning from my brother ... I said 'What's going on?' He said 'Didn't you hear the news?' ... He said, 'Well Saddam Hussein has said he is going to get out of Kuwait.' And I said 'Yeah, but we haven't heard what the response will be,'" Rahman said.

"I was talking to some people and they said, 'Aw, come on, you don't have to do the vigil anymore, the war is about to end,'" she said.

The cold weather and the vigil occurring on a Friday may also have limited attendance, Rahman said.

"There are not that many people here on Friday," she said.

Believing in the possibility of a quick end to the war allows people to escape a confrontation with the ambivalence they feel about the conflict, Rahman said.

"I know it did do that to a couple of my colleagues this morning," Rahman said. "Somehow, when it's going on, if they don't agree with it, they would like to do something, then it is not always easy to get involved. Particularly when you are not being bombed."

The next activity to be scheduled by the coalition may not be a silent vigil, Rahman said. She may recommend to the organization it conduct a demonstration like the one it sponsored in January.

As the coalition members stood in the wind and temperatures in the low 30s, passersby craned their necks as they walked from Seaton Hall and the direction of Eisenhower and Denison halls to read the signs held by the protesters who all faced the Union.

Few made comments to the coalition members. Those who did expressed their support for the war and opposition to the protesters. ■ See VIGIL, Page 10

Faculty Senate elections to begin

MEREDITH JONES
Collegian Reporter

The first round of Faculty Senate elections will begin today when instructors receive nomination ballots for Senate candidates.

Mary Rakowsky, Faculty Senate secretary, said all faculty with the rank of instructor or above will receive ballots. The ballots should be returned by March 1 to determine the candidates for the final round, which will begin March 18 and end March 27. New senators will be notified by April 8.

Rakowsky said the Senate is composed of the eight colleges, the extension unit, the library and the general administration. It also has three representatives from the Student Senate.

Each eligible faculty member will receive a ballot and will be able to nominate eligible candidates in his or her unit, she said.

There are 83 current senators serving three-year terms. This year, 31 senators' terms expire, and their seats will be filled by newly elected senators, Rakowsky said. Senators are allowed to serve two, three-year terms and then must wait one year before they are eligible for election.

The primary election will narrow the nominations down to two per position, a total of 62.

Wayne Nafziger, president of the Senate and professor in economics, said it has two main objectives.

"First, the Faculty Senate determines course and curriculum changes on behalf of the faculty," he said. "Second, it works with administration in formulating University policies that pertain to faculty."

Rakowsky said the Senate is in charge of all academic matters. They approve all changes in classes or curriculum and handle matters that deal with faculty.

The Senate functions as a shared government between the administration and faculty members, Nafziger said. The administration legally has authority to make decisions, but realizes the importance of advice from the colleges in making final decisions.

The elected officers in the Senate are the president, the president-elect and the secretary. Nafziger said he learned a great deal from Jim Koeliker, professor of civil engineering and the president before him.

President-elect Ken Klabunde, professor in chemistry, will take over as president for a year May 14, when Nafziger's term as president expires, Nafziger said.

Nafziger said the average faculty senator spends four or five hours in meetings per month. Officers spend roughly one-eighth to one-fourth of their working time on Senate business, and the president spends 40 to 50 percent of working time on Senate business.

Nafziger encourages senators interested in becoming an officer to contact the Senate by early April.

Conference focuses on communications

BETH GAINES
Collegian Reporter

Future agricultural communicators from across the United States gathered at K-State to represent their schools and learn more about their industry.

"Communicators cannot be blind to our surroundings. Be aware of the world around you, go with the flow," said Fred Knop, editor of the "Drover's Journal."

Knop offered those words of advice to Agricultural Communicators of Tomorrow members while speaking at a banquet Saturday evening, closing the first K-State Communications Conference.

The conference, focusing on the future of the communications industry, attracted ACT members from across the nation, including participants from Ohio State University, the University of Missouri and Texas Tech University.

Friday evening, the conference opened at Valentino's, with a workshop focusing on future trends in publications. Jodie Slothower, instructor in journalism, showed examples of student and commercial publications that use new designs.

Student Body President Todd Heitschmidt welcomed the group to K-State Saturday morning.

A student-produced video gave conference participants a visual tour. The video included information and trivia about many of the buildings and programs on campus.

Participants gained insight into the different types of publications and the opportunities available to graduates in agricultural communications.

Hank Ernst, editor of "The Kansas Farmer," explained the differences between state and national publications.

"At statewide or regional publications, you need to have a diverse knowledge and not work yourself into a corner by covering only one subject or doing just one task such as writing or photography," Ernst said. "National publications such as 'Successful Farming' will let you specialize," he said.

Marine Light Armored Vehicle (LAV-25 family)

The U.S. Marine Corps is expected to be one of the first groups to attack if a ground assault begins in the Persian Gulf War.

The Marines main battle vehicle is the Light Armored Vehicle family, LAV-25, developed in Europe and produced by General Motors. This amphibious vehicle can be found in several different configurations, including an anti-tank weapon, an electronic command post and a recovery vehicle fitted with a crane.

It weighs about 14 tons, which makes it transportable by helicopter, plane and hovercraft. It can reach speeds of about 60 mph on land and six mph in the water.

U.S. says no time set

Pre-dawn battles end in 2 deaths from friendly fire

By the Associated Press

DHAHRAN, Saudi Arabia — The U.S. military said Sunday that no date has been set for an allied ground offensive in the Persian Gulf War, and Washington said it would reject any Soviet peace plan calling for a ceasefire.

In Saudi Arabia, American and Iraqi patrols clashed along the border in seven separate engagements between 5 and 10 a.m. Sunday.

During one pre-dawn skirmish, an American Apache attack helicopter firing Hellfire missiles destroyed two American military vehicles, killing two soldiers and wounding six, the U.S. Command said.

It was the worst friendly fire accident since Jan. 29, when a U.S. warplane hit a Marine reconnaissance vehicle during a furious tank battle along the Saudi-Kuwait border and seven American soldiers were killed.

Travelers reaching Nicosia Sunday gave vivid accounts of an anti-Saddam Hussein protest by up to 5,000 people in Iraq earlier this month. The travelers told the Associated Press demonstrators shot and killed 10 officials of Iraq's ruling Baath Arab Socialist Party who tried to stop the protest.

The demonstration in the southern city of Diwaniyah was the first against Saddam and his Kuwait policy since the war began Jan. 17, the travelers said.

British military officials admitted Sunday that a bomb from an RAF Tornado veered off course into the western Iraqi town of Fallouja during an attack on a bridge last week. Iraq has claimed 130 people were killed and 78 wounded when the bomb hit an apartment building and an outdoor market Thursday.

The British said the Tornado bomb exploded in a populated area of the town Wednesday, but they couldn't tell what damage was done or confirm Iraqi claims of civilian casualties. Their investigation was continuing.

Meanwhile, speculation continued about when the allied forces will augment their non-stop air attacks with a ground or amphibious offensive.

The French Foreign Minister, Roland Dumas, said Sunday allies have already set a date for the ground assault.

"We are on the eve of the pre-eve of the ground offensive for the liberation of Kuwait," Dumas said in a radio interview in Paris, without saying exactly when the attack would occur.

In another report, the Los Angeles Times said Sunday the United States plans to launch a ground and sea attack this week if Iraq does not surrender or agree to stipulations in the next three days. The newspaper quoted unidentified U.S. military officers in Washington.

The report also quoted a senior officer as saying the allies' month-long air war has cut the combat effectiveness of Saddam's army virtually in half. U.S. officials have said in the past that 50 percent destruction was their goal before sending ground forces into Kuwait.

The Pentagon refused to comment on the Los Angeles Times report.

"Heretofore, we have not made those kinds of predictions or disclosed that type of operational plans," Capt. Sig Adams said in Washington.

When reporters at the U.S. military briefing in Riyadh asked about Dumas' comment, Marine Brig. Gen. Richard Neal said it was false.

"No, there is no date set at this time," he said.

If a diplomatic deal is struck in the next three days, it will probably emerge from negotiations involving the Soviet Union and Iran.

Drug traffickers claim car bombing

BOGOTA, Colombia (AP) — Drug traffickers claimed responsibility Sunday for a car bombing in Medellin that killed 22 people and wounded 140, a radio station reported.

The bomb exploded Saturday near the bullfighting ring in Colombia's second biggest city as thousands were flooding out of the arena.

It was one of the worst attacks since the government declared a war on drug traffickers in August 1989.

The bomb was aimed at police providing security for the event, said Gen. Gustavo Pardo, an Army commander in Medellin, 180 miles northwest of Bogota.

Nine police officers were among the 22 killed, said Col. Jorge Ernesto Ferrero, the Medellin police commander.

Hospital authorities said the death toll was likely to rise because many of the wounded were in critical condition.

Mont Blanc ice avalanche kills 7

COURMAYEUR, Italy (AP) — A block of ice about 160 feet wide slid down the Italian side of Mont Blanc on Sunday, burying several skiers, authorities said.

Rescue workers recovered seven bodies, but other bodies might be buried under the snow, the Italian news agency ANSA reported.

The mass of ice split off a mountain peak and tumbled down for about two miles, crossing a ski trail and stopping just a few hundred yards short of a road.

Death of Contra chief investigated

MANAGUA, Nicaragua (AP) — An official from the Sandinista-controlled security police Sunday promised a full-scale probe into the slaying of former Contra chief Enrique Bermudez, whose death cast doubt on government assurances for the safety of other rebels who laid down their arms.

But a right-wing radio station blamed the slaying of Bermudez late Saturday on Sandinista sympathizers, some of whom cheered the news of the killing.

Officials said they had no suspects and no one immediately claimed responsibility for the killing.

Someone shot Bermudez, 58, outside his car near the downtown Intercontinental Hotel Saturday night then fled on foot.

Search for newsteam CBS priority

NEW YORK (AP) — Getting a reporter into Baghdad is top priority for most news organizations covering the gulf war. Not so at CBS News, where the goal is getting captured correspondent Bob Simon and his three-man crew out.

"Frankly, we've made a decision that Simon's safety — and by that, I mean all four — is more important to us than whether we have somebody there," said CBS News president Eric W. Ober.

Almost immediately after Simon and the crew disappeared four weeks ago near the Kuwaiti border, the network swung into action trying to locate and rescue the four men.

The first definitive report that Simon and company were alive came Friday, sending a wave of relief through the company. CBS said it had confirmed that the four were being held in Baghdad.

Teacher on trial for husband's murder

EXETER, N.H. (AP) — A 23-year-old schoolteacher goes on trial this week, accused of hiring three students, one of them her alleged lover, to kill her husband of less than a year and make it look like robbers did it.

Three teen-age boys have already pleaded guilty and are expected to be key witnesses in the trial of Pamela Smart. A fourth teen-ager is also charged.

The former media services teacher at Winnacunnet High School is charged with conspiracy to commit murder, being an accomplice to murder and witness tampering in the May 1 death of her husband, Gregory, 24. She is also accused of trying to hire someone to kill a 16-year-old girl, also a former student, who is expected to testify against her.

Gregory Smart was found dead in the couple's Derry condominium May 1.

2 1st Division soldiers wounded

Two 1st Infantry Division soldiers were wounded Thursday while conducting military activities in Southwest Asia.

Pvt. Travis Dennis, 22, of Lubbock, Texas, and Spc. Scott Gill, 22, Dallas, Ore., were assigned to Company D of the 2nd battalion 16th Infantry, said Mike Zucca, Fort Riley Public Affairs officer.

Zucca said the activities the two soldiers were engaged in were related to Operation Desert Storm, but he would not comment further. Zucca also said the exact details, nature and extent of the injuries were unknown at this time.

Next of kin have been notified, Zucca said.

The Adventures of a Bear Called Paddington

Stage One: The Louisville Children's Theatre

Tuesday, February 19, 7:30 p.m.
Stock up on marmalade! The mischievous bear from Darkest Peru is coming to McCain for an evening of zany (and sticky) antics that are sure to captivate everyone. Whether he's creating fine art with mustard and tomato sauce or roller skating on his front paws, Paddington will endear himself to you as he does to his adoptive family.

Director Tom Schreier notes: "These are the adventures of Paddington. Not on the grand scale of Indiana Jones, perhaps closer to E.T., closer still to you or me, celebrating the inquisitive child (or bear) in each of us."

With student prices only half of what the general public pays, you can have a cup of cocoa with Paddington if he has no other plans.

Kitchens Plus

Manhattan's "Fun" Place To Shop

IS FOR SALE!!

It is with very mixed emotions that I'm notifying you that I have decided to place Kitchens Plus and The Croissant Cafe on the market for sale.

My primary reason for this decision is to take advantage of a career opportunity that would take me out of the Manhattan area. In the process of making this decision, many people have advised me to keep this information "under my cap" and not notify the general public that my store is for sale. However, I have spent over 8 years building Kitchens Plus into what I hope you will agree is one of the most personal, service oriented businesses in Manhattan. You are more than just a "customer" to me, many of you are like members of my family. I feel you deserve to be informed of my decision.

It is my hope that someone with the desire to provide you with Manhattan's "Fun" Place To Shop will take over Kitchens Plus and it will continue indefinitely. Perhaps you or someone you know would be interested in purchasing Kitchens Plus and building on the foundation that my staff and I have developed over the years. If so, please give me a call.

In addition, I would like to let you know that an "Inventory Reduction Sale" will be taking place at Kitchens Plus for the next few weeks. Please stop in and see us soon.

Thanks for all your great support over the last 8 years. I can honestly say that Kitchens Plus has the finest customers in the World.

Thanks Again...

Don Carrel

Kansas high school students compete for advanced ballet scholarships Sunday morning in the Ahearn dance studios as part of the Kansas Dance Network's 4th Annual Conference. Elisa Lansdowne, #2 (right), of Wichita, won a scholarship for the Atlanta School of Ballet.

Dance conference showcases performance of various styles

DARLA GOODMAN
Collegian Reporter

About 250 people attended a showcase performance of dancers from around the state Saturday night in Nichols Theatre.

The performance was part of the Kansas Dance Network's fourth annual conference held in Ahearn Field House and Nichols Hall Saturday and Sunday.

The performances in all areas of dance, including classical ballet, modern, tap and social dance, were prepared by university and studio dance companies from Manhattan, Lawrence, Topeka, Emporia, Shawnee Mission, Hutchinson and Hays.

Showcase coordinator Dina McDermott, assistant professor of dance, said part of the success of the showcase is that it had such a variety of styles and provided opportunities for younger dancers to perform.

Terry Lindeman, senior in secondary education, performed in a piece presented by the Kansas State University Repertory Dance Co., and also served as stage manager for the performance.

"The hardest part about the concert was that each piece was given 25 minutes to set light cues and go over the dance," Lindeman said.

One piece had to be choreographed to fit the stage, he said, but overall the concert went smoothly.

"Some performers liked the stage and some didn't," he said.

Other attractions of the conference for the 126 participants included classes on a variety of topics, including classical ballet, modern dance, tap, ballroom dance, mime and Irish folk dance. Discussion workshops were also held on career options in dance and publicizing work at a low price.

The Kansas Dance Network held auditions for scholarships to dance schools and studios were held in classical ballet and modern dance classes. As participants learned the routines of the class, they were evaluated by judges on their sense of commitment, talent and where they are in their program of study, said Judy Chitwood, director of the dance program and on-site conference coordinator.

One of the young dancers who auditioned for a scholarship was Elisa Lansdowne, 14, from Wichita. She was awarded a full scholarship for a six-week session at the Atlanta School of Ballet this summer.

"I'm excited to go and study there," she said.

Renee Olson, senior in dance at Wichita State University, was awarded a summer scholarship in modern dance to the Martha Graham School in New York City.

Salome Solano, senior in dance at WSU, and Carey Wagoner, junior in dance at the University of Kansas, won work-study scholarships to the Nikolais and Louis Dance Lab.

Olson, Solano and Wagoner said they came to the conference for the chance to learn from other teachers and dancers.

Book sale to raise support for UFM

Needs of students, community met through annual funding campaign

MELISSA SMITH
Collegian Reporter

University for Man is accepting donations of books for its used-book sale through Feb. 28, said Linda Teener, executive director of UFM.

"We take all kinds of books," she said.

Barrels have been set up at most of the grocery stores in Manhattan, said Karen McCulloh, sale coordinator. The books can also be taken to UFM at 1221 Thurston.

The sale will be held 10 a.m. to 6 p.m. March 1 at the Manhattan Town Center in the concourse between J.C. Penney's and Sears, Teener said.

The sale is a fundraiser for UFM, she said. It raised about $1,500 last year.

She said this is the fifth year UFM has held the book sale after taking it over from the Memorial Hospital Auxiliary.

UFM has received about 500 books for the sale, McCulloh said, but would like to have a lot more.

UFM collected about 4,000-5,000 books last year, she said.

The sale usually has a wide assortment of books.

Teener said, mysteries, westerns, romances, non-fiction and children's books are popular at the sale.

Novels and paperback fiction sell better, McCulloh said, but a lot of the books would be good for students who are working on projects or term papers.

She said some of the books might be useful for the pictures in them.

"People buy books for a lot of different reasons," Teener said. "You can get them fairly cheap. A lot of times people in education will come look at them so they can use the pictures."

"(The book sale) has been very successful in the past, and it provides a nice service to the community both in terms of your own housecleaning and in being able to access reading material," Teener said.

The Manhattan Moms' Club is helping sort the books this year, McCulloh said.

She said UFM tries to do things with the good books left over, such as donating them to the book sale at Farrell Library.

Center helps students prepare for interviews

LORIE BYSEL
Collegian Reporter

Many people, no matter how many job interviews they've been on in their lifetime, still don't know how to conduct the perfect interview.

The Career Planning and Placement Center is presenting a program 2:30-4 p.m. Feb. 19 in K-State Union Room 207 and from 7-8:30 p.m. in Union room 209 on how to have a winning interview.

"The interview makes the decision on whether you will be hired or not," said Marcia Schuley, assistant director of the Career Planning and Placement Center.

The program will cover such topics as the ability to explain skills, enthusiasm about the company, the ability to answer problem questions, appearance and mannerism, and the opening and closing of an interview.

A short videotape of a mock interview will also be presented, Schuley said.

"We will also open up time for questions," she said.

James Akin, director of the Career Planning and Placement Center said they were expecting a good turnout.

This is to let people know how to have a successful interview, Akin said.

"This is the first time to do this program, and we don't know how it will turn out," Schuley said.

The Career Planning and Placement Center also has brochures from different companies explaining what they look for when interviewing a prospective employee.

Smoking, loitering create Union paradise

I do not smoke. I loiter. The two, however, are inseparable.

Late 20th-century America is a society based on loitering. The Union Governing Board's present Puritan push to prohibit smoking in the K-State Union plainly runs against the American grain. Plus, my mother says that it's a bad idea, and that should settle any argument.

The Union Governing Board will meet Thursday night to vote on designating the Union as a non-smoking building. Conventional wisdom among smokers I know is that the UGB will decide against smoking. Soon, persons wishing to smoke cigarettes will just have to find somewhere else. They can huddle around the entrances and set up a smoke screen, reminiscent of the underwater bubble walls Australians set around public beaches to keep out the sharks.

And sharks are what non-loiterers most resemble. Sharks don't have swim bladders, and are therefore constantly moving around. If they don't, they die. This may be the fear which possesses supporters of anti-smoking bills, such as the one UGB will be considering.

Smokers, however, are required by the nature of their habit to stop walking, search around for a smoke, light it, inhale, exhale, puff, puff, puff, tap the ash, squash the butt and walk on. And if the smoker pays attention to Miss Manners, the matter is complicated further, since prevailing etiquette suggests a gentleman or lady really ought to be seated while smoking. But either way, smoking requires smokers to stay in one place for a period of time, which means smokers loiter. In fact, smokers loiter more than any other subgroup of society.

So, you ask, why does that mean smokers should be allowed to smoke in the Union?

Well, my mother says places like the Union were created for smokers. Non-smokers don't need the Union. They might use it once in a while, for Union Station or for their 10:30 loaf of bread, but they are able to walk or drive to campus, go directly to class, and then go away without ever sitting down or leaning against a wall. But smokers, as I said, must stop every 30 feet so they can fire up another smoke. They need the Union and they need to smoke in it, just like people need to loiter and a place in which to do so. I'm serious. Smoking necessitates loitering, and loitering is essential to humanity.

It all comes down to this: people have a built-in need to loiter. Most human activity relates to loitering, except for the activities of Calvinists and Puritans, who still loiter in the privacy of their own dwellings. Consider these examples: War is nothing but the attempted acquisition of new loitering grounds.

It would be more sensible to eat while exercising, but instead we sit down and leisurely savor our food. Parents train their children to loiter in the form of afternoon naps. Traffic-control experts encourage motorist loitering by installing stoplights at intersections, and these are the same folks who run airports, which encompass vast acres of loitering space, including airport lounges, where people have been known to loiter themselves to death. Our whole society is centered on loitering; it is the foundation of our culture and our institutions.

And what happens if the UGB outlaws smoking in the Union?

First, smokers will congregate around entrances to the Union — the north, south and east doors. This will subject them to the extremes of weather, and will also erect a wall of smoke through which everyone else will have to pass. If the Unionists are concerned about second-hand smoking (an exaggerated tragedy), this smoke wall will ensure that the lungs of all comers to the building will get at least a first coat of smoke, and a second if they exit.

Second and worst, loitering in the Union will fall to an embarrassing low. Without smokers in the building, the entire atmosphere would change. People walking into the Union will immediately notice the humorlessness of the now completely safe air, and they'll turn around, go down to Aggieville and buy a soda there. The building will slowly become an empty shell, populated only by the sound of bad music from the dusty speakers in Union Station.

Rumors will spring up in schoolyards that the big, vined building on campus is haunted. And why not? No one will go in there for years. Eventually, the whole building will collapse like an old barn and nobody will even try to rebuild it. What would be the use? All because the UGB voted against smokers and loiterers back in 1991.

The behavior of smokers affects the behavior of many others. Many non-smokers begin loitering because proper manners dictate that one smokes sitting down. Groups of smokers begin congregating around tables. They inevitably converse, because they can't smoke every second and the silences would get awkward. Then, their non-smoking pals come and sit with them and are amazed at the high quality of conversation they find. These non-smokers begin to loiter regularly and grow to appreciate loitering for its intrinsic value, but recognize nicotine is the fuel.

Conversation and company, in order to succeed and prosper, need to be regulated by some sort of rule. I don't know why this is, but it's true. What better kind of regulation than the physically mandated pauses needed to light and smoke cigarettes? Smokers know the secrets of loitering. Non-smokers can only benefit from hanging around them.

Whether a person smokes or doesn't, the company of a smoker is preferable to that of an abstinent whining weenie. If you don't smoke, but hang around smokers, think of the benefits. You will outlive your friends, and maybe inherit cash or boats from them. If you do smoke, other smokers may let you bum cigarettes or a lighter. Everyone wins. It's a symbiotic relationship.

If the UGB wants merely to make a large change in the substance-use policy of the Union, they could follow the shining example of the University of Wisconsin Student Union, which sells beer for immediate consumption on the premises. In this, the members of the UGB would become heroes instead of villains and make the Union the bastion of loiterlust that it's supposed to be.

U.S. bombing of Iraqi shelter wrong from almost all angles

A frightening fact has emerged from controversy involving an air attack on an underground shelter in Baghdad Wednesday. The deaths may not have been a mistake.

Allied warplanes destroyed an underground shelter. Preliminary reports indicated 500 or more Iraqi citizens may have been killed in the attack.

In the five days since, the U.S. administration has called the attack site a military command center, not a bomb shelter. They have said Saddam Hussein planted the citizens there to make the United States look like the bad guy if Allied Forces destroyed the shelter. They have said those citizens of Iraq were being used as shields against U.S. attack.

U.S. officials have also said — with a cold military term created to dehumanize death — that collateral damage was only 164. Iraqi officials are sticking to their original claim of more than 500 citizens dead.

Few know if the United States had information concerning the presence of citizens in the shelter. And those few aren't talking.

The scariest part is we may have known the shelter contained hundreds of citizens, yet we dropped the bombs anyway. The citizens were inconveniently in our way.

If the United States did not know women and children were cowering in that shelter, then U.S. intelligence must be questioned. So much for high-technology surveillance systems.

If the United States did know citizens were present in the shelter, then the fighters should have held their fire. Regardless of suspicions the shelter could have been a camouflaged military bunker, the presence of unarmed women and children outweigh the importance of that mission.

The U.S. government should take care to protect innocent citizens — even when they are not protected by their own government.

Editor's note: This is the first of three editorials concerning the Allied Forces' bombing of an Iraqi bomb shelter Wednesday.

Brothers move

Editor,

Over the years there has been some tension between K-State and Fort Riley. Even now, in a time of war, there are still various problems between the institutions. I am writing, however, as a military spouse to thank some very special people at K-State.

I recently had to move from Manhattan to Fort Riley. My task seemed insurmountable because my spouse is currently stationed in Saudi Arabia. I asked a friend if he could help and not only did he assist me, but he also enlisted the help of his fraternity brothers. Thanks to their unselfish act, I was completely relocated in one day.

So, if you would, please thank all the young men of the Sigma Chi Fraternity — with a special thank you to Jarrod, Mike and Dewey, who volunteered their time to help someone in need. This just proves there are still caring individuals in this world whose unselfish acts touch many lives.

Charly Bledsoe

Smokers unite

Editor,

During the open session of last week's Student Senate meeting, several speakers addressed the resolution banning smoking in the K-State Union. After each presentation, the senators were given the opportunity to ask questions of the spokesperson.

In brief, those in attendance heard:

- 1.) A doctor from Lafene, the invited guest of the resolution's author, Derek Nelson. The doctor testified to the relative lack of risk from second-hand smoke due to casual, infrequent exposure, such as that in the spacious, non-confining Union.

- 2.) A non-smoking student, Rob Rawlings. He asked the Senate to not restrict the freedoms of students based on their (the senators') own personal feelings and beliefs.

- 3.) Myself ask the Senate to reject this resolution in favor of discussion, compromise and cooperation.

- 4.) And the support of about 25 students-at-large, who took the time to attend this meeting in hopes of protecting students' freedoms.

The evidence and testimony were clearly in favor of those who wished to see this resolution fail. There was absolutely no unsolicited support by students-at-large in favor of this resolution. The five premises on which Nelson's resolution was based on were logically, factually and repeatedly rebutted. Yet, the resolution passed.

So now we would like to ask a question. Why? Assuming for the moment that the Student Senate is actually a representative body, and further assuming some degree of accountability, we would simply like an explanation of the reasoning behind this decision.

I invite any senator who voted in favor of this resolution to respond in kind. If, for obvious reasons, you would rather not have your response published, please feel free to direct your answer to me personally.

War is slaughter

Editor,

War is the intentional mass slaughter of human beings. War is not parades, slogans, T-shirts, buttons and flag-waving.

War is the intentional mass slaughter of human beings. War is not tying yellow ribbons around stationary objects to show "support" for the troops. These troops comprise many of the human beings who will be slaughtered.

War is the intentional mass slaughter of human beings. War is not the sterile images and dialogue fed to the public through censored newscasts by our government.

War is the intentional mass slaughter of human beings. War is not middle-class children in attractive classrooms singing "God Bless America."

War is the intentional mass slaughter of human beings. War is not stimulating debates over lunch or analytical discourses after dinner.

War is the intentional mass slaughter of human beings. Until this stark truth is realized intellectually and emotionally, there can be no meaningful discourse on the purposes and duration of this gulf war.

Grace Kannady
graduate student in adult and continuing education

Pacifist misguides

Editor,

Regardless of my own personal views, I have no problem with Cia Verschelden's decision to pull her daughter out of the public school system, her stance on war tax resistance or her strong disapproval of "God Bless America." On the contrary, I respect her convictions as an advocate of pacifism.

I felt slightly sickened, however, by the last couple of paragraphs of the article, which concerned a little girl who was anxious over writing a letter to a soldier in the Persian Gulf who had no family ties of his own to correspond with. And what was the source of her anxiety? The knowledge of her mother's strong distaste for anything which might convey support for the war in the gulf or for the people involved.

It seems to me this could possibly be guiding little Patty to place priority on political correctness over such human values as sensitivity and compassion. I can't believe this is Mrs. Verschelden's intentions, but I find her lack of insight in this particular instance perplexing. Her rigidity seems to defeat the purpose of being a pacifist in the first place, which is to express concern for the welfare of all human beings, regardless of race, color or creed. And if I'm not mistaken, this would include young Patty's American soldier.

Reader responds

Editor,

To Margaret Schmidt. What is your problem? If you really are a graphic design major, then you should have taken some journalism classes by now. Are you really stupid enough not to know what an editorial page is for? Or did you remember only long enough to get your opinion printed on it?

Everyone is entitled to their opinion, and the editorial page is the perfect place to make it known. When you read the editorial page, you take the chance you are going to read an opinion you might not like. Writing a letter to the editor is the best response. Refusing to read the Collegian because of one writer is idiotic.

The Collegian can't refuse to print stories by Skoog or Seabourn. That's called prior restraint. Look it up.

Why don't you simply stop reading the editorial page? Then we wouldn't have to read your opinions about our generation. It's obvious you only care about your opinions or those that agree with them. If you want a newspaper that prints only the opinions you like, print your own.

Diane Hutchison
junior in journalism

Clubs to promote, participate in livestock show

SHANNAN SEELY
Staff Reporter

Two K-State clubs are organizing a livestock show featuring students showing University animals in Weber Arena during Open House, April 6.

The Little American Royal is sponsored by the Block and Bridle and the Dairy Science clubs, said Matt Lindamood, Block and Bridle president and junior in agricultural economics.

"It's a good opportunity to promote animal agriculture to all," Linda-mood said.

Student participants may show swine, horses, sheep, beef or dairy cattle. They start working in February or March, depending on the species, to get the animals ready.

The judging is based on how well the participants groom the animals and how well they handle them in the ring.

Although students do not need experience or equipment, they must pay $5 for expenses, said Brian Dunn, sophomore in animal sciences.

Dunn is vice-president of the LAR executive committee.

"We are not making a profit on this," Dunn said. "We encourage anyone interested to stop by and see what's going on (that day). It'll be free admission."

A mandatory meeting for participants will be held Wednesday in Weber Hall, Dunn said.

About 15 student committees are working on the event, he said. They have been meeting since September, sometimes as often as twice a week.

Each committee has a specific job. One committee matches animals with exhibitors by a drawing. They draw numbers out of a hat and that's the animal the student must work with, Lindamood said.

The LAR committee also hires judges, prepares the show ring, makes programs, sends news releases and cleans up afterward. They help participants handle the animals, he said.

Dunn said he wants the LAR to run as smoothly as possible.

"One of the big things about the LAR is it's a totally student-run activity," Dunn said.

The official sign-up has been extended. Interested students may contact him or Dave Nichols, LAR adviser and animal sciences and industry professor, before the Wednesday meeting.

Sarah Jones, senior in elementary education, showed a ewe in the LAR last year.

Jones said she participated because of her father talking about working with animals, like catching a calf, when he was growing up on a farm.

"I guess I wanted to prove I could work with animals even though I'm a city girl," she said. "It was a good experience, but I was very nervous."

While grooming, or fitting, her animal for the show ring, the ewe jumped off the fitting stand. Students experienced with animals helped her, and she asked them questions often, she said.

She learned more as a LAR participant than as a spectator. She said she acknowledges how much time and energy is involved, especially in taming the ewe down.

"It was something to be proud of, really quite an accomplishment," Jones said. "In the show ring, it was all up to me. I had help fitting, but it was up to me to present the animal."

Kansas center Mark Randall shoots over K-State center John Rettiger, who was back in the starting lineup, in the second half of the 'Cats 69-67 loss to the Jayhawks Saturday in Lawrence's Allen Fieldhouse. Randall lead all scorers with 22 points, including 13 in the first half.

Jayhawks win strange game

LAWRENCE — Strange. Strange indeed.

There was a pass by a point guard to a player checking in at the scorer's table. There was a technical foul called on a coach who hadn't had one called on him this season. There was a first-place team struggling to beat an eighth-place club.

Strange. Strange indeed. What wasn't so strange Saturday was the final result in a game that contained all of these rather odd elements: No. 11 Kansas 69, K-State 67.

"You have to congratulate them," KU coach Roy Williams said of the Wildcats. "Dana (Altman) had them ready to play, and at times they looked like they wanted it more and were more poised."

K-State won every statistical battle except the one that mattered most.

The Wildcats had better percentages from the field and at the line, hit more 3-point field goals than KU, and outrebounded the Jayhawks.

Persistence almost paid off for the 'Cats, now 2-8 in the Big Eight and 12-11 overall.

"Everywhere I went, they were right there with me when I turned around," Kansas guard Terry Brown said of the K-State defenders.

Mark Randall, who led the Jayhawks and all scorers with 22 points, also thought K-State's defensive effort was intense.

"Give Kansas State a lot of credit,"

Wildcat Notes

•Kansas' win over K-State was the fourth in a row.

•Kansas allowed K-State only four steals which is a season low for a Jayhawks opponent.

•Kansas tied a season low of five steals against K-State.

he said. "Every time we got the ball, they would be there and we'd have to shoot over their hands."

K-State, which showed the Jayhawks an all-out pressing style in the first game between the teams, threw the defensive equivalent of a ton of off-speed pitches at KU Saturday.

"I think they were completely different games," Williams said. "Out there, they pressed us. They didn't come out and attack us here. They wanted to take away our inside game."

In its attempts to do just that, K-State was whistled for 25 personal fouls, compared to just 15 for KU. The Jayhawks, now 8-2 and 19-4, hit 22-of-35 charity tosses. K-State had but 13.

The whistles — and lack of one in particular — led to one of the contest's strange occurrences. Altman was whistled for his first technical foul as K-State coach with his team clinging to a 50-48 lead.

J.C. Leimbach hit the K-State coach with the "T" when Altman stomped on the floor and moved vigorously toward Leimbach after a no-call inside as KU's Alonzo Jamison Either K-State's Mike Clark is a sandbagger or a poor judge of talent. It's also possible the Wildcat baseball coach is neither. But Clark wasn't bubbling about his pitching staff heading into the weekend's season-opening series at No. 7 Arkansas.

Despite only one win in three tries against the Razorbacks, Clark's outlook might have changed.

Senior Kent Hipp tossed a six-hitter in Saturday's first contest, as K-State stopped last year's South-west Conference champions 6-0. Sophomore Sean Pedersen duplicated Hipp's hit total in the nightcap, but Razorback pitcher Brian Cook blanked the 'Cats over the final four innings to win 3-2.

Arkansas captured another pitcher's duel Sunday, winning 3-2 in 10 innings to take the series.

"Hipp threw a great game," Clark said of his right-hander's effort in the opener. "He got tired, but he threw strikes and that's his forte."

Hipp, a second team all-Big Eight performer last year, took the mound with a three-run cushion after third baseman Brad Rippelmeyer homered in the top of the first inning. Rippelmeyer's blast came after Craig Wilson and Chris Hmielewski reached base.

Hipp, who struck out six, got more offensive help in the fourth, as catcher Jeff Ryan smashed a two-run homer. Ryan did not have a home run in 50 at-bats last season.

Hmielewski completed the scoring with an RBI single in the fifth. In Saturday's second game, Pedersen struck out five, but yielded a pair of runs in the bottom of the third to take the loss.

Cook, in his first start for Arkansas, gave up six hits, all singles. After allowing runs in the second and third innings, K-State failed to mount a game-tying threat against Cook.

Rippelmeyer and Hmielewski led K-State's offense with four hits apiece in the doubleheader.

"I think we played well both games," Clark said. "I was pleased with our effort. We came out against a quality ball club and did well."

The 'Cats lost Sunday's game after leading 2-0 in the fifth. Craig Wilson drove in both runs on a single to left field that scored Scott Stroth and Van Torian.

The Razorbacks tied the game with runs in the fifth and seventh, and won the game on Mark Johnson's single that scored Courtney Paul.

Dave Christensen took the loss in relief of Hmielewski.

King earns playing time, responds well at Kansas

DAVID SVOBODA
Sports Editor

LAWRENCE — Welcome back, Darryl King. Gonna stay around for good this time?

King, K-State's shot-blocking backup center who had been relegated to a role of high-fiving teammates as they came off the floor to join him on the Wildcat bench, re-emerged Saturday.

He scored 10 points and grabbed three rebounds in the narrow loss to Kansas, helping make a difficult year a bit more bearable.

"It's been a long year for me," King said. "It's been an up and down year."

Lately, King has been down a whole lot more than up.

Entering the contest with Kansas, King had logged just 57 minutes of playing time in the seven Big Eight games in which he had seen action. He had scored just nine points in conference play and had a five-game scoreless streak prior to Wednesday's loss at Colorado.

All of this from a guy who was named to the all-tournament team at the BMA Classic in Kansas City in December after scoring 24 points, grabbing 15 rebounds and blocking eight shots in two games.

So what went south? King's work ethic, Coach Dana Altman said.

"Darryl played hard and played well," Altman said. "If he continues to work in practice, he'll continue to play."

King's defensive ability has also been subject of intense scrutiny.

Assistant coach Jim Kerwin, who spends a great deal of the time King is on the court on his feet encouraging the 6-9 junior, said King has a problem with concentration.

"Darryl could be a good defensive player if he could just concentrate consistently," said Kerwin, who coached King's brother, Stacey, at Oklahoma.

Kerwin also said King was limiting his own potential as an offensive threat by committing a post player's deadly sin — putting the ball on the floor after catching it inside.

"He's had a habit of dribbling all the time," Kerwin said. "He's such a good shooter, we've tried to get him just to catch the basketball, turn and shoot. He did that today."

All 10 of King's points against the Jayhawks came in a span of 12:40 in the second half. There was the turnaround shot that has become a family trademark; there was a follow dunk. It was an impressive stretch.

"Darryl's got some ability," Kerwin said. "He played great in the BMA tournament, and in the poor games he had before today he was just making mental mistakes."

"I have to come out and play hard every game," King said. "And I felt real good and relaxed today."

Kerwin and King said another asset King can give the team, if he's on the floor working to his potential, is leadership.

"Darryl's a leader in this ball-club," Kerwin said. "He needs to focus more, needs to think out there on the floor."

King said his contribution could be vital.

"I need to be talking more and being more like a spark plug for other players," he said. "My personality is one where I can pick other players up."

King's play finally caught up with his personality Saturday, and the combination was a good one.

K-State forward Darryl King shoots over the Kansas defense, scoring two of his 10 points off-the-bench Saturday in Lawrence.

Slide by Lady Cats reminiscent of woes in fall from title contention during '90 season

David Svo-boda

Sports Editor

It's the same act, and it's getting a bit old.

For the second consecutive season, the K-State Lady Cats are doing an el foldo down the stretch.

And, also for the second consecutive season, the team that has arguably the best talent in the Big Eight Conference isn't going to win the league's regular-season title.

The similarities in the two seasons are alarming, really. Last year, under interim coach Gaye Griffin, the team lost three of its last five conference matchups after going 8-1 to lead the loop after nine games.

This year, under first-year coach Susan Yow, the team has lost three of its last four conference matchups after going 6-2 to lead the loop after eight games.

Why the late-season swoons? There are several reasons.

Last year, Griffin was likely the main culprit. Though exceedingly popular with players, she lacked the bench-coaching ability necessary to pull out tough league wins.

The three-point home loss to KU at season's end in a game that would have given the team a tie for the league crown was a perfect example. Griffin's use of her bench in that game — and the bench was a huge asset on that team — was next to atrocious.

The players should shoulder some of the blame, though. The group showed more faces than Eve at times, and Griffin was too much of a friend to call them out on the carpet for it. This season, Yow has no bench to speak of. Leah Honeycutt has provided consistent punch as the first player off the pines, but the five starters have played more minutes than they should have to this point.

This team is much like the Boston Celtics' squads of the mid- to late '80s — it's incredibly talented among the members of the starting five, but the lack of a bench forces those starters into playing too many minutes. Those minutes catch up with a team late in a year, and the level of play drops off sharply.

Yow's failure to give the five a breather every now and then has resulted in a team that is going through the motions right now, and very slowly at that.

Yow has left the team's best athlete, Sheila Cherry, on the bench virtually the entire Big Eight campaign. When Cherry has been on the floor, she's been dynamite.

Yow has used the word "chemistry" so much lately, it's hard to fathom. True, she needs her players to run the offenses and defenses she's put on paper for her crew to be successful. Maybe they're not right now.

But players who are too tired to perform to a consistent level of play and the word "chemistry" have very little to do with one another. You can play with incredible chemistry — check those Celtic teams — and if you're too tired, you're going to get creamed.

It's just unfortunate that this team doesn't have the veteran depth of last year's unit. If it did, given the fact that Yow is said to be a proven bench coach, it's likely that the 1991 Lady Cats would still be in the running for the league title.

If Yow's talented but sometimes moody stars weren't performing how she wanted them too, she could have put them on the bench at her side to deliver a message.

But this team doesn't have that experience beyond the starting five, and as a result, Yow has taken recently to saying that the regular season title is not as important as the post-season tourney crown.

Correct me if I'm wrong, but don't schools hang banners in their arenas and hoist trophies over their heads when they've won in the long haul — over the 14-game conference regular season?

True, the conference's automatic qualifier comes from the postseason tourney, but an attitude that holds wins and losses during the regular season as insignificant in comparison to the tournament is a bit alarming.

You figure it out. Several of us who have watched the talented athletes on this team lose out on glory twice have become too frustrated to do it ourselves.

Sports Briefly

Women's soccer team 2nd

The K-State women's soccer team went 4-1 and finished second in the Lincoln Girls Soccer Invitational over the weekend in Lincoln, Neb.

The team lost the championship game to host University of Nebraska 2-1 in the second five-minute overtime period. K-State played shorthanded after losing three players to injury in the first three games of the tourney.

K-State won four straight games to get to the final, and allowed just a total of four goals in those games.

The team defeated Nebraska-Omaha 5-0, Missouri 4-2, Iowa State 2-1 and Colorado State 3-1 before falling in the final.

K-State center Kristie Bahner knocks a loose ball away from Nebraska guards Meggan Yedsena, right, and LeeAnna Hiestand in the first half of the game Saturday night. The Lady Cats' 79-69 loss is the second in a row and fourth out of the team's past five games.

Colorado finally breaks Big 8 road drought

By the Associated Press

KANSAS CITY, Mo. — In a feast-or-famine week for the Big Eight, nobody gorged themselves like Colorado — or had more right to. Since Colorado had last tasted victory in a regular season Big Eight road game, the earth had completed eight full journeys around the sun. The long, dreary streak included 1-point squeakers and more than a few blowouts and had become quite the conversation piece.

It wasn't as though Colorado had never beaten a Big Eight team away from Boulder since that February night in 1983 when they won at Kansas. They had won at Iowa State when the postseason conference tournament was still conducting first-round games on campus sites.

And last year under a lame-duck coach they beat regular season champion Missouri while reaching the title game of the postseason tournament in Kansas City.

But they had lost 56 straight regular season Big Eight road games until Saturday. That's when The Buffs used balance scoring and steady free-throw shooting to post an 84-78 victory at Iowa State.

"It's finally over," center Shaun Vandiver said. "Now everyone can get off our back."

"We got tired of being asked about it," first-year coach Joe Harrington said. "These kids didn't lose all of those games. They lost some of them. Now maybe we can get on with the season."

While finally breaking their road jinx, the Buffs joined three other Big Eight teams going 2-0 for the week while the other half of the league went 0-2. On Wednesday, the Buffs (14-9, 4-6) had whipped K-State.

No. 11 Kansas (19-4, 8-2) had a shaky victory at Missouri on Tuesday night and then on Saturday maintained its lead over Oklahoma State for the conference title by squeaking past last-place K-State (12-11, 2-8) 69-67.

Lady Cats falter in loss to Huskers

BILL LANG
Sports Reporter

The late Billy Martin — a former baseball manager who would no doubt know — once said, "Everything looks nicer when you win. The girls are prettier; the cigars taste better, and the trees are greener."

For the Lady Cats, their latest loss leaves them hoping the grass is greener on the other side of the fence.

K-State — in losing to Nebraska, 79-69 — lost its second in a row and fourth out of its last five.

The Lady Huskers used size, strength and wholesale substitution to wear down the smaller Lady Cats en route to their victory.

"I thought tonight was one of the more physical games that we have played all year long," K-State coach Susan Yow said. "I thought that we fought hard and that it was a very intense game."

In the first half, Nebraska used an inside game that resembled a runaway freight train to lead most of the way. K-State rallied to tie the game, 32-32, at the intermission.

Karen Jennings — Nebraska's All-Big Eight performer — scored 10 points in the half. Jennings — who finished with 31 points — and her teammates were able to connect on 10-of-25 shots from 1-15 feet from the basket.

"We've been working on our defense," Yow said. "Especially our baseline defense. We've been working on it. Because if somebody gets the ball ... what do they do? They either score or get fouled. Nebraska did it almost at will."

Nebraska used 12 of 14 players to wear down K-State. The Lady Cats, in the last two games, had used their starting five — Diana Miller, Kristie Bahner, Jennifer Grebing, Mary Jo Miller and Nadira Hazim — for almost the entire game.

"We're tired," Diana Miller said. "We've basically been playing the same people everyday ... practices included, and that starts to wear you out."

In the second half, the Lady Huskers' train continued down the same tracks, as they were able to can 18-of-29 from that range.

One of the keys to the Nebraska win was the erratic play of K-State guard Mary Jo Miller.

For the game Mary Jo Miller had 10 turnovers; the most she's had all season long. Of those turnovers, the Lady Huskers converted eight into buckets.

In the second half, the Lady Huskers exploited the soft belly of the Lady Cats as Jennings scored 12 of their first 13 points — all of them from down low.

Yow also said the team was lacking a certain magic.

"We haven't had much team chemistry lately," she said. "We need to find that magic and find it pretty soon. If we find that, we're going to be tough to beat."

Yow still believed, after the game, the Lady Cats had a legitimate shot to win the Big Eight Tournament.

"We're still a good team," she said. "We're doing a lot of good things. Diana Miller is starting to shoot the ball well, Nadira Hazim is still doing the right things. We'll be OK."

"The intensity of this game is going to be the same (at the tournament)."

With the loss, K-State drops to 14-9 overall and 7-5 in league play. The Lady Cats travel to Stillwater, Okla., Wednesday, to take on the league-leader Oklahoma State.

■ CONTINUED FROM PAGE 6 stripped K-State's Darryl King. "I just disagreed with the call and let them know that," Altman said. "I didn't curse or anything."

But he may have been cursing when the game was over. K-State had a 50-45 lead with 8:03 left, a lead that evaporated for good when Adonis Jordan hit the free throws following Altman's technical to tie the game at 50-50. "I thought my technical might have turned it around," Altman said.

Jordan said it most assuredly had. "It was real big. It got the crowd back into it," he said.

A play that Jordan made just a short time after the technical free throws could have let K-State back into the game. Yep, he was the guy who launched a perfect, chest-high pass to Randall as he was moving toward the official scorer to check back in.

"It was stupid coaching," Williams said of the timing of the move to send Randall back in as KU tried to run some clock with less than a minute left. "I shouldn't substitute like that."

It was a strange game, but the result didn't surprise many. KU was favored, and KU won. The narrow margin didn't make any of the K-State players happy. A loss is a loss is a loss.

"We didn't come here to lose by one point, or even three points," King said. "We came here to win, and we didn't. So, no, I don't feel good."

Maybe he feels a bit strange.

The K-State men's and women's track teams competed in their last meet before heading into the Big Eight Indoor Championships next weekend.

Ahearn Field House was the site for the pre-Big Eight tune-up. The Kansas State Open was the event.

The meet began Friday evening and was completed Saturday.

Coach John Capriotti said he was pleased with the performances from the K-State athletes.

"It was a good meet," he said. "I'm happy with the way it ran and with the performances."

Capriotti said he feels his athletes are ready for the trip to Columbia, Mo., next weekend.

"The performances were about what I'd hoped for," he said. "This sets us up perfectly for the Big Eight."

Several Wildcat athletes shined among the field of competitors in their events.

Tyrone Watkins set a new Ahearn Field House and personal record for the 600-yard run in a time of 1:09.65, making him the third-fastest 600-yard runner in K-State history.

Watkins' performance drew praise from Capriotti.

"It was the performance of the meet," he said. "He looked really good there (in the race)."

Another first-place effort came from the 3,200-meter relay team consisting of Jared Storm, Jason Goertzen, Todd Trask and Marcus Wright.

The team steamrolled the competition to cross the finish line in 7:36.1. K-State miler David Warders turned in a time of 4:10.7 to finish second in the race with teammate Phil Byrne finishing sixth in a time of 4:17.0.

The Wildcat men also had two sprinters place in the 55-meter dash. John Dedrick placed second in 6.32, his best time of the year, and Ernest Greene followed with a time of 6.43 to finish fifth.

Dedrick also placed fifth in the long jump with a leap of 22-11½. Fellow jumper Eric Harland jumped the same distance to give him sixth place in the event.

A time of 7.80 earned Jerome Millet fourth place in the 55-meter hurdles.

Chris Tozier's heave of 50-10½ was good for seventh place in the men's shot put and pole vaulter Kelly Zart cleared a height of 15-9 to place sixth in that event.

The home crowd was treated to several solid performances from the K-State women throughout the meet.

The women took first-place honors in four of the six events held on Friday evening.

These victories came from the 3,200-meter relay team of Ellarie Pesmark, Paulette Staats, Laura Ost-meyer and Janet Treiber in a time of 9:12.6; Gwen Wentland in the high jump with a leap of 5-8½; freshman long jumper Dee Dee Tribue with a leap of 19-4¼; and All-American Angie Miller in the shot put with a heave of 48-foot-9.

A sweep of the top three places was almost completed by the K-State women, with Dione Singleton's second-place heave of 46-¼ and Shalele Stires' fourth-place heave of 46-2¼.

Golf team to open in interesting tourney

K-State's women's golf team will kick off the spring portion of its season today and Tuesday at Jacksonville, Fla., in the North/South Tournament.

The team finished the fall season with a third-place showing at the five-team Hawkeye Invitational back on Oct. 20-21, 1990.

At that meet, the Wildcats set team records for both single-round and tournament performances at 322 and 970.

K-State assistant coach Mark Elliott said the team wants to score below each of those marks all season long.

"Our team goal is to be competitive in every meet," Elliott said. "Our girls feel like every team we tee it up, we can have a chance to be successful. This should be the best season in K-State history."

The team hopes to carry its momentum into this week's competition. Senior Chris Adams completed the early season as the team's best scorer.

Last year, the team was led by junior Adena Hagedorn, who accumulated a stroke average of 82.3.

"I feel good about the way I've been playing," Hagedorn said. "I'm excited because I've been consistent. We've had several people im-Joyner picked up her second victory of the day by tying for first place in the 55-meter dash with a time of 7.04.

In the final event of the day, the 1,600-meter relay team placed first with a time of 3:55.76.

Wildcat Kathy Janicke produced a third-place finish in the triple jump and a fourth-place finish in the long jump with leaps of 34-9 and 17-10½ respectively.

Other K-State women placing in the meet were Verida Walter, fourth, (7.31) in the 55-meter dash; Renee Russell, fifth, (5:15.7) in the mile run; and Gwen Wentland, seventh, (2:28.6) in the 800-meter.

other Big Eight teams," Hagedorn said.

In addition to the three other Big Eight schools, a talented Wichita State team will challenge the Wildcats.

"We want to perform well to show the Big Eight schools and our in-state rival how good we are," Elliott said. "Wichita State and us should have an advantage on the other northern teams because we've had nice weather allowing more practice time."

The Wildcats have had two weeks of playing time due to the unseasonably warm weather. The team has been conditioning since the second week of the semester.

Experience gained in various career fields accompanies much-appreciated outreach

Volunteer work in Manhattan nursing homes provides opportunities to K-State students in community service, either for their majors or personal reasons.

Shelly Auld, junior in social work, said she is gaining hands-on experience for her major, but that is not what motivates her to do the work. "It can be really happy, really profound," she said. "It can be really sad."

Auld said the sadness comes when residents have trouble communicating or are depressed. She said the unavoidable possibility of the death of a resident scares her.

She began volunteering at St. Joseph Senior Community this semester, but has already made friends.

One resident was upset because her roommate left with the flowers that had been in their room, Auld said. She heard her crying and decided to meet her for the first time the next day with some flowers.

"I got a hug out of that," she said. "That comprehension and that understanding is wonderful."

Jennifer Modic, junior in marketing, said she and a friend volunteered at St. Joseph for personal satisfaction.

"We have extra time, so why not do something to help?" Modic said.

Modic works with Corinne Glessner, activity director at St. Joseph, organizing a ladies club that brings residents together every Friday to work on crafts, watch videotapes and just have fun.

Variety is important in the residents' days. Carrie Stanley, senior in marketing, and Meggin Finney, senior in elementary education, dance to a rhythm band with residents at Wharton Manor Nursing Home.

Stanley said residents like the activity, whether they can walk or are in wheelchairs. They also have made valentine corsages and given manicures to the female residents since they volunteered this semester.

Stanley said she decided to volunteer because this is her last semester, and she has a light class schedule.

Jennifer Boyda, director of social services at St. Joseph, said it takes work to relate to the residents. She said volunteers must be able to initiate things themselves.

Karla Johnston, activities director at Stoneybrook Retirement Community, also said those volunteering must be prepared to work.

"I emphasize that there is no pay-off for this job other than the realization that through a completely unselfish act they have brightened a day in the life of a fellow human being," she said.

Volunteers contribute ideas for activities the centers offer, Johnston said. She said the new ideas and new challenges volunteers bring in are well received by the residents.

"They're willing to try anything once," she said.

Richard Carter, junior in horticultural therapy, is beginning a program with residents of Wharton Manor. He teaches the groups of about 15 residents to work with plants.

He said the activity provides a change for the residents.

After volunteering at St. Joseph for three years, Beth Nelson, graduate student in psychology, said the residents have come to expect her.

"I look forward to it, and I feel bad if I have to miss one," she said.

Nelson is also working on a reminiscence program with residents at Stoneybrook who have memory problems. The program is part of her work on her dissertation in gerontology, the study of the aging and their problems.

In her work, she said she has residents remember their past and establish a chronology of their lives.

Programs provide small group counseling

LAURA BIRRELL
Staff Reporter

Students questioning career plans may now find assistance through a program on campus called Discover Groups.

"The Discover Groups help you in preparing for a career choice," said Bill Ogg, assistant director of the University Counseling Services.

"If you are wondering how to get from here to there, or where do I want to be," Ogg said, "the Discover Groups are small groups designed to assist you in career choice and planning."

Discover Groups use a computer program to find out what a student's interests are and what career may be best for them. There is a nine-step sequence that starts with a personal file.

The personal file evaluates the student's interests and lists possible careers that might coincide with the interests. The student may then shorten the list to what they are most interested in and can obtain a printout of information on these careers.

After choosing a career, students can look at education and training required to pursue that career.

The next step is to search for the school with the best program for the individual. The computer program has a list of every four-year and most two-year schools in the United States.

The Discover Group meets three times over a three-week time period.

Each meeting is about one hour. In between these group meetings students can use the computer based planning system. There will be someone to assist the student when using the computer. The results of the time spent on the computer will be brought to the scheduled meeting, so they can be discussed and any questions may be answered.

If the student is not happy with the results, they are free to go back and change the original input. Sometimes the self-assessment process can lead the student to a career he or she would not enjoy.

"The Discover program was used at a smaller college where I worked before," said Rick Marrs, psychology intern at the University Counseling Service center, "and I feel the program is the easiest way to retrieve a lot of information about yourself and your career. Accessing this information is easier by computer than using a lot of books."

Marrs said the process of searching for a career is time consuming.

"Although the Discover program will not solve all of your problems," he said, "it will condense and make the process more efficient."

Anyone interested in the Discover Group may sign up at University Counseling Services in room 232 of Lafene Health Center or call 532-6927. There is a $5 charge for unlimited use of the computer throughout this semester.

Film mix of terror, reality

ERIC MELIN
Collegian Reviewer

"You use Evyan cream, and sometimes you wear L'air du Temps, but not today," observes Dr. Hannibal Lecter as his eyes study Clarice Starling intently. Lecter, played by Anthony Hopkins, is a genius — a stark raving mad genius who kills without a second thought and then devours his victims.

"The Silence of the Lambs" delves into the bizarre world of serial killers and successfully redefines terror. The script, adapted from a novel by Thomas Harris, is essentially the story of a woman on the trail of a man who skins and mutilates women.

Starling, played by Jodie Foster, is a young FBI trainee who encounters sexism at every turn. Her superior officer, agent Jack Crawford, played by Scott Glenn, even goes so far as to leave the room when discussing the gruesome details of the case she's assigned to because she's a woman.

Seeking information about one of his former patients, Starling visits Lecter in the maximum-security prison he's been locked up in for the past eight years. "Buffalo Bill," as the press has named him, is a serial killer at-large. His victims are all women and he keeps them trapped in a pit before butchering them. Lecter seems to be the only link to Bill, and Starling strikes up an odd relationship with him. Her visits become more frequent, and she exchanges facts about her life for facts in the case.

Director Jonathan Demme, known for much lighter fare such as "Married to the Mob" and "Something Wild", has made a dark, harrowing film. He shows you the innerworkings of Bill without revealing too much and leaves a shroud of mystery around the character, letting the audience figure him out along with Starling.

"The Silence of the Lambs" maintains a suspenseful mood from beginning to end with brooding music, dimly-lit sets, and brutally real characters.

Reviewer says ...

"Brutal and terrifying"

Both Lecter and Buffalo Bill were created partly from FBI case histories of actual serial killers. Just having the knowledge that people like them really exist is, in itself, terrifying. It's also alarming how much of these murderers' motivation and intent is sexually oriented.

Having the main character be a woman makes this realization crystal clear. Starling has to endure sexual slurs from the other criminally insane prisoners as well as from Lecter. Still, their relationship grows and Lecter manages to gain respect for Starling.

Anthony Hopkins makes Dr. Hannibal Lecter a personification of the devil. Being a psychiatrist, he can understand and manipulate the laws of human nature effortlessly. Each word he speaks is calculated and clever. He is totally insane, but also totally in control of every aspect of himself. The authorities know he is extremely dangerous. When he's out of his cell, they put him in a strait-jacket with a mask covering his mouth and tie him to a cart.

Jodie Foster again plays the woman who will not be a victim. Like her Oscar-winning performance in "The Accused," she portrays a tough character who must overcome insurmountable odds. She avoids the tough-woman-TV-cop stereotype by portraying Starling as a real person.

It should also be noted for those who are weak of heart that this movie is very graphic. In order to get his point across further, Demme chooses to show reality at its harshest. He tries to make each victim live for the viewer, so as not to depersonalize the killings like a cheap-action TV show or a "Rambo" flick. This also includes several scenes of gore to accentuate the appalling subject matter and remind you this is reality.

"The Silence of the Lambs" is the scariest movie to come out in a long while. Besides bringing a little-talked-about facet of life to the screen, it's an incredibly crafted film. The story brings you in and shakes you up. The acting is so subtle it just enhances the possibility that it is real. Ultimately, it is a very disturbing and exhilarating experience.

Bowling leagues limit lane access

Priorities of student-funded alley questioned because of restrictions

STACY HILBURN
Collegian Reporter

The K-State Union, which was constructed and is still operated by student fees, was built with the college student in mind. There are questions by some as to whether the bowling alley in the recreational center puts students' interests first.

David Horsley, junior in radio and television, is not a serious bowler, but he does enjoy bowling during his spare time. He said, however, he's not able to bowl very often because of the lack of lane availability.

This lack, he said, is a result of bowling leagues.

Terri Eddy, manager of the recreation area, said there are leagues Sunday-Thursday. The only full days of open bowling are Friday and Saturday.

Jim Wunder, a student employee of the recreation area, said the fee to join a league is about $50. Each league plays three games a week, so the cost equals each individual game.

Eddy said joining a league is open to anyone, whether or not they are a part of the University community. These leagues are a guaranteed source of income.

Horsley said he understands how the leagues help the Union. He said they pull in money and create student activities. Those who can't afford or don't have the time to join a league, are left out.

The leagues shouldn't monopolize the alley, Horsley said, because the students as a whole should be the priority.

Wunder said he agreed the Union's services are for the student, and he said he sympathizes with those who are left out.

The leagues must remain in order for the revenue to come in, he said.

U.S. motives questioned

ULRIKE DAUER
Collegian Reporter

A panel discussion brought 50 participants to the Manhattan Public Library Saturday to discuss the Persian Gulf War.

Most of the withdrawal conditions of the recently rejected Iraqi proposal are in fact stated objectives U.S. policymakers have already expressed an interest in achieving after the conflict, said John Exdell, associate professor of philosophy.

He said most of the conditions are certainly reasonable as a point of departure for discussion and bargaining, but they have been categorically and scornfully rejected by Washington and by the press pundits.

"The latest U.S. rejection is part of a pattern: a refusal to use diplomacy even though there was an excellent chance..." Exdell said.

He said the fact that the administration chose not to achieve an Iraqi withdrawal from Kuwait through diplomacy would lead to the conclusion that this was not the real or only objective of the government.

Exdell said another possible goal could be to gain a permanent grip on the world's oil supply, and to control oil prices and revenues in order to restore international economic clout over European and Asian competitors. He said this has been a long-standing U.S. objective since World War II.

A triumph for diplomacy also would undercut the legitimacy of U.S. military interventionism in the post-cold war era, he said. The American people themselves could then demand steep reductions in the military budget which would mean the end of the United States as a military super-power.

T. Alden Williams, professor of political science, said, "My impression is, when the war is over previous issues will be as raw as they have been."

Williams said he was disappointed in the international organizations — the Security Council and United Nations — for failing to move on to a creative role, beyond simply acting as a "clearing house" or forum.

Ralph Titus, station manager and program director of KKSU, said he doesn't think the reporting being done on the war is very good.

"Sometimes we don't know what we are doing," he said. "Television is at least responsible for aiding to make the war popular. The Pentagon and the Bush government were greatly aided by CNN.

"But there's lots of tapes we didn't get to see," he said. "We have seen only the good ones."

Titus also said the TV-videogame aspect is a problem and also the responsibility of journalism.

"This is a war as entertainment," he said. "And television is going to play it."

Titus said KKSU still broadcasts the Pentagon briefing daily. But, he said he thinks people are at this point tired of war; people have called and asked him to stop covering the war so much and go back to the regular program.

The Persian Gulf War is a very media-controlled war, Titus said. The Pentagon already determined that the ground war will only be covered by media pools.

He said there will not be a body count in any coverage, which was the only way to keep track during the Vietnam War.

"Public opinion could stop U.S. and Arab deaths," Stan Cox, associate professor of agronomy, said.

He said it took the bombing of the shelters to discuss the fact that civilians are involved in the war, but people in the government considered the shelter bombing as a public relations problem not a human one.

Cox emphasized how many people along with Americans and Iraqis are affected by the war.

"There's more than one way of being killed by war," he said.

"It's never too late to withdraw."

Exdell cited a recent polling which said the majority of the American people now prefer a negotiated solution, even though there was a tremendous ambivalence among the public.

Kale Baldock, special student in psychology and member of the Manhattan Coalition for Peace, said he was encouraged to hear people bringing up issues that have been neglected by the mainstream media so far.

The panel was organized by the coalition and a second one is planned for noon Wednesday in the Union Courtyard.

The barn stored hay, farm equipment and the family's boat. No one was injured in the fire.

Commander's retirement from ROTC granted ahead of previous schedule

Selection of professor for early dismissal in compliance with budget cuts

LAURA BIRRELL
Collegian Reporter

Colonel John McTasney, professor of Aerospace Studies and head of the K-State Air Force ROTC program, will be retiring Aug. 1. McTasney's retirement is two years earlier than anticipated.

"McTasney is a very fine commander and a pleasure to work for," said Captain Larry Everett. "He has a lot of experience and motivates the ROTC cadets to become officers."

Despite the motivation he provides, McTasney is retiring early. He said this is because the military is cutting back the number of people now in the military to comply with Congressional budget cutbacks.

A selective early retirement board has been set up to make these cutbacks. This board's purpose is to select eligible officers for early retirement.

"The military is cutting the retirement eligible officers because they do not want to involuntarily separate people from the military," McTasney said.

McTasney is one of the 450 out of 1,500 eligible retirees who were chosen to retire early. McTasney will receive the same benefits he would have gotten after 30 years.

"I am proud of the Air Force and proud to be part of it," McTasney said. "I will always consider it my service. I think they are handling the cuts the right way."

When McTasney leaves in August he will have been here three years. Three years is the standard tour for a professor.

When he arrived in July of 1988 the Air Force was thinking of closing the K-State ROTC program because less than 17 juniors were in it. Soon after his arrival the Air Force decided to keep the ROTC program. At that time the Air Force required at least 17 juniors to be in ROTC, now Congress has taken the number of juniors out of the appropriation bill.

Although there is no certain number of cadets, K-State has 19 juniors and 95 cadets all together in the Air Force ROTC.

"Our ROTC program is doing well," McTasney said.

The program will remain the same when McTasney leaves. A replacement has not yet been named.

Before coming to K-State McTasney was stationed at the Military airlift headquarters at Scott Air Force base in Illinois.

He said his most interesting as-ignment was his tour of Vietnam in 1967 and 1968. During his tour he was a rescue pilot and received several awards. The highest is the Air Force Cross which is one step below the Medal of Honor.

This was awarded in a mission where he airlifted three people from enemy territory. He was also awarded the Silver Star, the Distinguished Flying Cross and eight air medals. He pulled 12 people from enemy territory and was part of several med-evacs in the Tet Offensive where pilots airlifted people from the Demilitarized Zone to hospital ships and the hospital at China Beach.

McTasney said working at the Air Force headquarters in the Pentagon for nine years was also an interesting assignment.

"Why don't you guys go home," said one man walking from Seaton to the Union. "OK, why don't you get out of the country."

One woman, who identified herself as a Canadian, told the coalition members that they were showing more support for Saddam Hussein than the United States.

"In some ways you're supporting Hussein more than you are supporting your own country," the Canadian said. "You did the same goddamn thing in Vietnam, and you're doing the same goddamn thing over again. And you can quote me on that."

and theater education and a coalition member, said a large turnout was not expected by the coalition.

"What we really set out to do, my understanding was just to commemorate a month of bombing, commemorate that there have been 70,000 sorties flown," Atchison said, "and just kind of remind people the coverage on the news has pretty much dropped back to on the half-hour or the evening update and many of us have gone about our lives as if nothing is happening and we're just trying to keep this in front of folks, encouraging thought."

The coalition has scheduled a panel discussion on the war at noon, Wednesday in the Union Courtyard.

rector for Kansas Farm Bureau, addressed the group in the afternoon about technological advances in the broadcast industry.

"Digital Audio Broadcasting, Radio Data Systems and High Definition Television are already in use around the world," Knipp said. "Soon that technology is going to make our current televisions and personal stereos obsolete."

Knipp also indicated the technology is not the only change being made in the communications industry.

"Agriculture communicators must understand what is happening in the urban sector in addition to the agricultural community," Knipp said.

The conference also included a workshop on how to get a job.

Melanie Mainquist, Farm Store Marketing Manager for Cargill-Nutrena Feeds, explained behavioral interviewing and what recruiters look for in an interview.

"To get a job, you must have the technical skill, a perception of the position and be a personable individual to get a job," Mainquist said.

Knop and Ernst were also questioned about the hiring practices at their respective publications.

Learning about the communications industry wasn't the only reason students came to the conference. Todd Yeager, senior in agricultural communications and public relations from Texas Tech University, said he felt communication between ACT chapters is important.

"We came to the conference to represent Tech. We are getting some new information on the opportunities available in the communications industry and will take that information back to the Texas Tech ACT chapter," Yeager said.

Blake Laceywell, senior in agricultural education at Texas Tech University, is considering graduate school.

"I've been thinking of coming to K-State for graduate school, this was a good opportunity to learn more about the programs here in Kansas," Laceywell said.

Darla Mainquist, junior in agricultural journalism and conference coordinator, said she was pleased with the weekend.

"We wanted to design a conference that students could visit with working professionals and get answers to their questions," Mainquist said. "Every student could take something home from this conference that will benefit them in preparing for a communications position."

7 soldiers from 1st Infantry injured, 2 killed

Big Red 1 suffers casualties caused by U.S. Hellfire missiles; incident described as worst friendly fire accident since Jan. 29

ERWIN SEBA
Staff Reporter

The Los Angeles Times reported two soldiers from the 1st Infantry Division were killed Sunday when a U.S. Apache helicopter mistakenly fired on a Bradley Fighting Vehicle.

Six other soldiers were wounded in the incident that occurred on the Saudi Arabian border with Iraq, said a spokesman for the Los Angeles Times.

The report, which was also carried in the Monday edition of the Manhattan Mercury, could not be confirmed by Fort Riley spokesman Michael Zucca.

"I'm not able to confirm anything on it," Zucca said Monday evening. He said the only information he had about the incident came from newspaper wire reports.

See related story/Page 10

Zucca said all information about casualties in the Persian Gulf War is released by the U.S. Central Command in Saudi Arabia. He said official word about the reported deaths and injuries to 1st Division personnel may come as early as today.

The incident was described in an Associated Press report as the worst friendly fire accident since seven American soldiers were killed on Jan. 29, when a U.S. warplane hit a Marine reconnaissance vehicle during a furious tank battle along the Saudi-Kuwait border.

In Sunday's incident, an Apache attack helicopter firing Hellfire missiles destroyed the Bradley and a M-113 armored personnel carrier.

Among the 14 U.S. military personnel killed so far in the war, 10 have been killed by friendly fire. Friendly fire is the military euphemism to describe incidents in which U.S. troops are mistakenly shot at by other U.S. or allied troops.

By the Associated Press

NORTHERN SAUDI ARABIA — Iraqi mortar fire landed Monday among armored vehicles of a unit assigned to the 1st Infantry Division, injuring a soldier.

The soldier, whose name has not been released, was part of a screening task force from the 2nd Armored Division, a heavy brigade-sized unit working with the 1st Division during Operation Desert Storm.

The task force was patrolling on the Saudi Arabia-Iraq border at about 8 a.m. when mortar fire landed. The wounded man was hit by shrapnel but not seriously injured. A second man was slightly injured in an accident during the mortar barrage.

Division artillery returned the fire, but there was no immediate assessment of damage to the Iraqis.

The outfit fired upon was the same task force in which two men were killed and six injured by fire mistakenly directed from an Apache helicopter Sunday.

Otherwise, Monday was more quiet in this division than the two previous days. Large artillery bombardments of Saturday and Sunday were not repeated.

In another development, a 1st Infantry Division intelligence officer said Iraqi prisoners of war have disclosed valuable intelligence to the U.S. Army, helping the allies in the dangerous game of deception that both sides play.

Lt. Col. Bill Moore said information from increasing numbers of Iraqi deserters helps the allies know the enemy better, recognize its decoys and traps, and fool the Iraqis themselves.

"I'm convinced they are telling us everything we need to know," said the 43-year-old commander of the division's intelligence unit.

"They are giving us a very accurate view of the morale of the Iraqi soldiers, their condition and also of the psychological impact of the bombing campaign," Moore said.

"The confusion in war is incredible," he said.

Gorbachev presents proposal for peace

By the Associated Press

MOSCOW — President Mikhail Gorbachev presented a secret peace plan to Iraq's foreign minister on Monday, and the Iraqi envoy immediately left for Baghdad to present it to Saddam Hussein.

Soviet officials, who are racing against the clock in what appear to be the final days before a major ground offensive in the Gulf War, said they expected a quick response from the Iraqi president.

The Gorbachev plan "envisages political measures which we believe were accepted with interest and understanding by the Iraqi side," said Vitaly Ignatenko, a spokesman for the Soviet president.

Ignatenko said Gorbachev planned to contact U.S., British, Italian, French and Iranian leaders to fill them in on his plan.

Gorbachev's peacemaking efforts followed a week of Soviet contacts with nearly every major player in the month-old war. The Soviet Union has supported U.N. efforts to oust Iraq from Kuwait, but has grown apprehensive about the extent of destruction to Iraq, a former Soviet client.

Both Iraq and the United States have warned that fighting will continue and possibly escalate if nothing comes of the contacts. U.S.-led forces were threatening to launch a ground war within days, possibly hours.

President Bush's spokesman said the Soviets gave no advance notice about the plan and hadn't disclosed its contents yet. "We intend to continue to prosecute the war," said Marlin Fitzwater from Bush's vacation home in Maine.

Aziz told reporters before departing Moscow for Tehran en route to Iraq that his 3 1/2-hour meeting with Gorbachev was important, cordial and objective.

"We decided to follow up those talks," he said.

Aziz will return to Moscow soon after discussing the plan with Saddam and his Revolutionary Command Council, Ignatenko said.

He called the proposal a concrete plan for settlement in the Persian Gulf through political means. He said it was "fully in line with the Soviet position that there should be an unconditional withdrawal from Kuwait."

Ignatenko refused to divulge contents of the plan and it was not clear what he meant by political means.

Crewman awakened by mine blast

Explosion creates hole below waterline, minesweeping operation postponed

By the Associated Press

A news-pool dispatch from the USS Tripoli said sleeping crewmen were jarred awake by a mine blast at 4:30 a.m. as the helicopter assault ship led a minesweeping operation off the Kuwaiti coast.

The explosion ripped a 16-by-20-foot hole in the forward starboard hull, 10 feet below the waterline, and flooded several compartments, the report said.

About three hours later, the USS Princeton, a 1-year-old, $1 billion Aegis missile cruiser struck another mine about 10 miles away, Neal reported.

Because that blast damaged one of the Princeton's propeller screws, the technology-laden ship was operating at 50-percent power, Neal said.

Four sailors on the Tripoli and three on the Princeton were slightly injured, Neal said. He said both ships remained fully mission capable.

The pool report said the Tripoli sat dead in the water after the explosion, while work crews struggled to shore up the hole and pump out compartments on three decks. The Tripoli normally carries up to 2,000 combat-ready Marines, but military officials indicated it might not have had a full complement on board.

On the ground, the close-quarters skirmishing of the weekend died down. But U.S. artillery fire and attack helicopters kept the Iraqis off balance along the front lines, the U.S. command reported.

Late Sunday, Marine Cobra helicopters struck six Iraqi armored personnel carriers, destroying two.

In Baghdad, air raid sirens sounded late Sunday and early Monday, and bombs fell on the outskirts of the city, but Iraqi officials said damage was light, Associated Press correspondent John Rice reported from the Iraqi capital.

An Iraqi military communique derided the allied air war in what sounded like an effort to goad the U.S.-led coalition into a ground confrontation.

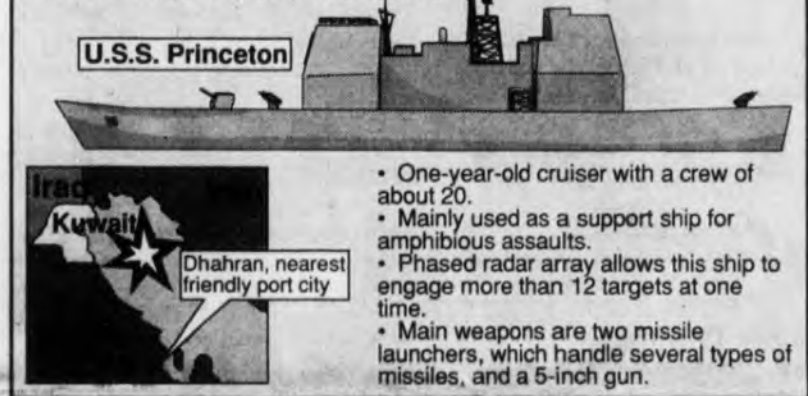

"The cowards continued to send their aircraft to strike from a distance," the communique said. The Defense Ministry newspaper, Al-Qadisiya, added that the Iraqi army is ready to make Kuwait "a killing zone and a graveyard for all the invaders."

The Soviet peace initiative looked like the last chance to head off a ground war.

Last Friday, Iraq's five-man ruling Revolutionary Command Council announced a Kuwait pullout plan with conditions attached, including a U.S. military withdrawal from the region, forgiveness of Iraqi foreign debts, and an Israeli pullout from occupied territories.

U.S. ships strike Iraqi mines

While on a minesweeping mission Monday, two U.S. Navy ships were damaged when they struck Iraqi mines. The U.S.S. Tripoli, a helicopter carrier, and the U.S.S. Princeton, a guided-missile cruiser, are still operational, but the Princeton lost one propeller screw and has only 50 percent power.

That proposal was rejected by Washington and its allies, which demand an Iraqi withdrawal without preconditions. The Soviets also dismissed Iraq's counter-demands, but pursued continued diplomatic contacts.

After Monday's Moscow meeting, the Soviet president's spokesman, Vitaly Ignatenko, said Gorbachev had presented Aziz with "a concrete plan for settlement in the Persian Gulf through political means."

Ignatenko gave no details, but said the proposal was "fully in line with the Soviet position that there should be an unconditional withdrawal from Kuwait." He said Gorbachev planned to contact Bush and other world leaders to fill them in on his plan.

Aziz will return to Moscow soon after discussing the plan with Saddam, Ignatenko said.

In an otherwise unconfirmed report, the German newspaper Bild said the Gorbachev plan calls for an unconditional withdrawal from Kuwait, coupled with a guarantee that no punitive actions would be taken against the Iraqi government.

UFM develops literacy project to aid homeless

MELISSA SMITH
Collegian Reporter

In 1988, one out of every 81 people in the Manhattan area was homeless according to a study compiled by the Manhattan Emergency Shelter, said Linda Teener, executive director of UFM.

"A large percentage of homeless are that way because of literacy," she said. "When you can't read, and you can't do math, you have trouble holding down a job and paying your bills."

UFM, in cooperation with the Crisis Center and the shelter, developed the Manhattan Homeless Literacy Project.

The project is in its third year, Teener said, and it receives grant money from the state Department of Education to work with adults who are homeless or living in temporary housing.

There are two main goals of the program, she said. The first is to increase the overall literacy and life skills of the homeless and those in transitional housing. And the second is to decrease intergenerational literacy by encouraging parents with literacy difficulties to become more excited about education so they can encourage their children to learn.

Michael Cody, instructor for the project, said most of the people start coming to the classes because the Department of Social and Rehabilitation Services (SRS) pays them $25 a month for transportation to and from the classes.

"After they have started attending," she said, "usually they will change over and see the need in their own lives."

Many of the people have never had success in the traditional school system, she said, so the classes deal with basic skills such as reading, writing and math in new ways.

Teener said the program is geared toward teaching useful life skills such as money management, nutrition and cooking and more effective parenting methods.

The program provides one-on-one instruction and small group classes at UFM, the shelter and the Presbyterian Church, she said.

"I stay away from a lot of heavy testing," Cody said, "because people are so afraid of tests. I try to do assessment in a very unthreatening way as much as possible."

The students then begin in an area where they feel very comfortable, she said.

"Each individual receives his or her own specialized learning plan," Teener said, "for what he or she wants to accomplish."

Sometimes this means working toward completion of the GED, she said.

The classes are taught slowly, Cody said, and in such a way that the parents can then help their own children.

A computer is available for computer-aided learning, Teener said.

"They come assuming that this is going to be a miserable experience," she said, "because it has always been miserable in the past."

Most of them have not received much encouragement, but the computer-aided learning software

Candidates voice opinions

Various issues discussed during City Commission meeting

LAJEAN RAU
Staff Reporter

Mandatory rental inspection, annexation of K-State and support for local businesses were discussed by city commission candidates Monday night.

The candidates voiced their views at a meeting of the Manhattan Landlords' Association.

The main issue up for debate was the implementation of mandatory rental inspection to bring substandard housing, often rented by K-State students, up to city codes.

All candidates said the majority of housing in Manhattan is adequate, but conceded some problems exist.

Some candidates said their goals for housing in Manhattan were the same as those of the Landlords' Association. The candidates often used a phrase from the group's newsletter, which says the landlords' vision is to provide a network of clean, safe and affordable housing for everyone.

"But a vision generally means you haven't achieved it yet," candidate Jim Dubois said.

He said the present education program is insufficient, and he wouldn't call the leaflet developed and passed out to prospective tenants a program.

"It was given out at table with all the other freebies — your bowling passes and other things. An education program means something else," Dubois said. "I'm a professional educator, and I don't just hand out brochures to my students and expect them to come away and understand everything."

Candidate Helen Cooper said she agrees with Dubois, and if rental inspection means housing units being inspected every year, she is not in favor of it.

"If it means that if there are properties that appear to be substandard, or there are complaints, I support it," she said.

The present program allows for this approach, coupled with the new education program.

Cooper said if the present program does not work this year, the issue should be looked at again.

Candidate Stanley Crowder, who cleans and repairs apartments, said landlords who violate fire and safety codes should lose their licenses.

"There are a lot of dumps out there," he said. "I was just in one today that was trashed out."

Educating landlords and tenants, as well as new landlords and prospective tenants, of their rights and responsibilities is a key.

Candidate Linda Ferguson said she thought there is a problem, but said she is not sure if rental inspections are the answer.

Kremlin proposes cutting subsidies

MOSCOW (AP) — Faced with a crippling budget deficit, the Kremlin on Monday proposed cutting subsidies on many basic goods and lifting price controls on about a third of retail items, from cigarettes to washing machines.

But other costs would remain stable under the plan outlined by Prime Minister Valentin Pavlov.

Retail prices are expected to rise 60 percent, Pavlov told the Supreme Soviet legislature. Wages would also rise to cover most of the increase, he said.

Allowing businesses to set prices would be a radical change for the Soviet Union, where prices have been set often without regard for production costs.

14-year-old charged with murder

LANDISVILLE, Pa. (AP) — A 14-year-old boy charged with fatally stabbing his parents and sister was persuaded to surrender by another relative after he had raped her, police said Monday.

Keith Weaver was charged Monday with killing his father, Dr. Raymond Weaver, 50, a physician; his mother, Anna May, 50; and his sister, Kimberly, 15, police said. He also was charged with the rape of the relative, a teen-age girl, police said.

Police were called to the isolated farmhouse about six miles northwest of Lancaster shortly before 8 p.m. Sunday and found the three bodies in two different rooms, Officer Lee Carpenter said.

The motive for the attack was under investigation, Carpenter said.

Miss USA files defamation suit

DETROIT (AP) — The reigning Miss USA will participate in this week's pageant in Wichita despite an $18 million lawsuit she filed claiming pageant officials defamed her and violated her civil rights.

Carole Anne-Marie Gist of Detroit spent Monday rehearsing for the upcoming 1991 event after arriving a week behind schedule.

The lawsuit was filed Friday in U.S. District Court in Detroit. "At this point, we feel it is without merit and we will defend ourselves against the lawsuit vigorously," said Steve Belgard, public relations counsel with the law firm representing the pageant's producer, Madison Square Garden Events.

Gist will take part in the annual beauty contest, to be broadcast Friday by CBS-TV from Wichita, according to both Belgard and Gist's Detroit attorney, Gregory Reed.

Oil well could pose contamination

TOPEKA (AP) — A proposal to inject saltwater into an oil well near the Smoky Hill River would pose an unacceptable risk of contamination to nearby water supplies, a Kansas Water Office spokesman said.

Stephen Hurst said the injection into the well in Ellis County could pose a threat to the Hays water well about 1 1/2 miles upstream. Another well south of the river sits on a terraced level and would not pose as serious a risk, he said.

Hurst's remarks came Monday, during the first day of Kansas Corporation Commission hearings on the proposal by the Allen Drilling Company.

Saltwater injected into wells raises the level of the oil so it can be recovered more easily.

Company officials said it could increase oil production in the area by 70,000 barrels over eight to nine years if allowed to use the water injection technology.

Panel to discuss college racism

Racism is on the rise on college campuses. The causes and solutions to this problem will be explored in a videoconference today from noon to 2 p.m. in Bluemont 16.

"This issue is important to all colleges and universities," John Steffen, associate professor of education and co-coordinator of the conference, said. "As campuses reach for more diversity, we encounter challenges and some backlash from this."

A panel discussion will follow the video in order to further explore the issue of racism in college settings. Members of the panel will include Jerome Friemann, professor of psychology; Mordean Taylor-Archer, assistant dean of the graduate school; and James Boyer, professor of curriculum and instruction.

Lecture to recognize history month

"African-American Culture: A Second Look" is the topic of a lecture to be given by Dr. Peggy Brooks-Bertram at 7:30 tonight in All Faith's Chapel.

The lecture focuses on a number of aspects of African-American culture that have influenced popular culture. The lecture is being given in recognition of black history month.

Brooks-Bertram is a former assistant professor in behavioral sciences at the State University of New York. She is an artist, poet and playwright who has had experience as an administrator, lecturer and performer.

"Most of her playwriting centers around ancient African-American civilizations. Her play 'The Dynasty of Kush' was performed at the first International Women Playwrights Conference, which was sponsored by the State University of New York," said Dr. Anne Butler, assistant dean and director for educational supportive services and responsible for scheduling Brooks-Bertram's lecture.

Mother has good days, bad days without son

Divorced women send children to ex-husbands while continuing with education

MARGARET BARNHART
Contributing Writer

From outward appearances, Mary Jane looks like many other K-State students. She wears blue jeans, tennis shoes and has a backpack full of books tossed over one shoulder.

Mary Jane, who asked her last name be withheld, smiles and greets friends in the halls. She said it is one of her better days — at least she can smile today. On her bad days, it's not easy to smile because her memories are vivid and feelings of guilt overwhelm her, she said.

Mary Jane is dealing with the pain of no longer living with her child.

She is one of a growing segment of a population of women who give their children to their ex-husbands in order to gain an education or a financial foothold. Mary Jane has open communication with her son's father and new stepmother and assurance that when she is ready her son will be returned to her. This situation is better than most.

Mary Jane sent Dan, her 10-year-old son, to Dallas to his father's home. The arrangement is formally for one year, but Mary Jane said she knew in her heart when Dan left that it would probably be for two years, long enough for her to get a degree.

"But I couldn't bear thinking of it as more than one," she said. "Now it looks as though it may take me three years. I don't know what I'm going to do."

Mary Jane said she has resumed smoking and is depressed much of the time.

"I cry at the drop of a pin," she said with tears welling up in her eyes. "Danny was reluctant to enjoy himself at first. I really had to let him know that it was OK for him to have a good time without me."

"Now, he's already looking forward to next year in football and school. I have plans to move to the Dallas/Ft. Worth area after I graduate, but right now I have to take it one day at a time," she said.

Since Dan left in August, Mary Jane has not talked with anyone about her feelings or about what is happening with him. She said she does not want to face the usually negative public reaction to mothers who are not living with their children.

"Even people who try to be kind can put their foot in their mouth and be unkind," she said.

Janice Norlin, a recent K-State graduate, also allows her children to live with their father, even though she has legal custody.

"They wanted to stay in their hometown — but what kind of life would I have if I had stayed there working for $5 an hour," Norlin said.

In order to get the college education and the financial stability she wanted, Norlin had to move.

Norlin moved to Manhattan with her daughter, Sara, who was eight years old. Her son, Andy, who was 13 years old, stayed with his dad.

Norlin made a room for Andy to come live with her later.

"I was really disappointed when he never came," Norlin said.

After several months of Sara crying each night for her daddy, Norlin said she gave in.

"One night I just broke. So I called him and told him to come get her, but I always thought she'd come back. 'I remember sitting there after he came to pick her up. I called work and told them I would not be in. I just sat there devastated, for hours, wondering what I had done wrong,'" Norlin said.

Since 1982, the number of women who are married or single and living away from their children has increased more than 100 percent, according to an article in Parents magazine written by Sara Hill, another non-custodial mother. This increase means an estimated two million mothers. Since 1970 the number has doubled twice, Hill said.

Linda Graham, of the Riley county attorney's office, said she agrees with these estimates. Graham said she feels economics is the reason for the recent increasing numbers of fathers with custody.

"Around 1982, the federal government started enforcing stricter child-support collection. When men started having to pay for the kids, they figured they might as well have them. They didn't want to pay the mother," Graham said.

Graham handles all the child-support enforcement for the county attorney's office and said she believes it is a societal myth that a woman can be freed by giving up custody of the children and later coming back to regain custody.

"This is very wrong. Plus, due to only 14 percent of women receiving alimony, many mothers are being forced financially to give up their kids," Graham said.

Norlin has researched and written on the subject of child custody and divorce laws, and said she believes strongly that women are being financially discriminated against in divorces agreements. This financial disadvantage, in her opinion, is a major reason leading to mothers giving up custody, she said.

"Stanford sociologist Lenore Weitzman found, in a 10-year study of California no-fault divorce laws that one year after divorce, husbands' standard of living increased 42 percent while wives', and therefore children's, decreased 74 percent," Norlin said.

"Another reason for custody going to fathers in Kansas is that in 1984, Kansas mandated joint custody as the norm. That year, male judges made up for lost time by awarding custody to men a majority of the time, if they contested at all," Norlin said.

According to the "Women's Advocate," men have requested custody in only 10 percent of divorces. That means 90 percent of the cases go uncontested and the mother retains custody.

Historically, this has not been the case.

Before the early 1900s, children and wives were considered the property of the husband. The only instances in which a woman gained custody of her children was if her husband gave her the children and financial support or if he claimed the children were not his.

Even if the father died, there was no guarantee the mother would win custody over the state, especially if the mother was poor.

From 1900 to the 1960s, the importance of the mother to the children multiplied. The Industrial Revolution, the social problem of desertion by men, war and the rise of women's rights placed women as family caretakers, said Geoffrey Grief, author of "Mothers Without Custody."

Whether the children were given voluntarily or forcibly taken away makes no difference. The agony and self-doubt remains for years — sometimes a lifetime.

Norlin's son is now in college and has initiated improved contact with his mother. Norlin's daughter is not likely to come live with her mother.

In the case of Mary Jane, she said there is a good chance she will be reunited with her son fairly soon — if his father still agrees in a year or two.

Mary Jane still contacts Dan frequently by phone and mail.

"Kids are your life. Then when they are gone, you have to change your whole life's focus. I went from a caring and nurturing mother to an empty house. He even took my cat," Mary Jane said.

War toy sales unchanged; conflict affects stores little

DAVID FRESE
Staff Reporter

A small boy at Kay-Bee Toys in Manhattan Town Center pointed up at the toy guns on a rack above him Monday.

"Mommy, look," he said, "a Desert Shield gun."

"Yes," the mother said patronizingly. "Let's go."

The assistant manager at the store would not comment on the sale of war toys. He said the home office had instructed him not to make a statement.

But the toys were there — a Desert Shield rocket launcher that fired tiny red darts and a Desert Shield grease gun that was battery powered and made "realistic" noises.

Across the highway at Wal-

Mart, toy department manager Sara Switzer said she had not noticed that sales of war toys had increased or decreased.

"Actually it hasn't changed much," she said. "They really haven't picked up."

Switzer also said the only toys the store had even received that were remotely connected to Desert Shield/Storm were some toy armored vehicles painted in desert camouflage.

"They really took off but other than that, from what I've seen, it really hasn't picked up that much."

Plastic stuff tends to sell pretty well anyway, Switzer said, and she said she was not sure if it was the brown paint that sold them or the fact that the vehicles were just different than what was out at the time.

"A little of it probably had to do with kids wanting the vehicle that daddy drives," she said. "But I haven't had a huge onslaught of people wanting that type of stuff."

Alco manager Ed Freshnack said toys such as guns have not increased much in sales, but model planes such as the F-15 and the F-16 have increased significantly.

"We don't carry replicas of the guns they're using over there," Freshnack said. "We mostly have water guns and things like that."

Freshnack said some of the things he thought would have taken off with the advent of war are not as popular as he had expected.

"Surprisingly, there hasn't been a lot of interest in GI Joe like I personally thought there would be," he said. "We just haven't seen that big of an increase in toys."

Organization plans spring reading

CINDY BRIGGS
Collegian Reporter

The Playwright Stage, a K-State advanced creative writing organization, will have its first spring staged reading 2 p.m., Feb. 24 in the Purple Masque Theatre.

The organization formed last spring because of the many student playwrights who had written scripts at a level deserving an audience, said Steph Cox, graduate student in English.

"Basically, it's for the playwrights to tell how they should further revise it," she said.

A staged reading is not a full performance play, Cox said. There are no memorized lines, rehearsals months ahead of time or dress rehearsals. Instead, there is one week of practice and, during the performance, the players read from the script. Costumes and stage props are used at a minimum.

Following the performance the audience is invited to stay and enter into discussion concerning the script.

"After each performance there will be a discussion led by one of the professors. They will discuss what worked and what didn't work in the play," Cox said.

The performances will begin Feb. 24 and will continue throughout the semester. They will be held in either the Purple Masque Theatre or Nichols Hall and will start at 2 p.m. Admission is free.

7 Vietnamese suspected of robberies, shootings

By the Associated Press

WHEAT RIDGE, Colo. — Five men and two women — all Vietnamese — were being held in a Kansas jail Monday under suspicion in a weekend robbery and shooting at a Vietnamese Catholic church, officials said.

The group, driving in two cars, was stopped by a Kansas Highway Patrol officer Sunday morning for driving in excess of 90 mph, Jones said. After running a check on driver's licenses, one of the men, Hoang Nguyen, 20, was found to be wanted by Houston authorities for a Feb. 8 robbery and shooting at a residence there.

One member of the group had provided some information in regards to the shooting and robbery at the church, said Randall Jones, Colby chief of police.

"He was supposedly armed and dangerous," Jones said. The seven were being held at the Thomas County Law Enforcement Center in Colby. Jones said diamond rings, gold jewelry and money were found in the car. A red ski mask and four handguns were found under the hood of one of the cars, tucked into an engine part, he said.

The jewelry, some with initials and names inscribed, matched the description of some taken during the church robbery, Jones said.

Wheat Ridge police were en route to Colby Monday afternoon to investigate, said Peggy Rowlett, a spokeswoman of the Wheat Ridge Police Department.

A gang of Asian gunmen stormed the Queen of Vietnamese Martyrs Catholic Church just after midnight Saturday, shot a handyman and robbed about 30 members. Parishioners were cleaning up after a Vietnamese new year's celebration.

The other six being held by Kansas authorities Monday were: Tai Kim Pham, 22, of Denver; Vinh Tran Nguyen, 20, of Houston; Khai Kinh Nguyen, 20, Houston; Tam Hoang Nguyen, 18, Houston.

The two women were identified as Lily Nguyen, 20, of Houston, the wife of Hoang Nguyen; and Joo Yum Baek, 19, of Pasadena, Texas.

Abortion bill passed

House sends bill to Maryland governor

By the Associated Press

ANNAPOLIS, Md. — A bill that would protect a woman's right to abortion in the event Roe v. Wade is overturned won final passage Monday in the Maryland Legislature, ending intense lobbying and a yearlong battle.

The House approved the bill on a vote of 84-52 and sent the measure to Gov. William Donald Schaefer, who was expected to make it law later Monday.

A proposed, anti-abortion amendment to bar lawsuits against people who refuse to refer patients for an abortion was rejected on a vote of 61-73.

The bill already contained a provision barring such suits. It also includes a parental-notification provision, but it is one doctors may opt to ignore.

In the hours leading up to the House session, lobbyists for the Roman Catholic Church and other anti-abortion groups sought support for the amendment, which would have sent the measure back to the Senate.

The Senate approved the bill Feb. 11 on a vote of 29-18.

The bill was at the center of a year-long legislative fight over attempts by pro-choice legislators to write into Maryland law key elements of the U.S. Supreme Court's Roe v. Wade decision. The move was launched in response to indications the high court might reverse the Roe ruling.

Both houses of the Legislature are heavily dominated by Democrats and have tended to be pro-choice on abortion in recent years. Last year, an abortion rights bill was killed by a filibuster in the Senate after the bill's supporters failed by just one vote to get a two-thirds majority to cut off debate.

The pro-choice bill grants adult women unrestricted access to abortions up to the time when a fetus is able to survive outside the womb. After that, abortions could be performed only to protect a woman's health or in cases where the fetus is deformed.

The measure also includes what both sides agree is a weak parental-notification clause. It requires at least one parent to be notified when an underage girl seeks an abortion. Doctors would be allowed to ignore the requirement if they deemed it to be in the best interests of the girl.

"Only Connecticut has passed a pro-choice bill since Webster," said Delegate Samuel I. Rosenberg, D-Baltimore, referring to a U.S. Supreme Court decision in 1989 that allowed states to restrict access to abortions.

Karyn Strickler, director of the state chapter of the National Abortion Rights Action League, described the measure as a step backward. She complained the parental-notification provision could force some teenagers into risking illegal abortions.

EDITORIAL

Rejection did not daunt other successes

For lo, I am rejected, a morsel of humanity unwanted by the highest. Most likely, I'll go to my grave unwept, unhonored and unsung. Yes, I'm crushed.

The cause of such melancholiness? Such dismay, such unhappiness, such low self-esteem? (No, I didn't swallow a thesaurus.) I have been rejected, turned away, not admitted to Harvard Law School. Never mind that Georgetown, Duke and Notre Dame have seen fit to invite me to join their numbers. Harvard, highest of highest, holiest of holies, hath turned me down flat. So, with tongue firmly in cheek, I must seek out the grievous fault that led them to conclude that I was too lowly a peon to join their lofty ranks. In short, I ask, "Why the hell not?"

Okay, dammit, this is a warning to everyone. Had I known, I would have worked a little harder in accounting class, read a little more of boring statistics, maybe even gone to P.E. lecture once in a while. But would it have helped? Would one more grade-point-average point on the mighty four-point scale have pushed me over the edge? Perhaps not.

Harvard, oh Harvard, why hast thou forsaken me? Were my numbers too low? Did the liquid paper marks on the form turn you off completely? Did a signature analysis inform you that I was too flighty to truly fit in at Harvard Law? Or was my essay perhaps a bit too (gasp) flippant? Nah, it couldn't be that. Aren't Harvard law professors known for their senses of humor? Perhaps they just didn't appreciate my effervescent wit. (Big word, effervescent. If I'd used that they probably would have taken me. Actually I learned it on that Pepsi commercial with the kid from "The Wonder Years.")

Maybe my blood just wasn't blue enough. Maybe they suspected that none of my ancestors ever even saw Plymouth Rock except in an insurance commercial. But heck, I would have thought the "Mayflower Madam" incident would have convinced them that blue blood does not an upstanding member of society make.

Perhaps I neglected to use enough of that oh-so-valuable resume enhancer: "pull." In fact, I must admit I sort of forgot to use any. I completely rejected the idea of having any of the Harvard alumni among my acquaintances write me a letter just because they met me once in a supermarket or once played tennis with my father, who showed them a photograph of me. What could they possibly say? "Well, she seems to have the ordinary number of arms, legs and noses, and she doesn't appear to drool incessantly." Yes, a recommendation like that was almost certainly exactly what I needed.

Karin Dell'Antonia

Maybe the business degree from good old K-State just didn't pack quite the punch I expected it to. The admissions committee probably heard about the attempt to close down two of our finest colleges. Or maybe one of them has been inside Farrell Library and realizes the only books we have here we could possibly learn from, or at least find, come from Varney's. But no, I give Harvard some credit. They can't possibly be dumb enough not to recognize a damn good university when they see one, even with all its faults.

It's obviously me they're rejecting here. Yes, I'm afraid I'm going to have to take this one personally. No doubt they've been following my editorial career and have realized that I'm not quite the liberal democrat they have in mind. Or maybe they just didn't like the color of the ketchup I spilled on the application. Or maybe they recognized in me an unfortunate tendency toward sour grapes.

In any case, here I am, rejected, alone, without direction or motivation. As Bloom County's Opus would say, I feel like I'm in a Madonna movie. So what do I do now? I have aspired to lofty heights, and I have been shot down, without even a waiting list to cushion my fall. (I may be a reject, but I haven't lost my instinct for a snappy metaphor.)

I feel that now would probably be a good time to turn this into a deep and insightful column on dealing with feelings of rejection and failure, so I would like to offer this tender and heartfelt bit of wisdom: It sucks, but it ain't the end of the world.

Now, I know you all know how seriously I take these things. I'll probably do something drastic, like trying to eat Hunan's Express while drinking warm Wiedemann beer. Or, worse yet, go to a perfectly good law school, live my life and forget all about it (not neglecting to forever nurse an undying grudge against Harvard).

I confess, a part of me is relieved. After all, if I had gotten into Harvard, I would have felt a vague obligation to go there. I hate to waste things. And I've been having all these nightmares about finding myself in Boston, surrounded by people who've never been west of the Mississippi and who think "Wizard of Oz" jokes are the best way to make a Kansas person feel at home, while at the same time being terribly witty and original.

Do I have an inferiority complex? Yes. Now that I'm a Harvard reject, I'll probably become a bag lady.

The California Conference on Self-Esteem is probably worried about me. I expect I'll never really achieve anything now. I can never aspire to be as great as say, the young John Kennedy, who has yet to pass the bar exam as far as I know. I'll bet Harvard didn't turn him down. (I can't remember if he went to Harvard or Yale or wherever, but the principle is the same.) No, I'll have to settle for being like Bob Dole, or Dwight Eisenhower, or Nancy Kassebaum, or Martin Luther King Jr., or Abraham Lincoln ... or all those people who didn't go to Harvard. I feel better already.

Well, so much for airing my failures across campus. I'll be OK. I never could get the hang of talking like Charles Emerson Winchester anyway. Guess I'll just have to press on.

Editorials

Limited war fails its goals

The concept of limited war was developed in the midst of the Cold War, when total war meant a full exchange of nuclear weapons with the Soviet Union. The definition of limited war is that limited means will be used to achieve limited objectives.

The Persian Gulf War has been portrayed by President Bush and his aides as a limited war. The president has said our goals are to liberate Kuwait from Iraqi occupation and restore the Kuwaiti monarchy to its throne.

Which doesn't explain why the United States is bombing civilian bomb shelters in Iraq.

Since the bombing of a civilian bomb shelter in Baghdad last week, which killed 500 people, Defense Department and military officials have said it was a command and control bunker and Saddam Hussein put those civilians there as human shields.

Western journalists in Baghdad were allowed to go through the shelter after the bombing and found no evidence of a military presence.

Maybe the only thing those women and children were human shields for was a residential district in Baghdad.

The bombing of the Baghdad shelter is just further proof the phrase limited war is an oxymoron for a superpower. Actually what it means is this: You won't have to be drafted, collect scrap metal and paper, or go to work in a defense plant like your parents or grandparents did during World War II. In short, the economic and industrial system of the United States need not be mobilized.

In the 1940s, the United States needed vast numbers of people to conduct total war. Fifty years later, it can devastate a country using high-technology conventional weaponry and the vast numbers of troops deployed for Cold War readiness supplied by the defense industries that have leached themselves on to our government.

■ Editor's note: This is the second of three editorials concerning the Allied Forces' bombing of an Iraqi bomb shelter Wednesday.

Another perspective

The nation is at war again. During his first war speech to the nation, President Bush promised this would not be "another Vietnam."

We can infer that he means the U.S. forces will not go about fighting Iraq half-heartedly. Perhaps that's true. But it's also true that any war, successful or not, is anything but glorious. What we're doing in Iraq and Kuwait is killing people. And what Saddam Hussein is doing is killing our people. Pentagon officials gloss over this fact when they euphemistically refer to an attack as a "campaign," and when they contend that "casualties" will be minimal.

No one of sound mind supports the brutality of Saddam. Civilized people agree he must be vanquished.

Those of us who believe in peace must be clear. We must not extol war. But we must not castigate U.S. soldiers who are doing only what their country and their duty demand. If we believe in peace, the least we can do is hope for their safety and well-being, as we hope for the safety and well-being of all people.

In doing so, however, we do not have to glorify war. War is a horror to be abhorred. When it ends, whenever that might be, we should be thankful that the bloodshed has stopped. We should observe the toll of the war. We should pledge "never again" once more. And we will watch as the next generation ignores what we have learned.

Internal angst needed in growth

Every once in a while, we're reminded of the past. That's sometimes good and sometimes bad depending on the who, the what and the where. Memories are really nothing more than the way we choose to remember any given situation. I've always liked to use the term "perceived perception."

Singer-songwriter Jackson Browne once sang, "You forget about the losses. You exaggerate the wins." The things that once seemed so defeating are gone from your memory. The fact that you were a pretty good high school football player has turned into your being nothing short of the NFL's dream player. I see this all the time. In fact, the Bears wanted me pretty bad.

The point is, very rarely are we forced to confront the way things actually were. We just never see our lives through anyone else's eyes. How often do you see your high school teachers? Your relatives? The girl who rejected you in sixth grade?

The answer, for me anyway, is not very often. I see my parents and relatives so rarely, they now speak of me in the past tense. It's usually something like, "Grandpa, remember that wonderful grandson who was lost in the depths of Aggieville?"

As for my sixth grade girlfriend, years of therapy have convinced me she missed out on a good thing.

So I've created a nice little world for myself. A kind of Shawn Bruce land. True, I don't have any copyrighted theme characters and the rides suck, but it's my world nonetheless. The best part is, one admission price gets you the whole package.

Which, brings me to this weekend. My little piece of heaven came under attack. The reason? An old friend came to town. Normally, this wouldn't bother me. I have friends who come to see me every once in a while, and while I'm always glad to see them, it's nothing to clean the house over. We usually end up drinking and arguing over who would have been the better NFL player.

But this friend is different, because she came into my life at a time, that to be completely honest, was not a good time for me. I was involved in a horribly destructive relationship, having roommate problems and driving a Ford Granada. My days revolved primarily around Andy Griffith and Good Times reruns on cable. I had to stay home. Would you take a Granada anywhere?

Shawn Bruce

I wish this could be a column about how my friend picked me up, dusted me off and set me back down on the road of success. Unfortunately, it can't. If anything, she was worse than I was. Not enrolled in school, not paying rent and driving a Ford Escort. I truly believe mental health professionals should look into this "Ford Factor." It's at least as important as Freudian philosophy.

For better or worse though, we came together. We stayed at her house and watched cable. We would take trips to Wamego at three in the morning. We listened to tapes and watched movies. We talked 'til the wee hours of the morning about life, love, and the wish to drive a car not made by Ford. In other words, we did what friends do.

But, there was always an honesty and intensity between us that was beyond any other friendship I've ever had. I know things about her no one else ever will. She knows the same of me. Mixed in with the beer was a realization that in each other we had found a kindred spirit. There was a brutal honesty between us that sometimes made us laugh and sometimes made us cry. What we saw in each other was nothing more than a reflection of ourselves.

Eventually, we just wore each other out. There's a limit to how much honesty anyone can take, and we maxed out in record time. She ended up moving home. Every once in a while I'd get a letter or a telephone call to tell me "hello" and catch me up on what was going on. Every single one was a little more distant.

So it surprised me when she said she wanted to see me. I'd pretty much resigned myself to being "card pals." You know what I mean. Cards on birthdays and Christmas with some message about how "we've got to get together." I was content to sit back and remember "the good times" from my perspective alone. Somehow, even though she was a major part of the whole experience, I didn't want her interfering with the way I chose to remember it.

I almost didn't go. But then I realized her world was on trial too. If my illusions were going to be shot down, hers would be in flames right behind me. So feeling a lot like a Christian being fed to the lions, I went to see her.

The results? After about thirty seconds it turned into story time. Somehow, the things we had experienced had taken on lives of their own. The trips to Wamego had turned into events of international importance. Nights in Aggieville were compared with the downfall of Rome. We laughed, drank, traded insults, and watched television until late in the evening. She fell asleep and I left.

I thought about things a lot that night. Somehow, the intensity we once had, has been replaced by what everybody else has. We're at that stage of friendship where our growth is separate. We just don't have that much in common anymore. This saddens me in a way, you always wonder what could have been.

But mostly, I felt good, because I realized that no one but her and I could ever take away the memories of what we had. I had always known I wouldn't, and this weekend showed me she wouldn't either.

Will we be creating new memories with each other? Not really. She's got her life to lead, and I've got mine. Not often are they going to cross.

But when they do, we've got memories to share of a time that both of us choose to remember, if not in a holy truth sort of way, at least in a way that makes us both happy. Maybe that's what friendship and growing up is all about.

Explosion kills man, injures 40

Caller claims IRA responsible for bomb, says bombs planted in other stations

By the Associated Press

LONDON — A bomb exploded at Victoria station during morning rush hour Monday, 45 minutes after a caller claiming to represent the IRA warned of bombs at all of London's train stations, police said.

One man was killed and 40 people were wounded.

The explosion at 7:46 a.m. sent screaming commuters running from the train terminal, some trailing blood across the concourse. Rush-hour rail traffic was halted for hours as police searched on their hands and knees for clues.

No group immediately claimed responsibility for the blast at Victoria, one of London's two main train stations.

The warning was delivered by a man with an Irish accent who said: "We are the Irish Republican Army. Bombs to go off at all mainline stations in 45 minutes," said Scotland Yard's anti-terrorist chief, Commander George Churchill-Coleman.

It came less than three hours after a bomb exploded at Paddington station, the city's other main station. Only a dozen employees were on duty, and no one was injured.

Churchill-Coleman said the call was only one of a number of threats following the Paddington explosion, and that the others "transpired either to be false or malicious." Iain McGregor, deputy chief constable of the British Transport Police, said his department gets half a dozen bomb threats a day.

Churchill-Coleman said the warning was passed to the British Transport Police, who already were searching all the main railway terminals when the blast at Victoria occurred.

The bomb, which was hidden in a trash can on the concourse, "was quite deliberately intended to maim and kill," he said.

British Rail Chairman Robert Reid said the caller's timing may have been a deliberate attempt to make his warning appear to be a hoax.

"Let's face it, as soon as you have an incident, your telephone lines are choked with hoax calls. Since these two incidents we've had hoax calls all the way up the line," Reid said in an interview on British Broadcasting Corp. radio.

British Rail closed all mainline stations after the bombings, suspending service that carries half a million people into the capital every day.

Several hours after the Victoria blast, Heathrow airport, Britain's busiest, was evacuated briefly Monday after police received a vague bomb threat, an airport spokeswoman said. Police searched and found nothing.

The blast at Victoria killed a man in his 30s and injured at least 40 people, Churchill-Coleman said.

Matthew Cyprus, 22, who lost part of his right foot, described the explosion from his hospital bed. "There was a big blinding light, a wall of fire, followed by a noise which came toward me and then I fell over onto the floor," he told reporters.

Jeremy Rose, who was buying a ticket at the time of the explosion, said he saw a man "with half his face missing. It was like he had gone through a car windshield at 100 mph."

Bus driver Jaynti Patel described a young girl running away from the blast. "Then her legs just gave out and she collapsed on the floor. She was trembling. She was shaking so bad," he said.

Philip Moos, graduate student in biology, swings his arm as Dr. Richard Gerren checks the electrodes during a gravity experiment.

Dr. Gerren places electrodes that read muscle activity on Moos. The electrodes transmit data into a computer used in the experiment.

Research can only be carried out to a certain extent and then it has to go beyond the confines of Earth and explore space.

Research has no boundaries for Charles Layne, assistant professor of physical education and leisure studies. He will conduct research in zero gravity as part of a team of BioServe Space Technologies researchers — a $5-million NASA-sponsored center created in 1987.

The program is the result of a joint initiative by the Department of Aerospace Engineering Sciences at the University of Colorado and the Division of Biology at K-State.

A group of K-State professors will be in Houston March 12-14, where they will board a modified army plane and conduct their research. All the seats have been removed and the search equipment necessary for the experiments will be strapped down.

Layne's research focuses on anticipatory postural activity.

When a person raises his arm, different muscle groups, such as the back and the back of the leg, are affected, Layne said. His research will try to determine the cause of the muscle-group interaction.

"A French and Russian team has done research on this and they saw movement when they strapped subjects down at their feet," he said. "What we think is the cause is the pressure on the balls of the feet."

The plane will fly a large series of parabola movements, similar to a roller coaster. During the drops, passengers will experience about 20-30 seconds of zero gravity, Layne said.

The research will be conducted

Committee focuses on drug prevention

LAURA BIRRELL

Three years ago, former Gov. Mike Hayden gave the Kansas Board of Regents money for a committee for the prevention of drug abuse on campus.

The committee formed was the systemwide Committee on Substance Abuse Issues/Regents Institutions. The committee is composed of representatives from the schools on the board.

K-State's representative to this committee is Bill Arck, director of Alcohol and Other Drug Education Service.

"The committee meets on a monthly basis to share information, talk about different methods of drug prevention on campus, coordinate efforts for prevention and plan the yearly conference," Arck said.

Some of the coordinated efforts are the National Collegiate Alcohol Awareness Week and the Drug Prevention Week. There have also been 10,000 copies of the brochure titled "We Want to Succeed" printed. The information was gathered and researched by the committee, and the printing was done at K-State.

The Drug Free Community program was implemented through the committee and the campuses.

The committee also pays for members to go to training conferences throughout the state.

One of these training conferences for intervention is organized by the Johnson Institute.

"I was amazed on how the interventions function with more than one person helping the person that needs to be intervened on," said Kenyon Madden, assistant director of Alcohol and Other Drug Education Service. "The conference trained participants on how to use a group of people to support the person in need."

The committee conducts surveys of the campuses to measure the amount of drug abuse. They are also working on a computer program for students to use on their own and get feedback only they will see.

The committee was originally funded by a two-year grant from the state. They are now funded by a federal grant.

Plane crashes during takeoff attempt

By the Associated Press

CLEVELAND — The DC-9 cargo plane that crashed during takeoff at Cleveland's airport, killing two, had a recent history of equipment defects, a report published Monday said.

The Plain Dealer said the plane, which was delivering mail when it crashed Sunday, had problems that prompted 32 reports to the Federal Aviation Administration from October 1988 to October 1990.

In one instance, the aircraft, owned by Ryan International Airlines in Wichita had a malfunction in its landing gear assembly, the newspaper said.

The report to the FAA, called a Service Difficulty Report, said in the Nov. 28, 1989, instance, the flight crew heard a loud noise as the gear came down. The plane landed without incident, but an investigation revealed a rod to the right main landing gear was separated from a landing gear actuator, the FAA report said.

At 12:20 a.m. Sunday, the same plane flipped on its taxi run for takeoff and landed upside down, killing both crewmen aboard.

Killed were Capt. David Reay, 44, of Oakland, Calif., and First Officer Richard Duney Jr., 28, of Belle Mead, N.J.

The overturned underbelly of the fuselage had a charred hole.

Witnesses said they thought there was an explosion on the plane, but investigators said that appeared unlikely.

Both victims were pilots for Ryan International Airlines, a subcontractor to Emery Worldwide, based in Palo Alto, Calif. Emery Worldwide contracts with the postal service for cargo flights.

Others of the 32 FAA reports filed on the plane included those for cracks and corrosion on the body and loose, cracked or frozen parts in the plane's landing gear door, cabin and cargo doors as well as in its landing position indicator system, The Plain Dealer said.

Gerald Snyder, director of human resources at Ryan International, said he was not familiar with Service Difficulty Reports and referred questions to Raymond Thomas, the company's vice president for technical services.

FAA officials received 75,391 reports on all commercial aircraft from October 1988 to October 1990. DC-9s were involved in 11 percent of those, the newspaper said.

The FAA assigns a severity level rating to the defects, ranging from 1 to 5 with 5 being the worst. The plane that crashed Sunday received one "5" rating, 25 "2" ratings and six "1" ratings, the Plain Dealer reported.

The Nov. 28, 1989, incident received a "5" rating, the newspaper said.

Barry Strauch, an investigator with the National Transportation Safety Board, said Sunday the accident's cause was not immediately known. He said initial checks showed no evidence of terrorism.

Strauch also said there was no evidence the DC-9 cargo plane had been de-iced during a 28-minute stopover at the Cleveland airport. The plane was en route from Buffalo, N.Y., to Indianapolis.

He declined to speculate whether a lack of de-icing amid a snow storm played a role in the crash. It snowed the night and early morning hours of the crash.

Control tower recordings did not indicate any air-traffic control problems at the time of the crash, Strauch said. He declined to reveal details of the initial review of the cockpit tape-recordings.

KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN
SPORTSWildcat leader earns acclaim as 1 of nation's best at SSSCOTT PASKE
Sports Reporter

Craig Wilson doesn't plan to write a how-to book about turning a baseball career around. Magic spells and miracles just aren't his style.

In fact, the K-State shortstop had no idea he would be touted as the Wildcats' latest success story. Wilson's eyebrows were raised when he viewed the fine print of three pre-season baseball publications.

One magazine had Wilson listed as the second-best professional prospect in the Big Eight Conference. Another had him as the seventh-best collegiate shortstop in the nation.

Yet a third gave recognition to Wilson and his teammates, ranking the 'Cats in the Top-40 poll.

For a player who regards himself as nothing more than a blue-collar infielder, the magazines required a second look.

"I didn't really expect anything like that," Wilson said. "Once you see your name in one of those, it gets you ready for baseball season, or at least makes you think you are."

K-State coach Mike Clark said the press clippings were placed in proper perspective.

"We've kidded him enough about it all that I think we've knocked his ego back down," Clark said. "But we are looking for big things from him like we are from a lot of our players."

The 'Cats took their first big step last weekend, winning the opener of a three-game series against No. 7 Arkansas. Senior Kent Hipp tossed a six-hit shutout for the win.

Wilson scored the 'Cats' first run of the year, crossing home plate on a three-run homer by Brad Rippel-meyer in the first inning.

"We felt we should have won all three down there," Wilson said. "After we won that first one, it was like, 'What can we do next?'"

Wilson's expectations for K-State's season are comparable to those the national media have set for the Franklin Park, Ill., native. A late-season surge by Wilson, coupled with a Big Eight Tournament appearance in Oklahoma City last year, provided the motivation.

"Any time you make it to post-season play, it gets you ready to go," Wilson said. "We got there, and things didn't go as well as we would have liked."

"But it made us want to get there again and win it."

Lofty goals seemed distant for Wilson early in 1990. The junior struggled at the plate as K-State crawled to an 8-11 start.

Wilson's low point came in March during a stretch in which the 'Cats won just two of 10 games.

"Heading into the Big Eight season, I was hitting something like .250," Wilson said. "I focused a lot better, and I started hitting the ball really well. Then, things just kept happening for me."

Wilson's average soared to a team-high .328 by season's end, helping him earn second team all-Big Eight honors. He led the team with 34 RBI, and had 21 extra base hits.

His impressive numbers carried to the defensive side, where Wilson helped turn 35 double plays.

Wilson said the familiarity of 15 returning lettermen should help reaching team goals an easier task, and pre-season workouts weren't as chaotic as his last two seasons.

"When I was a freshman, we must have run over the same plays 300 or 400 times," Wilson said. "Having so many of the guys around for so long, we can get the same workout done in 20 minutes."

DAVID MAYES/Staff

K-State shortstop Craig Wilson has been named one of the top professional prospects currently playing collegiate baseball by several different national publications. Wilson is a junior from Franklin Park, Ill.

Class work improving

BILL LANG
Sports Reporter

The image of the student-athlete just getting by is still a pretty strong one in most people's minds. However, Veryl Switzer is working to change that.

Switzer, associate director of intercollegiate athletics, said he is hoping the days of the "dumb jock" are over with.

"We're feeling positive about the progress that we've made," Switzer said. "The demand on (a student-athlete's) time is great, and this is the best GPA that we've had in many, many years."

For the fall semester, K-State had 101 student-athletes with a 3.00 grade-point-average or better. There were also nine students who had a 4.00.

"The overall student-athlete GPA was 2.6," Switzer said. "The general undergraduate student population GPA was 2.7."

"That's pretty good considering all the time restraints that they have," he said.

Switzer said that since 1969, the athletic and non-athletic administrators have been working to improve the academic side of athletics at K-State.

Another helping hand in the academic improvement is the NCAA.

"The NCAA requires that we budget $25,000 each fiscal year toward academic assistance," Switzer said. "We've been upgrading it every year."

Athletic Director Steve Miller, Switzer said, has also been a factor in getting the academic assistance to a comparable level along with the guidelines established by the NCAA.

Recently the Associated Press released the graduation rate of the Big

Academic honor winners listed

KANSAS CITY, Mo. (AP) — Kay Kay Hart and Misti Chennault of Kansas posted perfect 4.0 grade point averages and headed the 1991 Big Eight women's all academic team.

Twenty-two players were named to the team announced Monday after earning a minimum of a 3.0 grade point average.

Hart is in a pre-medicine program while Chennault is majoring in journalism.

Named to the first team with Hart and Chennault were Laurie Decker, Iowa State, 3.15, speech communication; Lynne Lorenzen, Iowa State, 3.11, elementary education; Mary Jo Miller, K-State, 3.10, elementary education; Althea Cox, Oklahoma State, 3.42, elementary education; Debbie Johnson, Colorado, 3.16, psychology; Stacey Primus, Missouri, 3.70, journalism; Ann Halsne, Nebraska, 3.29, exercise science; and Karen Jennings, Nebraska, 3.84, exercise science.

Also named were Sanquetta Davis, Iowa State, 3.36, psychology; Kim Van Deest, Iowa State, 3.59, physical education; Jennifer Grebing, K-State, 3.00, elementary education; Kelly Marie Moylan, K-State, 3.29, physical education; Ellen Bain, Colorado, 3.12, news-editorial; Debbie Jacobson, Colorado, 3.80, kinesiology; Sherrice King, Colorado, 3.05, psychology; Amy Mathern, Colorado, 3.09, arts and sciences; Abby Wirfs, Colorado, 3.26, English; Danielle Shareef, Kansas, 3.68, communication studies; Nancy Hoover, Missouri, 3.50, health professions; and Lynette Linneman, Missouri, 3.16, pre-business.

10 conference. Switzer said recording a conference's graduation rate is really difficult to do because of too many variables.

"Suppose that in one situation you have 20 student-athletes," he explained. "Then 10 of them transfer and the rest graduate. You could say that 100 percent graduated or you could say that 50 percent graduated."

"Until the NCAA and the Big Eight decide on a formula for determining graduation rates, we won't release one," Switzer said.

Switzer also said the advent of Proposition 48 has probably induced students to hit the books more often. But he also cried foul on the structure of the test.

"Well, I think that (Proposition)

48 has helped," he said. "I think that the test is biased and I protest it being used. I think that the test places non-traditional students at a disadvantage. And I'm saying that the non-traditional student is a minority."

"However, the idea behind Proposition 48 is a good one. It's put a lot of emphasis on the academic side of school for the athletes. And that's what they're here for."

K-State student-athletes who were named to Big Eight first-teams were as follows: Russ Campbell and Brooks Barta, football; Betsy Berkeley and Rhonda Hughes, volleyball; David Warders and Jason Goertzen, Janet Haskin and Janet Treiber, men's and women's cross-country.

'Cats to battle OSU

Foul trouble plagued team in 1st game

TODD FERTIG
Sports Reporter

It was like a nightmare. Every time you thought it simply had to get better, it somehow got worse.

One after another, fouls on the K-State big men took a toll on the team's chances of beating the OSU Cowboys in Stillwater Jan. 26. Every time the Cats needed a break, a whistle would announce a break was not in store.

By the 5:11 mark in the first half, the 'Cats' top three big men were all relegated to a much shorter, less-imposing stance on the bench.

Maurice Brittain was the first casualty, picking up his third foul with 7:20 left, the 'Cats trailing 26-20. With improved depth in the post this season, it seemed like a mere inconvenience.

Thirty seconds later, however, John Rettiger recorded his third, shifting the weight of low-post duties upon the shoulders of Wylie Howard.

But on a day when Howard's grandmother may have been whistled for a foul, Howard could last just two minutes before picking up his third with the 'Cats trailing 31-23.

With all-Big Eight terror Byron Houston and his towering front-court mates free to roam in the paint, the contest was virtually finished. The 12 points produced by K-State's big men were equaled by OSU's poor-shooting center Johnny Pittman. The final score: 85-70.

"We dug ourselves quite a hole in the first half of that game and had to try to come back in the second half," K-State coach Dana Altman said. "We did a pretty good job of it, and we were only down seven with five minutes left, but they made some big plays down the stretch and pulled away."

Certainly tonight's 6:35 rematch with the Cowboys can't possibly go as badly as the last meeting. Every bit of foul luck that could have been wrought that afternoon plagued the Wildcat post players from start to finish. But if the 'Cats can't contain the OSU big men tonight without getting into foul trouble, a similar outcome is assured.

"They're a physical team, and there's going to be some fouls called," Altman said. "We just have to not pick up any cheap fouls and not let them get into their offense."

Six-foot-10 forward Darryl King played sparingly against the Cowboys, despite the fouls that plagued K-State's other big men. In Saturday's loss to Kansas, however, King came off the bench for one of his best performances of the season, coming up with 10 second-half points. King could provide added relief on the inside against the Cowboys this time, Altman said.

"Darryl played a few minutes down there (Stillwater) and didn't play very well," Altman said. "It's consistency that determines how much action a player sees. Darryl hasn't been very consistent this year. We'll just have to see how he performs this week and how much we will expect from him."

Oklahoma State comes to Bramlage in second place in the conference at 7-3, 18-5 overall. The Cowboys have been victorious in eight of their last nine outings, including Saturday's trouncing of Missouri, 71-56.

In the win over Missouri, the Cowboys weren't dependent upon Houston's blasting in the paint, or Sean Sutton's long-range bombing, or any other weapon in the offensive arsenal. It was their defense, which limited the Tigers to their lowest point total in three years and held Doug Smith and Anthony Peeler scoreless for the first 14 minutes, that gave OSU the win.

That makes tonight's opponent even more intimidating to the poor-shooting Wildcats. The 'Cats have shot below 50 percent in nearly every outing this season, relying on defense and rebounding to keep close. If the Cowboys can duplicate the defensive performance that frustrated Missouri, K-State may struggle.

"Their pressure hurt us last time," Altman said.

In dropping the 'Cats to 0-4 in the last meeting, the Cowboys outshot K-State 57 percent to 43 percent. With no production in the post, and Jean Derouillere contained to 4-of-9 shooting, the scoring load fell upon the shoulders of Jeff Wires and Marcus Zeigler. Zeigler nailed a season high four three-pointers and Wires led the team with 22 points.

Houston comes to Bramlage Coliseum as the No. 3 scorer and rebounder in the conference.

Brett, Jackson, Tartabull to lead '91 Royals Remnant just keeps producing for KC Outfielders sign contracts

By the Associated Press

KANSAS CITY, Mo. — George Brett is a remnant.

But what a remnant.

Brett is the last player who will report to spring training this year from a special group of players who molded the expansion Kansas City Royals.

Hal McRae was let go a couple of years ago. Amos Otis left bitterly a few seasons past.

This winter, the Royals told second baseman Frank White and centerfielder Willie Wilson that their best years were behind them. White after 17 years in a Royals uniform; Wilson after 13.

This leaves Brett, a tobacco-chewing throwback to what a kid thinks a ballplayer should look like. Brett, a pure hitter facing his 38th birthday and known as Lou, now dresses in a clubhouse dotted with a media star like Bo Jackson and mega-million dollar pitchers.

But he made history last year like none of them. He batted .380 in the second half to triumph over an unspeakable start and become the first player ever to win a batting title in each of three decades.

"There will never be another like him," says Manager John Wathan, a former teammate. "I hope he can play forever."

Which brings us to this year. As in, what have you done for me lately?

Brett's .310 career average is probably the one constant Kansas City can count on as it heads to camp Friday.

Gone is White. Terry Shumpert, a rookie last year who was stopped by repeated injuries, will take over for the veteran who won eight Gold Gloves.

Gone is Wilson. Brian McRae, Hal's kid, takes over after an impressive rookie showing last year.

"We will miss their abilities," Wathan said of White and Wilson, also former teammates. "But maybe it was time to pass the gauntlet. Willie probably can still play. We might have stayed with him maybe had he not had some problems with us. He just couldn't accept being a backup with us."

Gone too is General Manager John Schuerholz, the Sporting News' executive of the year in the Royals' 1985 championship year. Schuerholz went to Atlanta and was replaced by Herk Robinson, who has handled the business end of the operation since 1973.

And never mind that the Royals were burned badly after shelling out big bucks to sign free agent Mark Davis last year. They went after another name free agent this year and got Kirk Gibson.

But, as always, the operative word for Kansas City will be pitching. Injured was the word most often associated with the staff last year when the Royals used 23 different pitchers.

Bret Saberhagen had elbow surgery in July. But it's an odd-numbered year, so he's due to rematerialize as the 1985 20-game winner or the 1989 Cy Young winner.

Mark Gubicza is a big question with an ailing rotator cuff, but the Royals signed free agent Mike Boddicker as insurance.

Who knows if the real Mark Davis is the one who had six saves last year or 44 the year before?

By the Associated Press

KANSAS CITY, Mo. — Bo Jackson gets a $1 million raise this season, and now the Kansas City Royals only can hope he earns it.

The slugging outfielder, who earned $1 million last year after losing in salary arbitration, avoided arbitration Monday by signing a one-year contract for $2.4 million.

Jackson, 28, who splits time between the Royals and the Los Angeles Raiders of the NFL, hit .272 with 28 home runs and 78 RBIs last year as the Royals finished a disappointing sixth in the American League West. He had asked for $1.9 million last year.

The Royals also signed outfielder Danny Tartabull Monday, thus avoiding the arbitration process entirely.

Tartabull was the last Kansas City player in arbitration. Both sluggers had been scheduled for arbitration hearings Tuesday in

New York.

The terms of Tartabull's contract were not disclosed. Tartabull, who made $1.65 million last year, was asking for $2.6 million. The Royals were offering $1.75 million.

Because of injuries, Tartabull played in only 88 games last season. He hit 15 home runs and had 60 RBIs.

If a case goes to an arbitration hearing, the choice is either the player's demand or the team's offer, with no middle ground. Royals spokesman Dean Vogelhaar said the club was glad to have settled with all players who had filed for arbitration.

Many Royals' fans, feeling Jackson gives less than maximum effort and is frequently injured, had hoped the Royals would trade the two-sport star. There were reports the Atlanta Braves were interested.

"Trading him was not a consideration," first-year general manager Herk Robinson said. "We have not considered trading Bo at all. We're counting on Bo having a great year and contributing to a lot of success this year."

As a running back for the Raiders, Jackson just completed the fourth season of a five-year deal worth $7.4 million.

Reviewer predicts 1991 Grammy award winners

Hammer to 'touch' album of year

ERIC MELIN
Collegian Reviewer

The 33rd Annual Grammy Awards will be Wednesday night. Recordings released during the eligibility year Oct. 1, 1989- Sept. 30, 1990 were nominated earlier this year and everyone's favorite stars, except Sinead O'Connor, will attend to gloat over their achievements and receive little trophies on national television.

According to Webster's Dictionary, objective is an adjective meaning uninfluenced by emotion, surmise or personal opinion.

Since opinions cannot be objective, that makes me a fully qualified (translation: opinionated) reviewer, and I will attempt to predict the winners in all major categories excluding Best Polka Recording. As an extra bonus, I will offer my favorites in some categories.

Supposedly, the most important award is Record of the Year. This is strictly for singles. Nominated this year are Phil Collins for "Another Day in Paradise," Bette Midler for "From a Distance," Sinead O'Connor for "Nothing Compares 2 U," M.C. Hammer for "U Can't Touch This" and Mariah Carey for "Vision of Love." One must immediately narrow down the possibilities to Hammer and O'Connor because their songs have letters that replace words. Since O'Connor isn't nominated for Album of the Year, Hammer will get the Grammy.

Of course, the voters may have some apprehension in voting for Hammer since he stole the hook for the song from Rick James. In fact, 50 percent of all profits from the single go to Motown Records. Being a smart businessman, Hammer left the ripped-off bass line out of some of his commercials and used another part of the song. Even though Sinead O'Connor didn't write the song (the award is for performance, after all), I like "Nothing Compares 2 U" the best. It pours with emotion and her voice is one of the most startling, original ones to hit the record industry in years.

Hammer will also win Album of the Year. Not because "Please Hammer Don't Hurt 'em" is terribly good, but because he sets a good role model for young kids and has a full line of "Hammer dolls" ready to hit the stores. Winners will not include Quincy Jones, because he has a slew of Grammys already, Mariah Carey and Wilson Phillips because they aren't quite respected enough to win, and Phil Collins because everybody is really tired of him.

Song of the Year is a songwriter's award, and its nominees are the same as Record of the Year — except M.C. Hammer isn't nominated this time. Instead, "Hold On" by Wilson Phillips grabbed the fifth nomination and it has a fairly good chance of winning. In this category, it seems, the catchiest song will win. Not only is "Hold On" a catchy song, but if you happened to turn on your radio in the past year, it's already been pounded into your head a million times.

Mariah Carey and Wilson Phillips are also nominated for Best New Artist along with the Black Crowes, Lisa Stansfield and the Kentucky Headhunters. Carey was nominated in all four of the biggest categories, so she'll probably win. The Black Crowes should win, however, for trying to keep rock 'n' roll alive in this age of sterilized, recycled pop hits and MTV copycats.

Nominated for Best Female Pop Vocal Performance is Lisa Stansfield's "All Around the World," Bette Midler's "From a Distance," Whitney Houston's "I'm Your Baby Tonight," Mariah Carey's "Vision of Love," and Sinead O'Connor's "Nothing Compares 2 U." The obvious choice here is O'Connor, but she severely jeopardized her chances by boycotting the Grammys. Votes were cast after her announcement, so she probably won't receive any awards at all.

Let's look at why she has done this. In a recent televised interview, O'Connor said she wanted to express her sadness at what was going on in the Persian Gulf. Because she is a public figure, she wants everyone to know her feelings on the "justified" killing of other human beings.

"Sinead O'Connor is a marketable product," she said. "I'm fed up with the whole business."

Giving her a Grammy would just take too much guts on their part.

In the case of a tie in nominating, there can be six nominees in a category, and that's what happened in Best Male Pop Vocal Performance. Phil Collins will finally win one in this competition for "Another Day in Paradise." Other nominees include "Downtown Train" by Rod Stewart, "Georgia on my Mind" by Michael Bolton, "I Don't Have the Heart" by James Ingram, the album "Storm Front" by Billy Joel and "Oh Pretty Woman" by Roy Orbison from "A Black and White Night Live." I'd give Orbison another Grammy because his song is the only one that's worth a damn.

There was another tie in the category of Best Pop Vocal Performance by a Duo or Group also, so there are six nominees. "Unchained Melody" by the Righteous Brothers (1990 Recording) won't win because it's a re-release, "All My Life" by Linda Ronstadt and Aaron Neville won't win because they've cleaned up at the Grammys before and "All I Wanna do is Make Love to You" by Heart is a pathetic excuse for a song. That leaves the B-52's "Roam," Wilson Phillips' "Hold On" and "Across the River" by Bruce Hornsby & the Range. If they give them Song of the Year, they've got to give them this, so, you guessed it — Wilson Phillips strikes again.

Wednesday, I'll cover all the rock, rap and heavy metal awards.

Parents, children learn rules about child-passenger safety

VICKI KNIGHT
Collegian Reporter

Special efforts were made last week during Child Passenger Safety Awareness Week to educate parents and children about car safety seats and seat belts.

One of those efforts was a visit by 35 Topeka girl scouts to the Kansas Legislature and Gov. Joan Finney.

Maraa Torrez Anderson, field director and director of innovative programs for the Kaw Valley Girl Scouts Council, said the girls handed out valentines to all the members of the Legislature. The valentines gave the number of lives saved and lost because of the use or lack of use of seat belts.

The girls were accompanied by Trooper Bear, one of the mascots for the Child Passenger Safety Awareness Week.

"We really enjoyed doing it," Anderson said. "I think the girls feel good, they think they did something good and enjoyed being a part of the system."

Anderson said because girl scouts have a good reputation, people listen when they show interest in a topic.

One person who hopes people will listen to the girl scouts is Susan Butterfield, youth educator for the Kansas Seat Belt Office, which is located at K-State within the cooperative extension service.

"Automobile crashes are the number one cause of death for children," she said. "So certainly we need to address the problem."

Butterfield said she put together packets for all Kansas daycare centers and preschools to be used during awareness week. Butterfield said Dr. Nancy Bolsen, professor in Human Development and Family Studies and a former board member of the Kansas Association of Education for Young Children, helped develop the activities in the packet.

The packet included games, songs, lesson plans, stickers, signs to hang up and seat belt information. Butterfield had a stack of letters lying on her desk from teachers and administrators requesting more information.

"It is real fun to be involved in something that is so well received," she said.

The Safety Always packet was also new to the schools. It includes teaching units, a computer packet and fun activities for students.

During the awareness week, Kiwanis clubs took part in the effort to raise public awareness by doing seat belt checks at preschools and daycare centers in their communities, Butterfield said.

Care was taken to make parents aware that even though people may be using them incorrectly, she said. Parents were taught to identify if the belt is buckled properly and if the child is buckled into the car properly. There is a 45 percent misuse of seat belts because they are not buckled correctly.

Another program used to increase participation of seat belt usage is the Governor's Challenge, a community against community competition.

Communities are given an observational survey before and after a certain amount of time, during which the community will make efforts to encourage their residents to increase seat belt usage. Butterfield said various levels of participation are seen throughout the different communities.

"I feel what we are doing has a very positive impact on the health and well being of children and adults in our state," she said.

Butterfield also said people are becoming more safety conscious. In Kansas, safety belt usage is at 58 percent, up from last year's 52 percent. Only 10 percent of Kansans used seat belts in 1985, the first year of the survey.

Butterfield said their goal is for 70 percent usage by 1992.

Banquet honors K-State

Historical society aims to preserve, develop K-State history

By the Collegian Staff

The Kansas State Historical Society had its annual banquet Friday.

The banquet was Feb. 16 in honor of the founding of K-State, said Homer Socolofsky, society secretary-treasurer and professor in history. This is the 128th year of the society of K-State.

Socolofsky said the society's main goal is development and preservation of the history of K-State.

From KSU Historical Society files, the society collects, preserves and helps in interpretation of written and oral records as well as artifacts which will explain K-State history to future generations.

The society meets twice a year and is open to anyone who wishes to become a member, Socolofsky said.

The society is free for students and $1 for others.

"There are 100 members in the society," Socolofsky said. "Most are faculty, retired faculty or widows of faculty members."

The meeting opened with the society Co-President Melvin Cottom presenting the second annual meritorious service award to Nancy Twiss.

Twiss, special assistant to the provost for scholarships and pre-law adviser, received the award for outstanding achievement in academic advising.

The featured speaker was Professor Charles Deyoe, head of the Department of Grain Science and Industry. Deyoe's speech concerned the early history of the grain science department according to John Shellenberger and others.

Deyoe traced the evolution of the department from its beginning in 1910 to the present. He also displayed some flour bags from the 1920s and 1930s.

Deyoe said that sometime during the 1940s it was believed the milling club, Alpha Mu, gave flour to the needy during the holidays.

"The records and tapes are kept in the archives, and Anthony Crawford is in charge of that," Cottom said.

"We keep any form of material that has history of K-State," said Anthony Crawford, the society archivist.

Crawford said the collection in the library includes permanent records of the departments, including minutes and tapes of meetings, general files, photos and many more artifacts.

Kansan killed in gulf action

Sumner County man victim of friendly fire at Saudi border

By the Associated Press

WICHITA — A rural Sumner County man has become the first Kansan reported killed in the Persian Gulf War.

Jeff Middleton, 23, was killed early Sunday by friendly fire during skirmishes with Iraqi troops along the Saudi border, members of his family said Monday night.

Family members and an Oxford minister said they were told by U.S. Army officials just after noon Monday that Middleton had died.

The only two deaths reported by the military in the Persian Gulf region on Sunday came when an AH-64 Apache helicopter mistakenly fired at U.S. armored vehicles. The military has not released the identity of the two soldiers who died.

Middleton, a corporal in the Army's 2nd Armored Division, was a graduate of Oxford High School, said his brother, Jerry.

Jeff Middleton had attended Pittsburg State University and had been in the Army for three years. He was a halfback on the Oxford High School and college football teams.

Middleton came from a military family.

"He had always been military-minded," Jerry Middleton said. "He was always reading military books."

Jeff's hero, Jerry said, was Gen. George Patton.

His father, William Middleton, is retired from the Army. He was stationed in Stuttgart, Germany, when Jeff was born, Jerry Middleton said.

Jeff was stationed in Germany before his division headed to the Gulf, his brother said. The family moved to Kansas when Jeff was 2.

"At first we were nervous because we didn't know what would happen to him. But later on, they kept saying we have the best military in the world," Jerry Middleton said.

Jeff's mother, Joyce Middleton, last spoke with her son by telephone at 4 a.m. on Feb. 9, Jerry said.

"He was fine," Jerry said. "He was wanting to come home. He was over there and wanted to do his job, but he was wanting to come home."

On Sunday morning, Jerry said, his mother heard a radio report of the most recent American troop deaths.

"Mom said she felt like it was him," Jerry said.

Involvement aids time organization

JODELL LAMER
Collegian Reporter

Getting involved at K-State can increase chances of graduation.

Sally Routson, coordinator of student activities at K-State, said Monday night in a UFM class that being a part of University can result in a better organization of time.

She said there are many different ways to get involved in activities on campus, as well as different levels of involvement.

Routson directed the informal discussion in the K-State Union. She is an adviser to the Student Governing Association and the University Activities Board.

"There are about 350 registered student organizations on campus, which cater to just about any kind of interest that you're looking for," said Tim Kamenar, graduate assistant in student activities.

Kamenar said these organizations not only provide social contact, but also education from speakers and can create contacts for future jobs or internships.

"You get to know the faculty and staff who work with the organizations," Routson said. "That's one way to get references."

Routson and Kamenar said the UAB maintains a list of registered organizations, which is available in the SGA office. The list gives the names of the advisers and presidents for each organization.

Routson also spoke about opportunities available to serve on committees and councils.

"One thing that is unique about K-State is that we have students serving on every University committee that there is."

She said by serving on a committee a student represents the entire University instead of just individuals.

The class was offered for the first time by UFM as part of a series designed to help students at K-State.

Youth, community leaders to build partnership

RYAN HAYTER
Collegian Reporter

Youth and community leaders will meet to build better partnerships at the first statewide We Can Do It! Youth and Community Together conference Wednesday and Thursday in Manhattan.

Beth Tatarko, assistant director for the Kansas Center for Rural Initiatives, said, "The conference will bring together youth and adults so they can better understand what talents and energies the students have and how they can work with the talents of adults to build better communities."

The Ramada Inn will be the host to more than 140 big- and small-town participants who will learn the importance of youth involvement.

Grade school through high school students and adults will work together to develop plans on youth volunteerism for use in their hometowns, she said.

The idea for the We Can Do It! meeting started during an economic development conference in Hutchinson last summer.

"During a panel session, Wamego High School students presented a lecture over projects they were doing in their community," Tatarko said. "The adults got excited about it and wanted to have a conference where everyone could learn how to build better partnerships with youth."

Communities were informed of the meeting by mass mailings to private business, government agencies and schools. Adult leaders were given the initiative to put together teams and to sponsor a youth.

"It's really a sharing conference between leaders and youth," Tatarko said. "They come as a team."

Literacy

provides immediate feedback.

"The computer is great because it removes (learning) away from the old book, paper and pencil format and makes it something totally new," Cody said.

Cody stresses the idea people learn better as adults because they bring all of their life experiences into the learning process.

Also, she said, as adults, the students are not distracted by the things school children normally worry about, such as what the others are wearing or what they brought for lunch.

In order to relate what they are learning to real life, the students may practice by writing a thank you note, improve reading skills by reading material about parenting or work on math by figuring out how much a pair of shoes would cost, how much money they have and how much change they should receive, Teener said.

Cody said that she works very hard to build the students' self-confidence and self-image so they can learn and begin to see themselves as life-long learners. She emphasizes that obtaining the GED may only be the beginning.

"I'm not interested so much in just getting the GED as much as I want them to really understand and gain self-confidence from their studies," she said. "Also, they need to know how to resource for themselves — where to go for answers — and I don't think that is usually taught."

Free child care is provided for the students to remove as many blocks to participating in the program as possible. The program itself is free as well, she said.

Nearly 130 people participated in the program in 1989, Teener said.

"When you are working with a population such as this," she said, "it's difficult to see a lot of success because they are in and out — they're very transient. But last year 60 percent of those that participated in our project did complete at least 75 percent of their objectives."

Gravity

at periods of zero gravity, and although Layne will not be on the flight he has instructed the group to carry out his experiment.

The subjects will be hooked up to EMG amplifiers, which monitor muscle movement and are similar to EKG machines, he said. The group will then undergo three exercises.

They will first raise their arm while free-floating, followed by the arm-raising action while blindfolded. Finally, participants will be strapped into a device, which will simulate the pressure they feel on the balls of their feet while in gravity.

"We're trying to trick the nervous system into believing that it can take advantage of what it's pressing against," Layne said. "They'll be free-falling but feeling pressure on their feet. That indicates that if they press down they will get a response, kind of like the theory 'for every action there is a reaction.'"

Layne has done a number of experiments on muscle groups within Earth's gravity. He has had subjects hooked up to the EMG raise their arm to measure the muscle groups in response to the pull of gravity.

Subjects were also hung upside-down and raised their arm to demonstrate movement with gravity. In a final experiment, subjects were laid face-down on a sit-up bench to combine movements with and against gravity.

Various other experiments will be conducted also. Shrimp mobility and behavior will be studied by Brenda Klement, graduate in development biology. Brine shrimp will be tested for the effects of gravity under normal circumstances and under the influence of alcohol.

Studies will also be conducted on immunology, plant growth, yeast and bacteria, Klement said.

Council

"I want to stress that I dislike government involvement in my business," Ferguson said. "I think sometimes government has a tendency to stick its fingers and its nose in a little too excessively."

Roger Maughmer, who is the only candidate presently on the City Commission, said he would continue to support the current fire- and safety-inspection programs.

"The outcome of a considerable amount of research was that possibly we had not given the ordinance presently on the books a chance to perform as it can and should," he said.

Maughmer said the commission had heard few complaints, and problems arising from complaints had been resolved.

"Mandatory inspection, at best, will create more bureaucracy at the local government to administer it," he said. "At worst it could be punitive and ineffective."

Craig Raborn, candidate and senior in geography, said he approaches rental inspection from a different perspective because he is a student and rental tenant, but did not say he would favor mandatory inspection.

"This is not a major community-wide problem, but it's a problem that's not going to go away until it is dealt with," he said. "I agree that the education program is not up-to-snuff."

Candidate Edith Stunkel, who is a landlord, said the city had not yet worked up a viable program to systematically identify the problem.

"I do not favor a program that would create a new bureaucracy in city government and that would treat all landlords as problem generators," she said. "Until a system is developed to identify the problem units, the present system should be continued."

Stunkel said she does not want to see units go off the market.

"We need to make sure there is not undue financial hardship on people to upgrade their units," she said.

Another issue discussed is how the commission can support Manhattan businesses during the economic slowdown caused by the deployment of the Big Red One and the current economic climate in the country.

License law affects custom harvesters

SHANNAN SEELY
Agriculture Reporter

Kansas custom harvesters must have Class A drivers' licenses by April 1992, if they drive combination vehicles weighing more than 26,000 pounds.

The federal law will affect students who may have operated the vehicles without commercial drivers' licenses in the past.

The change has brought up several questions and conflicting answers for custom harvesters and some K-State students.

The federal government passed the law to prevent drivers with a poor driving record in one state from obtaining a license in another state, said Alan Burch, a driver's license examiner in Hays.

When applying for a commercial driver's license, records will be checked with a computer in Washington, D.C.

"They will not be able to get one in the state until they give up their other state license," Burch said.

If the person already has a commercial driver's license and a good

I've had real good luck with students. They are motivated and are willing to do the work.

Lenora custom harvester driving record, the driver will only have to take the written test and will fall under the grandfather clause on the driving part, Burch said.

However, operators of cars and pick-ups must take written and driving examinations in the vehicle they plan to operate.

"I've had quite a few calls (from custom harvesters)," he said.

Steve Berry, a custom harvester in Lenora, said the law was supposed to affect commercial truckdrivers by serving as a check system and making exceptions for custom harvesters.

He said he would agree with the law if custom harvesters would be exempt. He talked to several representatives and senators who assumed the bill would exempt custom harvesters from the mandatory license.

Berry said the Department of Transportation interpreted the bill's only exemption to be an age requirement.

Drivers, except custom harvesters, must be 21 years old to obtain the Class A license. Custom harvesters must be 18 years old.

Some students are not sure how to meet the current requirements of the federal law.

Jeff Bates, senior in agricultural journalism, has worked for Nelson Harvesting in Wakeeney for the last two summers.

"Nobody was real clear," Bates said. "It's kind of crazy because supposedly, I was going to hear about something in the beginning of the year, and it's the middle of February and I haven't."

Bates has had a commercial driver's license since he started working with Nelson Harvesting.

"He thought it was necessary to be safe, and he thought it would possibly help him avoid liability, anyway," Bates said. "Not everyone operates that way. Safety was important to him in a lot of ways, and we didn't have any accidents all summer."

He said applying for a Class A driver's license will now be a lot tougher.

Doug Minner, sophomore in fine arts, also worked on a harvesting crew.

He was not aware of the change in the law. He said the law may make custom harvesting a little safer, but he didn't think the law was necessary.

"They're pretty thorough about teaching driving and about procedure," Minner said.

Most custom harvesters hire both high school and college students, but they are unsure if the students will be qualified in time.

"It's difficult for me to employ and find employees that are as qualified as ones that are going to school," Berry said. "I've had real good luck with students. They are motivated and are willing to do the work."

Howard Tice, executive director of the Kansas Association of Wheat Growers, said the new law may be inconvenient. College students will be needed in May and must be tested in the vehicle they will be driving.

In Kansas, Class A licenses may only be obtained in five cities, Kansas City, Wichita, Topeka, Hays and Garden City.

Burch said they will try to expand these places to 18 facilities that already have access to an on-line computer.

U.S. Custom Harvesters have been lobbying with the DOT, said Jim Deibert, president of U.S. Custom Harvesters. The voluntary group of 600 custom harvesters represent custom harvesters and lobby the state and federal governments.

Deibert said U.S. Custom Harvesters have been working with insurance companies and initiated several safety procedures on their own.

He said as soon as he learns a new fact, it changes.

"It's very complex," he said. "It'll be difficult for the government to administer."

Most of custom harvesters are in Kansas.

"We are trying to do a good job out here," he said. "We run a check on our drivers. No one can operate if they have a poor driving record because insurance won't cover them."

"I think the government is hiding behind a cloak of safety, and yet I don't think 21 means you automatically become better drivers," he said.

Burch said farmers are exempt if they are performing farmwork within a 150 mile radius. They must have a commercial driver's license, however, if they are hired by someone to perform farm work.

The U.S. Custom Growers applied for two waivers this summer, but they were rejected.

The controversy has gone on for over two years, partly because of the United States involvement with the Persian Gulf War, Berry said.

Reports of Big Red 1 action differ

1st Infantry Division patrol skirmishes with Iraqi unit

By the Associated Press

NORTHERN SAUDI ARABIA — A 1st Infantry Division patrol skirmished early Tuesday with an Iraqi reconnaissance patrol that at times appeared as if it planned to surrender, unit officers said.

The skirmish was just one episode in a busy night along the Saudi-Iraq border, where reporters with forward units heard mortar rounds, artillery firing and frequent overflights by A-10 air-to-ground fighters.

After the skirmish, officers from the Fort Riley-based infantry went through briefings on plans for the allied ground offensive.

The 1st Infantry patrol played cat and mouse with the Iraqi patrol for about four hours before firing machine guns at the Iraqis, reportedly hitting at least one.

Lt. Col. Skip Baker, of Odessa, Texas, commander of the 1st Infantry's 5th Battalion, 16th Infantry, said his men began spotting Iraqi patrols heading south just after midnight Monday.

"We started to pick them up in ones and twos through our thermal sights," Baker said.

He said the leader of one Iraqi patrol appeared to be holding a flag as if trying to attract the attention of U.S. soldiers to surrender.

But as the patrol moved forward, it would periodically drop down into small ditches and disappear, then reappear elsewhere, he said.

After several similar incidents and with the patrol still advancing south, Baker said he decided the unit had given it ample opportunity to surrender.

"We fired them up," Baker said. "We know we hit one; we could see a pool of blood in the thermal sights," said Capt. Rick Orth, of Fort Jefferson, N.Y. He said the men also saw what appeared to be a body lying in a narrow gully.

"I thought about ordering another burst into the gully," Orth said. "But I didn't. If I had it to do over again, I probably should have."

Orth said he expected some problems as his unit had its combat baptism, but none materialized.

"You'd expect when the firing started to have a mad minute," Orth said. "But only the two I ordered to do so fired. We didn't shoot indiscriminately."

Baker said the division's soldiers have been told to put a premium on

Fort Riley says accounts inaccurate; no deaths yet confirmed by officials

DAVID FRESE
Staff Reporter

Three 1st Infantry Division soldiers were injured Sunday when a Hellfire missile fired from a U.S. Apache helicopter struck the vehicle in which they were riding.

Fort Riley public affairs specialist Patrice Macan said the soldiers were part of Company B 101st military intelligence battalion. She said she could not comment on the battalion's mission. Injuries were not considered serious, Macan said, but names were being withheld pending notification of relatives.

Macan said she did not know if this incident was the same incident that appeared in Tuesday's K-State Collegian where six soldiers were said to be injured. She could not confirm the validity of the Los Angeles Times report cited in the article.

Fort Riley officials said the Times report stating two 1st Infantry Division soldiers were killed was incorrect.

Mark Meseke, public affairs officer, said his office had not received any word of deaths in the 1st Infantry Division. Meseke said there were two soldiers killed by Iraqi mortar fire who were with the 2nd Armored Division (Forward), a division assigned with the 1st Division in Saudi Arabia.

Meseke said two 1st Division soldiers were injured Feb. 14, and the injuries were relatively minor. They were treated and released, he said.

taking Iraqi prisoners, in hopes they will provide valuable intelligence.

"I tell my soldiers that every live prisoner is worth 100 dead guys," he said.

Baker said it was unclear to him whether the Iraqis learned much from their probe.

"I don't know what he learned except if he gets too close, I'll shoot him," Baker said.

In other matters, President Bush on Tuesday rejected a Soviet peace proposal, saying there must be no negotiations and no concessions to gain Iraqi withdrawal from Kuwait. He did not disclose details of the plan.

A senior Iraqi official was quoted by an Iranian newspaper Tuesday as saying more than 20,000 Iraqis were killed and 60,000 wounded in the first four weeks of the war.

Black history speaker focuses on mankind, religious thought

SUZANNE BROWN
Collegian Reporter

Sprinkled with passages of poetry and song, Peggy Brooks-Bertram spoke about African-American culture and its history Tuesday night in All Faiths Chapel.

Brooks-Bertram was part of a visiting lecture series recognizing Black History Month. The lecture was titled "African-American Culture: A Second Look: Investigating the Black Church in African-American History" and focused on the origins of mankind and religious thought stemming out of the heart of Africa.

Brooks-Bertram began her studies in December 1987, after attending a lecture focusing on the history of Egypt. Her first studies took her to Greece, Africa and Egypt. Brooks-Bertram said the important fact in studying Africa is having a clear understanding of Europe.

Brooks-Bertram identified several historical junctures blacks and Americans can examine to understand the African-American culture.

The first juncture is the enslavement of blacks. Brooks-Bertram said this was the world's major holocaust.

"Africans were providing labor for Americans, and many were the sons of kings," she said.

"Then there was the juncture of the Civil War, where African-Americans had to show their stuff," Brooks-Bertram said. "This took us into the era of segregation."

Brooks-Bertram said African history should be the center of world history.

She said Martin Luther King Jr. struggled to figure out what to say to white people to make them change their hearts concerning people of other colors. Brooks-Bertram said he should have sought the answers in the history of Africa, which she referred to as the deepest moral well.

Brooks-Bertram said the next juncture was desegregation. She said entrenched, institutional racism is when white children and African children sit together every day, yet the white children know where they come from, and the black children don't.

White children often think they are superior to the black children, who often think they are inferior, she said.

"We have to understand where we are, why we are where we are and what is going to be done about it," Brooks-Bertram said.

Brooks-Bertram is currently the project director of the National Institute's Drug Abuse and Housing and Urban Development project. She writes an education column for the Buffalo Challenger and is an artist, poet, playwright, historical dramatist and political activist.

K-Staters to compete

Forensics team members qualify for national tournament

MARLA ROCKHOLD
Collegian Reporter

The K-State forensics team currently has 11 individuals qualified in one or more events for the national competition in Tacoma, Wash., in April.

Laura Pelletier, senior in speech and president of the team, said to qualify for nationals an individual must place third or better in an event at three different tournaments or place in the top 10 percent at district tournaments.

"A lot more people are close to qualifying," Pelletier said. She said they still have a chance to qualify in the remaining tournaments or at district competition in March, which will be in Austin, Texas.

Pelletier is qualified in two events and is hoping to make it in two more.

This will be Pelletier's fourth year competing at nationals. She said each year of experience has made her better. Last year, Pelletier made it to the quarterfinals.

Tim Schultz, freshman in radio and television, has also qualified for nationals. To keep from getting nervous about competing against the top people in the nation, he said he thinks of it as just another tournament.

Schultz said he is not expecting to win because it will be his first time at nationals.

Crystal Harding, junior in speech, has also qualified.

"The hardest thing to do at nationals will be keeping (the speech) fresh," she said.

She said when speeches have been memorized for a long time, there is a tendency to go on autopilot and give the speech without emotion.

Craig Brown, forensics coach, said this year's team is very talented and is the best team K-State has had since 1982. The 1982 team placed eighth in the nation.

"We are the best team in Kansas and arguably, in Nebraska and Oklahoma," he said. "We have a certain degree of intimidation in the area."

Pelletier said this team is successful because of good coaching and dedication.

"I also think one of the most important things is attitude," he said. "Show the judges that you like what you are doing."

Brown said the whole team has the potential to place in the top 20 at nationals.

"But some individuals have the ability to make it to the finals," he said.

"It takes more than talent to do well at nationals," he said. "When you get to a certain level, there's always talent. The thing we're missing is experience and desire."

Brown said until nationals the forensics team is trying to make a name for themselves at the remaining tournaments, which will include national competitors.

"We want to establish a certain degree of intimidation rationally," he said.

Gorbachev's resignation demanded

MOSCOW (AP) — Boris Yeltsin made an unprecedented televised appeal Tuesday for the resignation of Mikhail Gorbachev, accusing the Soviet president of sacrificing reforms in a drive for personal power.

Yeltsin has been a strident and frequent critic of Gorbachev, but never before called for him to step down. The attack seemed certain to aggravate the enmity between the two men and to heighten the Soviet political crisis.

"I warned in 1987 that Gorbachev has in his character a tendency to absolute personal power," Yeltsin said. "He has done all that and has led the country to a dictatorship, giving it a pretty name: presidential rule."

As president of Russia, the largest Soviet republic, Yeltsin enjoys immense personal popularity but has had difficulty parlaying that into the kind of political power Gorbachev wields.

Man lights himself afire at protest

AMHERST, Mass. (AP) — A man carrying a peace sign set himself on fire and died Monday, refusing help from onlookers who tried to smother the flames, police said.

Witnesses told police the man doused himself with a flammable liquid, lit a match and was engulfed by flames, said Officer Charles Flahive.

Several people tried to put out the flames using their coats, but the man refused help. A police officer put out the flames with a fire extinguisher.

Police could not immediately say what motivated the man. The incident occurred on the Amherst common, scene of protests against the gulf war.

A Massachusetts driver's license, believed to belong to the victim, was taped to the sign, which said only "peace," police said. They did not release his name but said he was 20 years old.

Escapée returned to county jail

MINNEAPOLIS (AP) — Michael White, a 22-year-old man who has escaped from custody twice, is back in jail after eluding authorities in Kansas and Illinois for several days.

Ottawa County Sheriff Ken White, who is not related to Michael White, said he apparently walked to freedom last Thursday, because someone left the cell doors at the Ottawa County Jail unlocked.

"I don't know who did it. There are a lot of us in and out of there," the sheriff said. "It could have been me who left the damn thing unlocked."

It is the second time Michael White has escaped. White, from the Chicago area, was arrested in Minneapolis in October after escaping from a prison in Joliet, Ill., where he was serving time for auto theft.

Farmland values continue to fall

DES MOINES, Iowa (AP) — The rise in farmland values slowed appreciably in late 1990, according to bankers in the upper Midwest.

More than three out of four of the farm bankers surveyed by the Federal Reserve Bank of Chicago also said they expect continued sluggish agricultural real estate markets in early 1991.

The survey of 425 agricultural bankers in five states said average farmland values for the region nudged up 0.3 percent in the fourth quarter and rose 4.3 percent for all of 1990, the Federal Reserve Bank of Chicago reported.

The report by economist Gary Benjamin attributed the slower growth in late 1990 to fears of falling farm income. Those fears are the result of declines in government supports in the 1990 farm bill, uncertainty caused by mounting tensions in the Persian Gulf, rising oil prices, falling grain and milk prices, and stalled international trade talks.

The 1990 gain was the smallest since the recovery in farmland values from a plunge that, in parts of the Midwest, was steeper than the collapse in agricultural land prices in the Great Depression.

Committee endorses MOE-funding bill

TOPEKA (AP) — Turning aside a senator's plea for time to study its impact on Kansas-Missouri border merchants, the Senate Assessment and Taxation Committee Tuesday endorsed a bill to raise cigarette and tobacco taxes to increase funding for higher education.

Six of the 11 members of the committee voted in a show of hands for a motion to recommend the bill for passage. That sent it to the Senate, but Sen. Fred Kerr, the majority leader, said it would not be debated for some time.

"Until we determine whether this bill is consistent with what we are trying to do this session, as far as taxes are concerned, it will not be debated," Kerr said.

Gov. Joan Finney has proposed a large tax increase by expanding the sales tax base, but Kerr and other Republican leaders say her proposal is in serious trouble and the Legislature may wind up cutting the budget and not increasing taxes.

The bill would increase Kansas' tax on cigarettes from 24 cents a pack to 33 cents a pack and on other tobacco products by 5 percent, generating an estimated $18 million a year in new revenue.

It would commit the new revenue to the state Board of Regents' Margin of Excellence program of increased funding for university faculty salaries and program enhancement.

Endorsement came despite the effort of Sen. Phil Martin, D-Pittsburg, to buy time for a study of the potential impact on border sales of cigarettes — if Kansas increases its tax significantly above the tax charged in Missouri.

Human bones found along road

BELLE PLAINE (AP) — A human skull and bones were found scattered in a tree hedgerow along a county road.

Sumner County Sheriff Brad Clum said Tuesday the Kansas Bureau of Investigation was assisting his office in the case. He said it appeared animals had scattered the bones. Clum refused to give the location of the discovery or reveal who found the bones on Monday.

Clum said he could not tell from the bones if the person died violently, how old the person was or what sex.

Reviewer picks more 1991 Grammy winners

Hard rock category 'thunderstruck' by AC/DC comeback

ERIC MELIN
Collegian Reviewer

Tonight are the ever-so-unpredictable 33rd Annual Grammy Awards. Today I continue to stick my neck out and predict the winners.

Nominated for Best Male Rock Vocal Performance is Billy Idol's song about his pre-teen passions, "Cradle of Love"; Eric Clapton's song about Billy Idol's song about pre-teen passions, "Bad Love"; Joe Cocker's rebuttal of old-fashioned table manners, "You Can Leave Your Hat On"; Jon Bon Jovi's breakaway song from his group that sounds exactly like — you guessed it — Bon Jovi, "Blaze of Glory"; and Neil Young's sarcastic view of American politics, "Rockin' in the Free World."

The Grammy will, no doubt, go to Clapton. Although he has made a big comeback commercially, he seems to have lost his sound to other guitarists artistically.

The Rolling Stones got a token nomination for a song nobody's ever heard, "Almost Hear You Sigh." Other nominees for Best Rock Vocal Performance by a Duo or Group include Midnight Oil for their album "Blue Sky Mining," Aerosmith for "Janie's Got a Gun," the Red Hot Chili Peppers for "Higher Ground," and INXS for "Suicide Blonde." Since Aerosmith's album "Pump" was well-received critically and commercially, they have the award all tied up. My choice, however, would be the Red Hot Chili Peppers for pushing the envelope of rock music with their fresh style.

The Best Metal Performance category has been the most controversial of the constantly expanding divisions. Two years ago, the Grammy was given to Jethro Tull over the favorite, Metallica. Following a large public outcry, the Academy split the category into metal and hard rock. Last year, they supposedly righted their wrong by giving Metallica a Grammy after all.

This year, they're nominated again for "Stone Cold Crazy," a Queen cover featured on Elektra Records' new compilation album, "Rubaiyat." Other nominees include a disease cows can transmit to humans (Anthrax for "Persistence of Time") the death of a million people by nuclear explosion (Megadeth for "Rust in Peace") the thoughts of a highly depressed man (Suicidal Tendencies for "Lights...Camera...Revolution") and the disciple who betrayed Jesus (Judas Priest for "Painkiller"). Since their acquittal in court, Judas Priest members have become free-speech martyrs and will win on that alone.

All the nominees for Best Hard Rock Performance have been nominated before. Living Colour won last year, so "Time's Up" is out, but other than that, this is the biggest toss-up this year. Faith No More, my favorite, for some reason was a Metal nominee last year. Now, with "Epic," they jump to Hard Rock. Those crazy Grammys. Motley Crue is up for "Kickstart My Heart," AC/DC for "The Razor's Edge," and Jane's Addiction for "Ritual de lo Habitual." Since comebacks are always popular, AC/DC will more than likely win.

Best Rap Solo Performance features the best in stolen hooks. Vanilla Ice's "Ice Ice Baby" lifts the entire chorus of "Under Pressure" by Queen and David Bowie, and M.C. Hammer's "U Can't Touch This" steals its hook from "Superfreak" by Rick James. Ice will probably win if Hammer captures Song of the Year, but none of the other nominees stand a chance.

DJ Jazzy Jeff & Fresh Prince, last year's winners, are again nominated for Best Rap Performance by a Duo or Group for "And in this Corner." Unfortunately, the judges won't go for Public Enemy's compelling and daring "Fear of a Black Planet," but they might go for a positive anti-gang message with "We're All in the Same Gang" by the West Coast Rap All-Stars. More likely, Digital Underground's "The Humpty Dance," a big hit on the radio, will win.

That's about all I've got room for, so tune in tonight, and laugh at me tomorrow.

Dean candidates visit K-State

CHRISTINE SPLICAL
Collegian Reporter

Four of five candidates for dean of the College of Business Administration have visited the University in the past two weeks.

Ali Fatemi, chairman of the dean search committee and head of the finance department, said he hopes a new dean will be chosen from the five by mid-March.

"We will clock the input of the faculty, staff, students, administrators and area business people," Fatemi said. "We will take into consideration this input from the five constituencies the dean would have to deal with and the candidates' own merits before making a recommendation to the provost."

One of the five finalists, Linda Pickthorne Fletcher, has been the dean of the School of Business and Public Affairs at West Chester University in Pennsylvania since 1987. Before that, she was the department chair and professor of finance at Old Dominion University in Virginia. Fletcher was also director of the Insurance and Financial Services Center at Old Dominion.

Fletcher has written 42 publications in her career and is a member of the Phi Kappa Phi honorary. She received her Ph.D. in applied economics and did post-doctoral work in finance at the Wharton School of Business at the University of Pennsylvania.

Another candidate, William Westlake, received his doctorate in international economics and his master's in international affairs from the Fletcher School of Law and Diplomacy at Tufts University. He received a bachelor's from Northwestern University in political science.

Westlake is currently the vice president and general manager of the AMR Corp., including AMR Services and American Airlines. Before 1988, he served with the Beech Aircraft Corp. as vice president and general manager of the international marketing division.

A third candidate, Larry Trussell, received his doctorate from the University of Arkansas and his bachelor's and master's from Fort Hays State University. He has been the dean of the College of Business Administration at the University of Nebraska at Omaha since 1979.

During his time at Nebraska, he led the formation of a new accounting program, received several research grants and served on 18 accreditation teams. Trussell has also had broad consulting experience and written 14 publications.

A fourth candidate, Dennis Leyden, is the dean of the College of Business and Industry at Mississippi State University. With the college since 1982, he supervises 74 faculty members and more than 3,200 students.

Leyden received his doctorate in economics from the University of Virginia and his bachelor's in industrial management from Clemson University. He has written more than 25 publications and has experience at the national and international levels.

The fifth candidate, J. Clay Singleton, is the associate dean of the College of Business Administration at the University of Nebraska at Lincoln. He was received his doctorate and his M.B.A. from the University of Missouri at Columbia.

Singleton is the associate editor of two journals — the Financial Review and the Journal of Midwest Finance Association. He has also written 15 articles since 1978.

Fatemi said, "This is a time-consuming and taxing process (searching for a new dean) but one that is both necessary and very important."

Stereotypes shape relationships with self

Despite my efforts to tear down the stereotypes I employ in my life, I continue to use them. And perhaps most surprising of all, I am beginning to realize that I stereotype myself as much as I stereotype others. A brief jaunt into "enemy territory" last weekend made this clear to me. Let me explain.

I have a good friend named Dave who lives in Lawrence and goes to school at the University of Kansas. I met him several years ago while we were both students at another school, that is to say, a school other than K-State or KU.

At any rate, Dave and I started out our undergraduate work together. We both became English majors, and our similar course interests helped to make us good friends.

Dave and I also share an obsession with the idea of the suffering artist. Our futures involve this persona. I think I can speak for both of us when I write that we want to live in an environment conducive to artistic creation. At some point we want to live in an artistic community.

I think I can also say each of us includes the other in our respective visualizations of this artistic community. Each of us sees the other as a part of the population of suffering artists in the artistic community we someday hope to inhabit.

Dave and I still share our interests in these ideas. They are rooted in our pasts. But I don't see too much of Dave anymore. I drifted away to K-State before my undergraduate work was finished. Dave finished as an undergraduate at the school where we met, and then (being a Jayhawk fan) moved to Lawrence to begin his graduate work.

Dave and I took different courses in our lives. From those different decisions, we became different people despite the basis of the ideals we shared and continue to share. That's not to say we were ever so alike, but our different environments have not only distanced us physically, but have distanced us in other ways as well.

I went to visit Dave last weekend, and the trip made me very aware of the space between us. I drove to Lawrence, and the physical distance I had to travel gave me a sense of how far apart we really are. But the physical distance between Manhattan and Lawrence stood for so much more. As Dave himself expressed it (quoting from an old Grateful Dead song): "What a long, strange trip it's been."

The differences our past decisions have made in our separate lives were made even more palpable for us on this particular weekend because of the K-State — KU game on Saturday. We both felt the pressure that the standing competition between our schools put on us this weekend.

"Welcome to enemy territory," Dave told me when I arrived at his apartment in Lawrence.

It was funny, and I laughed a little. Dave laughed too, but our laughter was kind of nervous. I had taken the K-State parking permit out of my car window, knowing it was best to enter the camp of the enemy without announcing that I was from the other side. Furthermore, I knew that (as a Wildcat) I wasn't like the people at KU. Because I was aware of the basketball game between the two schools, my awareness of my difference from "those people" (not to mention Dave) was heightened.

Who did I stereotype more in my assumptions, Dave or myself? It was a simple, unnecessary set of assumptions that made us nervous, that separated us despite our mutual, deeper-running artistic interests. The personality of our already-established suffering artist persona was in the balance for a moment, caught up in the strings of a conflict that really didn't involve either Dave or myself in any personal way.

We both sensed the situation, heard the nervous laughter and changed the subject. Dave started telling me about a play he'd been reading for a class. He said it was of the "absurdist" movement and that it had a dream-like logic that functioned within the logical constructs of the play, but that seemed ridiculous in the real world.

Dave's description of the play's logic struck me as particularly relevant to the situation at hand. We seemed gripped in a similar dream-like logic, caught in a set of assumptions and stereotypes that seemed to function only within the structural boundaries of the competition between our schools.

It really had nothing to do with us. Yet the friendship that had long ago grown between Dave and myself was, if not threatened, at least limited by a rivalry that had never mattered before. To make the matter even stranger, Dave and I both know I'm not much of a basketball fan, and that my relationship with K-State is anything but sports-related. Why did the competition suddenly make a difference?

I am amazed by the similarities between real life and bad fiction. As a man who wants to be a writer, I am forever bothered by the elements of my life that no one would believe if I wrote them into a book. So much of my life seems this way. The logic of an individual life is not the same logic that applies to life as a whole. Instead, the logic of an individual life is something supremely personal that does not always make sense. So often I find myself trapped by my own ideas, enclosed in circumstances I recognize as not quite right, yet which seem too absurd to even acknowledge as real problems.

Maybe our lives are closed systems. Nothing penetrates them without being in some way fashioned and shaped by our own experience. Nothing that enters our lives does so without being automatically interpreted by the familiar circumstances of our own assumptions about this thing, life. No picture, situation or person can be experienced outside of this "self" we carry with us, as inseparable from us as our skins.

And because we as people depend upon conventions to help make our lives seem familiar, we are forever fleeing to our stereotypes and our established competitions. I am different from my Jayhawk friend Dave not because of the significant personal differences that should enhance our friendship, but because he and I have made reasonable decisions that have separated us in obvious ways which shouldn't really make a difference.

But Dave and I are still good friends, and I am still struggling to overcome these stereotypes I so depend on. Who knows where I'll end up once they're gone? I doubt I'll ever be a basketball fan. But I hope that wherever this long, strange trip takes me, the enemy territory will never seem so foreign that I can't relate to the people who live there.

After all, even Lawrence is bound to have an artistic community.

Good vs. bad roles not easily cast on gulf war participants

There are no black and white hats to help distinguish the "good guys" from the "bad guys" in the Persian Gulf War, so the public is forced to decide on its own which country is playing what role.

That should be really easy because we, as a nation, have been told since birth that the United States is always the good guy. So, of course, the United States is wearing the white hat and, Iraq is wearing the black.

Or is that necessarily true? Iraqi troops, under Saddam Hussein's lead, invaded another country — Kuwait. So it's pretty easy to justify putting black hats on them, but that doesn't mean the United States deserves a white one.

In retaliation to Iraq's invasion, the United States and its allies have involved themselves in the war by fighting the Iraqi forces, and although exact numbers of fatalities are not available, the Allied Forces have been responsible for deaths of not only Iraqi soldiers, but also Iraqi citizens.

On Feb. 13, allied warplanes bombed an underground bomb shelter containing a reported 500 or more citizens.

Since the bombing, the U.S. administration has said the bomb shelter was in actuality a camouflaged military bunker, and Saddam put the citizens there as human shields to keep the United States from firing at it.

Well, if that's true, Saddam's plan should have worked. Five hundred citizens should have been enough of a reason not to bomb a location, regardless of what it was.

If it's not enough, what separates the United States from Iraq?

Certainly not the color of their hats.

■ Editor's note: This is the third of three editorials concerning the Allied Forces' bombing of an Iraqi bomb shelter Wednesday.

Quote misled

Editor,

A partial quotation from my comments at the Feb. 16 Gulf Forum (in the Feb. 18 Collegian) could result in some confusion. I was quoted as saying, "It's never too late to withdraw," which could imply that I was calling for the United States to withdraw now from the gulf. I was not.

The complete sentence was, "It's never too late to withdraw our acquiescence in this policy." This was in reference to our government's policy of refusing to stop the bombing of the Iraqi people long enough to permit further negotiations. My point had been this war is only tolerated, not enthusiastically supported, by the majority of Americans, and if sufficient consideration were being given to the human costs of our policy, that tolerance would end. We would demand our leaders negotiate a way for all foreign occupations in the Middle East to end, thereby saving the lives of Americans, Kuwaitis, Iraqis, Palestinians and many others.

Second-hand reply

Editor,

This letter is written in response to a letter to the editor titled "Smokers unite" in the Feb. 18 issue of the Collegian. The relevant part of that letter is a request for some reasoning behind Student Senate's decision to pass a resolution in support of a ban on smoking in the K-State Union.

Neil Payne reports that he and 26 other concerned students took the time to attend this meeting. I would like to reiterate the Senate's thanks to them (the concerned students) for putting forth such effort. I feel confident their presentations had an impact on the senators. The closeness of the final vote reflects that.

However, the majority of the Senate finds reason to support the resolution. Some of those reasons are as follows:

1.) The right of non-smokers to breathe clean air. While Dr. Larry Moeller did suggest that being in a smoke-filled environment may triple the risk of certain cancers, a more relevant point is the unpleasant aspects of smoke to non-smokers. This is similar to restrictions on the playing of loud music in public places or performing other acts that may be termed as public nuisance.

2.) The failure of previous compromises. This is not an off-the-cuff proposal, nor has it been simply all or nothing. The entire Union was a smoking area at one time. Then smoking was only allowed in certain areas including the Stateroom. More recently, smoking has been prohibited in the Stateroom. In each case, the restriction of smoking to certain areas has not eliminated the side effects associated with smoking.

3.) Cost to the students. Testimony given at the Senate meeting reported that the additional monetary cost of allowing smoking in part of the Union is tremendous. The additional cleaning required for smoking areas costs $8,000 to $10,000 per year. The cost of replacing and refinishing cigarette-burnt furniture is prohibitive. Damaged furniture remains on display in the Union because it is too expensive to replace.

4.) Most importantly, our constituents asked us to pass it. Like most of the senators, I asked many students for their opinion. The consensus was in favor of the ban. For example, the Graduate Student Council voted unanimously for the resolution.

The actual reasons for the final decision probably vary from senator to senator. The points I have listed above are merely the points from the debate I found most pertinent. If you have further concerns, I urge you to express them to the Union Governing Board. The Senate resolution was only the beginning of the debate, not the end.

Fans respond

Editor,

There seems to be some slight misunderstanding between Jeff Bessette, Greg Rosa and the front-row fans who are dedicated enough to show up at Bramlage Coliseum more than four hours before the basketball gates open (Feb. 13, Collegian letters to the Editor). It seems to us that to rag on others, Bessette and Rosa should, being seniors, already have learned the times when it is appropriate to do so. Just think about it; to say Iowa State sucks when they are winning by more than 20 points is very naive and unsportsmanlike.

We are not advocating censorship by denying the right of free speech. Students, however, should be able to recognize when restraint is prudent. Please don't denounce us in this way; we love to yell and yell loudly. These are unjust accusations, but we feel that Bessette and Rosa's "vocal enthusiasm" can best be displayed in other ways besides, "Hey, remember last year," and "Thigpen, can you spell defense?" Only Thigpen's report sums up the way we feel toward this type of behavior. He said, "Remember this year," and, "Look at the score."

Perhaps it is not us who should be selling our tickets. If you cannot handle losing, maybe the University of Nevada, Las Vegas is your type of team. Also, if you do not like the people currently inhabiting the front row, you are more than welcome to show up five hours early for the final two games.

By the way, we would like to thank Bessette and Rosa for leaving early.

Headline attacked

Editor,

I must express my anger at the anti-war bias of your newspaper. Last week this finally got out of hand when the Collegian printed the headline "Allies bomb shelter; 500 dead." When you read further, you discover that it was an enemy official who was quoted as saying this. Further still, U.S. sources say it was a legitimate military target. Why do you accept the claims of a deluded government over our own as headline material?

Now that there is no plausible diplomatic solution and Saddam Hussein has vowed to kill us all, do you want to aid him in causing unrest? You are only helping the enemy. Headlines are supposed to give an overview of the story, not only one slant or angle of it. Persons who only read the headlines are victims of your bias and think we have committed some "great atrocity." Perhaps you should hire some headline writers and columnists who don't share your same anti-war stand on the conflict, and in turn give your readers the whole story.

Wildcats fall to ranked Cowboys, 76-65

JENIFER SCHEIBLER
Sports Reporter

AP Top 25 2, K-State 0.

The K-State men's basketball team is winless this week against nationally ranked teams, but has gone down fighting.

The Wildcats were gunned down, 76-65, by a hot-shooting Oklahoma State team last night in Bramlage Coliseum.

This loss follows a 67-65 loss to 11th-ranked KU last Saturday.

The 18th-ranked Cowboys tallied a 71.4 percent shooting effort in the second 20 minutes to complete their first series sweep of the struggling Wildcats since 1983.

Coach Dana Altman said he partially attributed the loss to poor shot selection by his team.

"Tonight I thought we took some real questionable shots," he said.

He said OSU's defense shut down many shots that are often open for the Wildcats and caused the players to adjust and take shots they don't regularly take.

Cowboy coach Eddie Sutton agreed regarding his team's defense.

"In the second half I thought we played more like we've been playing," he said. "Our defense came through for us, especially in the last 15 minutes of the contest."

Neither of the teams could seem to find a rhythm during the first 20 minutes of the game.

The lead was never greater than six points as each team struggled to establish itself offensively and defensively.

The frustration built until tempers flared underneath the basket between the Cowboys' Byron Houston and K-State's Wylie Howard at the 1:49 mark of the first half.

Houston was called for an intentional foul and Howard a flagrant foul, which results in ejection from the game and suspension from the next conference match-up.

When play resumed, OSU's John Potter hit a 15-footer to put the Cowboys up 30-26.

For the Wildcats, John Rettiger and Jean Derouillere each hit shots to cut the lead to one point (30-29) at halftime.

The Wildcats opened the second half by capitalizing on Cowboy turnovers to take the lead, 35-32, at the 17:33 mark of the game.

K-State's sticky man-to-man defense kept the game close until the Cowboys got started offensively with 12:18 left in the game.

The game was tied at 41 when OSU broke open a 10-point lead on a 16-6 run.

The Wildcats cut the lead to eight with 1:13 remaining in the game on a steal and shot by Derouillere, who lead the team with 17 points.

But timely free throw shooting by the Cowboys solidified their victory.

A bright spot in the game was the play of Maurice Brittan.

The 6-9 senior got rolling in the paint early in the second half and finished the game with 16 points.

Brittan was eager to go head to head with the Cowboy big men.

"I wanted the ball," he said. "When I got the ball, I didn't think anyone could stop me from scoring."

A combined scoring effort from Oklahoma State's Houston and Potter spelled demise for the 'Cats, finishing with 22 and 17 points respectively.

Potter, a 6-8 forward, was lighting it up outside the paint with 6-of-8 shooting from the field (3-of-5 from three-point range).

Houston showcased his athletic ability by scoring well inside during the second half.

Brittan expressed frustration with the homecourt loss.

"The effort was there," he said. "We just came up short."

Lady Cats to play OSU

Cowgirls looking to avenge earlier defeat in Manhattan

BILL LANG
Sports Reporter

It's probably the last thing they need.

The Lady Cats, mired in a two-game losing streak and, having lost four out of the last five, travel to face 25th-ranked Oklahoma State tonight in Stillwater, Okla.

The Cowgirls — winners of the Big Eight regular season title — have won their last six games. That's every game since the 76-72 overtime loss to the Lady Cats Jan. 26.

However, K-State coach Susan Yow sees a change in the Lady Cats' future.

"Practice went really, really well," she said. "We practiced hard Sunday and Monday, and have a short practice Tuesday, and we'll see where we stand."

Yow added that quality practices have resulted in some confidence building. Some additional confidence can be found in the victory taken from the Cowgirls earlier this season.

"We've beaten them here, and that does help," she said. "We also know that we match up well with them. What really helps is that we are much quicker than they are, and that helps us on the defensive end."

In the last game, K-State was able to force O-State's All-Big Eight performer Liz Brown to the outside, which draws away from her passing ability. Another factor in the Lady Cats' win was being able to make the Cowgirls rush their shots.

"We played a matchup zone, and they had not seen much of that up to that point," she said. "It forced them to take some hurried shots. We're going to give it a try again."

"They are not a one-dimensional team, and that makes them tough to play," Yow added. "Lisa McGill just about killed us in the first half, but we pretty much shut her down in the second half. We'll have to do that again if we're going to be successful."

Fortunately for K-State, the Cowgirls did not have one of their better shooting nights that January evening.

Even though the Big Eight regular season title belongs to the Cowgirls, O-State coach Dick Halterman said he felt his team still has the drive to prove itself a better team.

"If we have some complacency,

I'll be surprised," he said. "We're a team that's playing good basketball right now, and we are taking it one game at a time."

Halterman said if Brown continues her success against the Lady Cats, the Cowgirls stand a chance of winning.

"Liz has always had good games against them," he said. "It's just that they defend the rest of the team pretty well. If we can get the rest of the team open, then I think that we'll do pretty well."

For the Lady Cats, the role of spoiler has taken on a new meaning to Yow as they head into the final two games of the season.

"Our team needs to decide whether they want to stay with the (top teams in the Big Eight) or let it get away," she said. "This is beyond the Xs and Os. It's in their hands as to how they want to play."

"I'm not down, and neither is the rest of the coaching staff. It's in their hands. If they want to win, they are going to have to do it within the system. We're looking down the road a little, and we have a lot of potential. We're going to keep laying the foundation for the Lady Cats."

Women's golf team takes 5th in opener

ERIC BROWN
Sports Reporter

When K-State's women's golf team opened the season in Jacksonville, Fla., at the North/South Collegiate Invitational Monday and Tuesday, the plans included more than just sun and surf. The team was on a mission.

And what a statement it made. K-State had the lowest round — 326 — on Tuesday's 18 holes, helping to leave behind the nearest Big Eight school by 43 strokes. Also competing from the conference were Iowa State, which finished eighth; Nebraska, 10th; and Missouri, a distant 14th.

Wichita State also competed, finishing 12th. Tuesday's performance ranked only four strokes off the school record set back in October. "We're quite pleased the way we stack up against the other Big Eight schools," K-State assistant golf coach Mark Elliott said. "We also beat a good Ohio State team and Northern Illinois, which is ranked No. 25 in the country."

The Wildcats placed fifth out of the 18 teams that competed, with a score of 986 over three rounds of play, a mere nine strokes from second place. The meet consisted of 36 holes on Monday and a final 18 on Tuesday.

Ahead of the 'Cats were host team Jacksonville, Mississippi, Texas A&M and South Alabama.

The success catapults the expectations for the upcoming season, considering the season opener was completed with limited preparation time.

"I'm quite pleased how well we're playing with the little amount of practice time we have had outdoors," Elliott said. "It says a lot about the competitive nature of the team."

The meet was divided between the North and the South, and nine teams competed per side. The North side won easily — a better than 500 stroke margin — by placing seven teams in the top 10. Only Texas A&M placed better than K-State for the North coalition.

The Wildcats received impressive results from Adena Hagedorn and Valerie Hahn, who tied for fourth with scores of 237, two strokes off the pace.

Also scoring for the Wildcats were Chris Adams, 248; Theresa Coyle, 265; and Denise Pottle, 272.

The 'Cats did struggle with the longer holes, which both showed areas that needed practice as well as indicate even higher finishes in the meets to come.

Physical play ends in fight

SCOTT PASKE
Sports Reporter

Oklahoma State's Byron Houston called the lane a war zone when the Cowboys and K-State battled three weeks ago in Stillwater, Okla.

Houston and Wildcat forward Wylie Howard added validity to the label Tuesday.

Howard was ejected for fighting after a series of elbows were thrown by both players late in the first half. His final blow, to the back of Houston's head, also resulted in a one-game suspension, which Howard will serve Saturday at Nebraska.

"I just lost my composure," Howard said. "I guess it was just a human feeling. That's not the way to go about things, but he got me with probably about three elbows."

"That can take a toll on you."

Houston, who was whistled for an intentional foul, said the incident motivated him for the remainder of the game. He finished with a game-high 22 points.

"It kind of woke me up," Houston said. "Coach (Eddie Sutton) said they were trying to get to me, get inside my head. It's kind of bad that it happened, but we were able to pull together."

It was the second straight year for Houston and a K-State player to fight in a game at Bramlage Coliseum. Houston and former 'Cat forward Lance Simmons were the warriors in K-State's 66-60 win last season.

"Coach Sutton has taken me aside and tried to get me to eliminate things like the cheap shots of last year," Houston said. "Coaches and players say I do this and I do that, but once you're inside, they do the same things to me."

While Howard and K-State coach Dana Altman agreed that Howard should have been ejected, the pair felt Houston helped fuel the scuffle.

"I don't know if he knows he does it, or he does it on purpose," Howard said. "I don't look at that type of play as being physical ... that's flagrant."

"It's awfully difficult for a player to take a couple blows to the head and not retaliate," Altman said. "I think anybody who has played basketball would agree with that. Wylie took two shots before he threw a punch."

Oklahoma State coach Eddie Sutton said the incident was handled well by the officiating crew of Ron Spidler, Willie Sanchez and Jim Harvey.

Regents look at library funding

ANDREW CAPPS
Collegian Reporter

Brice Hobrock, dean of libraries, met with the Kansas Board of Regents last week to propose K-State's $28-million expansion plan for Farrell Library.

Although the board will not review the proposal until April, Hobrock said he believes the meeting went well.

The proposal is an outline for what should be a priority in updating the library, Hobrock said.

"We have the smallest library in the Big Eight, but I think we give a high quality of service here that meets the needs of many students," Hobrock said.

The new plan will allow seating for 10 percent of the student body. National standards are set by the board to allow seating for 25 percent of the student body.

Currently, K-State is 4,000 seats below the regents' standards for seating and well below the national standards for space.

Hobrock said the objective of the consultants was to find out if there is a shortage of space, and if so, how much. This plan is based on growth projections and on space requirements for the next 30 years.

The proposed 30-year project would consolidate the math/physics and chemistry/biochemistry branch

There is no federal money available for these kinds of projects that we are aware of.

libraries into a new complex and would renovate Farrell stacks. President Jon Wefald said he believed the consultants did an excellent job of defining and focusing on the needs of the library and developing strategies for the new additions.

"There are many needs on the regents' campuses and also on this campus," Hobrock said.

Hobrock said it would be helpful for students to express their interest for the project to begin as soon as possible.

"There is no federal money available for these kinds of projects that we are aware of," Hobrock said. "To achieve the goal," Wefald said, "it will take a team effort from the community, students, private donors and the state."

Hobrock and Wefald agreed it will take a considerable amount of time for the plans to be completed and estimated seven or eight years before the plan is complete.

Hobrock said students could expect to see changes being made in the next two to three years.

"I believe that if we do get private and student involvement that the state will then be obligated to do their part," he said.

Wefald said, "We are very confident that K-State will get a new library-renovation plan. We will work on it very strenuously."

Spring enrollment down to 19,046

On-campus numbers increase as off-campus figures drop due to war

KIMBERLY KOHLS
Staff Reporter

The total spring enrollment for K-State is down 135 from a record of 19,046 in spring 1990.

The Registrar's Office reported the on- and off-campus total enrollment at K-State is 18,909, as of the 20th day of classes.

While total enrollment is down, on-campus enrollment is 18,113. This figure is up 402 from last spring.

President Jon Wefald attributed the decrease in total enrollment partly to Operation Desert Storm and the Big Red One leaving Fort Riley.

He said the on-campus figure was right on target with expected enrollment.

"We have improved our retention of students," Wefald said. "We've put a greater emphasis on the advising of freshmen and sophomores."

He also said more students are focused and staying in school.

Full-time equivalent enrollment, a measure of total enrollment hours divided by an average course load of 15 hours, was up 188 to 17,313.

Spring enrollment was down 3,024 on-campus and 488 off-campus from the fall enrollment.

Registrar Don Foster said, "Typically there's a 6-7 percent decrease from fall to spring."

This is due to people graduating, people gaining employment or freshman and sophomores leaving college, Foster said.

Enrollment in the following colleges is up from last year's numbers: Arts and Sciences, 5,311; Engineering, 2,398; Education, 1,620; Agriculture, 1,344; Human Ecology, 1,151; "The increase in these colleges is parallel to the increases this fall," Foster said.

The enrollment in other colleges is down: Business Administration, 2,262; Graduate School, 2,556; Architecture and Design, 749; and Veterinary Medicine, 358.

The colleges of Architecture and Design and Veterinary Medicine have enrollment caps which restrict enrollment.

"The College of Business Administration has been declining for a couple of years," Foster said.

Site for landfill remains unchosen

PAUL NOEL
Staff Reporter

The Big Lakes Solid Waste Management Compact is still without a decision for a site selection.

The compact, currently composed of Riley, Geary and Morris counties, met in Junction City at the Geary County Courthouse Annex Wednesday night and voted to cease the public hearing process at the meetings.

Dan Harden, Riley County Commissioner and compact interim manager, said he thought the compact had reached its goal of hearing from everyone who was interested in voicing an opinion, and to continue the process would be redundant.

Richard Jepsen, Riley County commissioner and compact chairman, said future meetings will still be open to the public.

"We had quite a bit of environmental and some technical information brought in by the public," Jepsen said. "The meetings will still be open to the public, but they won't be public hearings where people are invited to speak freely."

Geary County commissioner, Bobby Whitten, suggested the compact have another public hearing when a site has been selected. The compact agreed.

The compact decided to wait to choose a landfill site until commissioners from Dickinson County decide if they want to be a part of the compact. It set a March 7 deadline for a decision.

The Walker site in Dickinson County seems to be the best site, Harden said.

The site is an abandoned rock quarry. Waste dirt is already available for daily cover, said Wilton Thomas, Riley County commissioner.

"The site is already disturbed," he said. "Prairie land won't be disturbed if we choose to use the Walker site."

Elaine Hassler, Dickinson County commissioner, said Dickinson County will not be under any pressure to join a waste compact for five or 10 years.

"It comes down to how farsighted we can be beyond that time, and how important it is to cooperate with the neighboring counties for larger landfill volume," she said.

The compact expressed a need to have an estimated cost for each landfill site.

"I don't think we really need actual dollar and cents, but we do need a relative cost," said Marjorie Morse, compact member.

Harden reported to the compact about a trip to Oklahoma, during which he looked at composting equipment that belonged to a company that is now subjected to bankruptcy.

Composting will reduce some of the dependency of the landfill but not completely eliminate it, Harden said.

Jepsen said he was concerned about buying the equipment because the Oklahoma business did not succeed.

The business has been shut down since 1980, Harden said, because the city found it cheaper to haul waste to a landfill.

"It (the business) didn't work because it was ahead of the peoples' desire to conserve," he said.

The compact decided to begin the search for a composting site.

Although much was accomplished, Jepsen said he was not totally satisfied with the meeting.

"The thing that bothers me is we went through the night, and we still don't have a site for the landfill," he said.

Allies wait for possible ground war

400-500 Iraqi soldiers surrender as Soviet peace proposal deadline approaches

By the Associated Press

DHAHRAN, Saudi Arabia — A waiting world watched Baghdad and the bleak Arabian desert Wednesday — Baghdad for word on peace, the desert for news of all-out war.

American helicopters carted off hundreds of Iraqi prisoners after one action and Iraqi gunners zeroed in on a U.S. unit in another, killing one American and wounding seven.

A key French lawmaker said the Desert Storm allies would give Iraq until late Thursday to respond to a Soviet peace proposal, said French Foreign Minister Roland Dumas, "the ultimate decision rests with Saddam Hussein."

The proposal is believed to call for an unconditional Iraqi withdrawal from Kuwait, coupled with vague assurances that Saddam could stay in power and the Palestinian question would eventually be addressed.

The U.N. secretary general, Javier Perez de Cuellar, said the initiative is a historic opportunity, and U.S. ally Italy also endorsed it. House Speaker Thomas Foley said that if the withdrawal is unconditional, "I don't know how (President Bush) could fail to accept it."

Bush kept a public silence on the issue Wednesday, a day after describing the plan as well short of U.S. requirements. Although Bush did not elaborate on his objections, Republican House leader Robert Michel said, "We want to see conditions change."

Dismissing the alliance's strategy for an assault on Kuwait, Baghdad radio declared: "Their paper plans will be nothing when the ground battle starts."

Desert Storm commander Gen. H. Norman Schwarzkopf said the Iraqi army, under aerial bombardment for a month, was on the verge of collapse. Other senior U.S. officers said they still expect a bloody fight.

British military sources said Iraqi troops were dispersing multi-rocket launchers and other artillery at the front in apparent readiness to take on the allies with chemical weapons.

Early Wednesday afternoon, a U.S. task force clashed with Iraqi forces south of the Saudi border, and the Iraqis called in artillery fire that killed one American and wounded seven others, the U.S. command reported. It said the Iraqi fire hit an American anti-aircraft gun and two Bradley personnel carriers, and U.S.

forces destroyed five Iraqi tanks and 20 artillery pieces and captured seven prisoners.

A short time later, the command said, U.S. Army strike helicopters attacked a complex of Iraqi desert fortifications just north of the border, destroying 15 to 30 bunkers and leading 400 to 500 stunned Iraqi infantrymen to surrender.

As darkness fell, Army Ch-47 Chinook helicopters were completing the task of ferrying the prisoners to a holding camp in northern Saudi Arabia, said command spokesman Brig. Gen. Richard Neal.

It was the largest roundup of prisoners yet by U.S. forces. The command did not specify the locations or identify the U.S. units involved in the two actions.

Fort Riley releases names of injured Big Red 1 soldiers

By the Collegian Staff

The Fort Riley Public Affairs Office has released the names of two of the three 1st Infantry Division soldiers injured Sunday in Desert Storm operations.

Sgt. Carl Payne, 28, of Apopka, Fla., and Private 1st Class Robert Lee Guest III, 19, of Vauxhall, N.J., suffered second- and third-degree burns when their vehicle was hit by a Hellfire missile fired by a U.S. Apache helicopter, according to the press release. The soldiers, members of Company B, 101st Military Intelligence Battalion, were taken to an evacuation hospital in Saudi Arabia.

The third soldier's name has not been released pending notification of next of kin. The soldier, a member of the same company as the identified soldiers, was treated and returned to duty.

The injuries sustained by the three soldiers are not considered serious.

Also in connection with the Sunday incident, two soldiers were killed and an undetermined number were injured, according to the release. These soldiers are members of the 2nd Armor Division (Forward), based in Garlstadt, Germany, which is attached to the 1st Division during Operation Desert Storm.

Candidates discuss enforcing fire codes

ERIN BURKE
Collegian Reporter

Annexing K-State and enforcing safety and fire codes for tenants were just a few topics discussed at the Senior Center Wednesday night during an open forum for Manhattan City Commission candidates.

When annexation was addressed, most of the candidates agreed that the move would have to be mutually beneficial for the University and the city of Manhattan.

John Dubois said he supported the concept initially, but thought there should be continued exploration of the plan.

Stanley Crowder said he doesn't support annexation, because he felt there would be a substantial job loss at K-State.

The candidates agreed there are still several questions to be answered and cooperation is essential between the University and the city of Manhattan to develop any plans.

Discussion of unsafe housing was also debated. Several ideas were given to upgrade living standards for tenants.

Craig Raborn, candidate and senior in geography, said, "I am personally in favor of enforcing codes."

Candidate Edith Stunkel said substandard housing isn't just a

A female K-State student was assaulted on campus by an unknown man as she walked along the sidewalk east of Oak Drive at about 7:15 p.m. Feb. 14, said Cheryl May, director of K-State news services.

As the woman walked on the sidewalk, the man jumped from the bushes and struck her with a bottle, May said. A brief scuffle between the two ended when the man ran away after a car drove by on Oak Drive.

May said she did not think the woman was seriously injured in the incident. The incident was reported to the K-State Police Tuesday.

Campus police told May the woman described her attacker as a 40-year-old white male about six-foot-tall, with a medium but muscular build and weighing about 180 pounds. The man has dark brown hair and dark eyes. His hair was unkempt, worn long and ended just above the shoulders. He had bangs, which hung down to about his eyebrows. He also had a bushy mustache. On the night of the attack he wore jeans, a jean jacket, flannel shirt and may have had on cowboy boots.

The woman worked with police in developing a composite sketch of the assailant, May said.

"On a scale of one-to-10, she rated that composite as an eight," May said.

Campus police described the incident to May as aggravated sexual battery and are asking the assistance of the public in identifying the suspect.

May said the woman was not raped in the incident.

Campus police referred all questions about the incident to May's office.

Soviet factories closing down

MOSCOW (AP) — A kerchiefed woman at the Kapranov Shoe Factory applied glue sparingly to the espadrille she was making, painfully aware that the only Soviet maker of the glue closed months ago.

"We are on the verge of bankruptcy," said Genrikh Falyano, chief economist of the shoe factory, one of 2,000 plants in danger of closing because of raw-material shortages.

The factory shutdowns are the latest symptom of the Soviet economy's collapse. Store shelves are empty. And last month, people lost confidence in money — many lost their savings — when the government recalled all 50-and 100-ruble notes and replaced only some of them.

The primary cause: a lack of foreign currency, which has halted imports of critical raw materials.

19 killed in Chile airplane crash

SANTIAGO, Chile (AP) — A chartered Chilean airliner carrying 72 people, mostly American tourists en route to Antarctica, crashed into a freezing channel Wednesday near the southern tip of Chile, the airline said. Authorities said 19 passengers died.

Seventeen of the 53 survivors from the British-made BAE-146 airplane were injured in the early afternoon accident, said a spokesman for the Chilean airline LAN.

The plane crashed in the Beagle Channel as it attempted to land in light rain at Puerto Williams, on Navarino Island, 1,500 miles south of Santiago, said the LAN spokesman.

"The airplane went beyond the end of the landing strip and fell into the water," according to a LAN statement.

The airline said the cause of the accident was not known.

Grammy winners among old, new

NEW YORK (AP) — Quincy Jones, jazz musician, composer and producer of records and TV shows, burst back into the limelight as a performing artist Wednesday, winning six Grammy awards for his eclectic album "Back on the Block."

"I can't believe this," said Jones, a tremor in his voice as he accepted the album of the year award at the 33rd Grammy ceremonies. "I've been in this academy since 1958 and this is the first time I ever dared to think about having a Grammy under my own name. And I'm so proud."

He dedicated the Grammy to the late Sarah Vaughan, whose last performance was "Birdland" on the album, which danced through just about every musical genre, including rap and jazz. Jones also won producer of the year for a non-classical album.

Songwriter Julie Gold won the song of the year Grammy for "From a Distance," performed by Bette Midler.

Rap sensation M.C. Hammer, capering before the audience at the 33rd annual Grammy Awards at Radio City Music Hall, won three awards in the early going.

The late Roy Orbison won the pop male vocal award for his 1964 rock standard "Oh, Pretty Woman."

Mariah Carey, a former backup singer whose seven-octave range was showcased on her debut album, won the Grammy as best new artist.

Jones, 57, is the most-nominated artist in Grammy history with 76. His six wins Wednesday night made him the second biggest winner in Grammy history. Georg Solti was No. 1 one with 28 Grammys.

Yoko Ono, widow of John Lennon, accepted a special award for her husband. "John would have been especially pleased to be noticed by an industry he helped expand," she said.

Family-planning bill introduced

TOPEKA (AP) — A House committee is scheduled to discuss a bill today to pay women on welfare to use a new contraceptive. Some members say it could become the vehicle for broader family planning legislation.

The bill would have the state pay $500 to women who have Norplant surgically implanted, then $50 annually for its continued use. Norplant is placed in a woman's upper arm and can prevent pregnancy for up to five years.

Topless dancing prohibited in bars

LEAVENWORTH (AP) — Topless dancers will be prohibited in bars located in unincorporated areas of Leavenworth County under a resolution adopted this week.

The Board of Leavenworth County Commissioners voted 3-0 Tuesday for a resolution banning nudity in establishments that serve beer, liquor or cereal malt beverages in unincorporated areas of the county. No one spoke against the action during the board's public hearing.

Company donates land to preserve

TULSA, Okla. (AP) — Plans to develop a Tallgrass Prairie Preserve in northern Oklahoma have received a boost from Williams Pipeline Co., which has donated 11 parcels of land worth $720,000 to the project.

The Nature Conservancy will sell the land, located in seven Midcontinent states, and apply the cash toward $15 million needed for the Osage County project, officials said Tuesday.

"The amount contributed pushes us very close to the $5 million mark of the campaign and gives us renewed momentum at a very important time," said William Kerr, chairman of the Oklahoma chapter of the conservancy.

Truth in war worries panel

Speakers urge examining facts, costs; Information alters Bush's justification

ERWIN SEBA
Staff Reporter

Supporters of the Persian Gulf War owe the troops in Operation Desert Storm an examination of all the facts concerning America's involvement in the conflict, said Lyman Baker, instructor of English, as part of a panel discussion Wednesday sponsored by the Manhattan Coalition for Peace in the Middle East.

Speaking at the end of the discussion and in response to several audience members who had voiced support for the war, Baker said, "Don't not look because you're afraid to see what's there. That's not showing respect for the people you're asking to die for a proud democracy."

Earlier in the discussion, Baker said information has come to light since the Iraqi invasion of Kuwait that challenges the Bush administration's justification for the war.

The United States gave signals to Saddam Hussein indicating it would not oppose an invasion of Kuwait, he said.

After the invasion took place, President Bush justified the deployment of troops to Saudi Arabia by saying it was being done to prevent an invasion of Saudi Arabia, Baker said.

"The CIA advised the administration on several occasions that this would not happen," he said.

The United States was also involved very actively with Kuwait in attempting to destabilize Iraq's economy, he said.

Phil Anderson, instructor of speech and panel member, spoke to the audience of about 100 people in the K-State Union Courtyard on the subject of the war's cost.

Anderson said the prosecution of the war costs the United States $1 billion per day.

To give the audience an idea about how large a billion is, Anderson said it would take a person 30 years to count to a billion.

"If you counted one per second, one ... two ... it would take you 24 hours to get to 86,000," he said. "That's the cost of a house today. ... It would take you 30 years to count to a billion. Christ has only been dead 65 billion seconds."

The war's cost to each American is $4 per day, Anderson said.

"Thirty-five days later, what you have is $140 you have contributed to the war," he said.

Iraq's gross national product is $50 billion per year, Anderson said, while the United States' is 10 times greater at $5.5 trillion per year.

"I would argue that it's much cheaper to isolate them economically when you consider that 95 percent of their income comes from oil," Anderson said.

Talat Rahman, associate professor of physics and panel member, said the American bombing of Iraq could be described as a form of genocide.

"We know there is a kind of genocide going on," Rahman said. "Who are suffering? Who are paying the price? It is the Iraqi people."

"When you're bombing, you're not just destroying the military capability; you're destroying the libraries, the playgrounds, the schools. You're destroying the history. You're destroying a civilization," she said.

The war's conclusion will leave vast numbers in the Muslim population of the Middle East and North Africa angry at the United States because they see the war as an attempt by a developed nation to impose its will on the underdeveloped world, Rahman said.

Richard Nelson, professor of journalism and mass communications and panel member, said propaganda is a form of communication present during peacetime as well as during

UFM provides interns different experiences

MELISSA SMITH
Collegian Reporter

UFM provides internship opportunities each semester for K-State students in a variety of majors, including business, journalism, horticulture and social work.

Linda Teener, executive director of UFM, said UFM is able to provide many different experiences for its interns in a variety of disciplines.

"UFM is a really interesting place," she said. "There are a lot of different kinds of opportunities for interns to come from almost every discipline on campus."

"The experiences students get at UFM are very practical and very real," she said. "They (interns) are treated generally like anyone else on the staff would be treated, do the same things and are given responsibilities."

Interns for the Campus and Community programs are often journalism or public relations majors, she said.

"They help develop the catalog," Teener said. "They work on special events that we're being host of — writing press releases, making media contacts for us, lining things up, doing flyers and helping distribute catalogs."

Angela Lawson, senior in journalism, said she is a public relations intern with UFM this semester.

"So far I have written some press releases and public service announcements, and I'm making advertisements and flyers now," she said.

She said this internship will help her get a job because she will have more writing samples.

Also, internships like this help people find out what areas really interest them, she said.

In the past, interns have also worked with researching and writing grant proposals, coordinating special fundraising events and setting up classes, Teener said.

Human ecology students helped out with a special program dealing with parenting last year, Teener said.

UFM also uses interns from all majors for its Lou Douglas Lecture Series. Karen McCulloh, coordinator of the lecture series, said 12 interns helped with the series last semester, spending a two-hour block of time at UFM each week for about 10 weeks.

Students in this program work four hours per week with children in first through sixth grades, McCulloh said. The majority of the interns are in education or early childhood development, but there are also students in journalism, social work and sociology.

Teener said all the interns UFM works with provide extra assistance to UFM, which does not have the finances to hire all the staff needed. Students also give UFM new ideas and a different perspective.

Director of nursing leader at University

SUZANNE BROWN
Collegian Reporter

Arriving to Manhattan in the late 1960s Phyllis Hammond, R.N., Ph.D., and director of nursing at Lafene Student Health Center, was the first black registered nurse in the city.

She grew up in Chicago as a member of a large family, went to Kennedy King Junior College for two years and then went on to the Provident Hospital and Training School for her nursing training.

"It has some historical significance because it's the only black hospital in Chicago," Hammond said. "It was also the place where the first open-heart surgery was done by a black physician."

"I worked at that same hospital for about six months to a year in the operating room as an operating-room nurse," she said. "I'd wanted to do that since I was 12-years-old."

After her time at Provident Hospital, Hammond married and moved to Manhattan.

"I worked at one of the local hospiitals for about five years as a staff nurse, working evenings and nights, and then as the operating-room supervisor."

Hammond came to K-State in 1972.

She said when she started working at Lafene it was a hospital, and had 40 beds. The center then had primarily an in-patients service.

"Then I went to work in the family planning clinic and from there I became director of nursing," Hammond said.

As the director of nursing, Hammond has a variety of duties.

"I'm the department head for the department of nursing, so anything related to recruitment, selection, staff development, departmental concerns or budgetary concerns is all part of my function. I'm also the risk manager for the health center. That primarily involves identifying trends related to problem situations or any kind of situation that could put the health center at risk either legally or financially."

As well as being the director of nursing at Lafene, Hammond is the president of the Black Faculty/Staff Alliance.

"We try to get a wide representation on the committee from all the areas in which blacks are employed on the campus," she said.

The committee is presidentially appointed and is composed of 18 members.

"Our primary concerns are to identify and to address any concerns that are related to blacks," she said. "But, our main concern, and the reason we requested to have such a group, is a lot of times the issues specific to our particular ethnic group just got either lost in the cracks or lumped in with the concerns of all minorities."

Vietnam comparisons useless generalities

As these words are written, large-scale fighting on the ground has not yet begun in the war in the gulf. But probably will, or at least, it is surely part of the general plan for the war. This war is not a replay of Vietnam. A major difference is that there seems, in fact, to be a plan.

Most claims for similarity lie either in universally applicable truths or in useless generalities. To say that occasional confusion is "just the way it was in Vietnam" is pointless. Confusion is not only a fact of every war, but of life in general. The issue is whether confusion is incidental to the war or a defining feature.

Such confusion exists among those reporting on the war and interpreting it rather than among those running it. Sometimes reporters and critics seem to be reporting the last war, rather than this one. Even their terminology echoes the era of Vietnam — the words "escalation" and "graduated response," for example. Military and civilian officials have not used these terms. It seems rather that an entire military operational plan was developed, quite specific and concrete, during the months leading to the U.N. Security Council's deadline to Saddam Hussein.

In Vietnam, statements of policy were too abstract to have practical value. Improvisation of the worst sort followed because meaningful strategy cannot be shaped in the absence of concrete war aims.

The current military action is phased, set into a preset sequence. But it appears not meant to bring change in the "heart and mind" of Saddam, except by depriving him of the material capacity to wage war. In this sense, Saddam's intentions remain tactically pertinent but become strategically irrelevant. In Vietnam, what passed for policy and strategy took shape in Washington, D.C., and in Saigon was reactive, while Hanoi frequently held the initiative.

To military professionals and analysts, the differences from Vietnam are overwhelming. There is no evidence that U.S. military leaders assume or expect the air war alone will remove the Iraqi forces from Kuwait, although they might welcome it if it happened. Air and ground war have been perceived as interactive in the U.S. doctrine of AirLand Battle for many years.

Nor did U.S. leaders predict a "short" war. Indeed, they cautioned explicitly to the contrary. For much of the Vietnam War, moreover, U.S. weapons often grossly mismatched the military tasks at hand. Although results will not be reliably known for some time, the "smart" weapons of this war, such as the Tomahawk and Patriot missiles, are obviously a better technical fit to current missions.

So, too, the obsession with numbers during Vietnam, such as the notorious "body counts," has yielded to a greater effort to describe operational results, even allowing for current delight in the number of air sorties generated. In addition, the Vietnam War was, by all reasonable measures, a U.S. affair. The war in the gulf is led by the United States, to be sure, but the political strength of the anti-Iraqi coalition thus far inspires amazement.

Moreover, the U.S. government and its military clearly take Saddam very seriously. Their predecessors in power in the era of Vietnam did not do so with Ho Chi Minh, the Viet Minh and the Viet Cong — at least not until even the Americans realized the war had long since been lost. Yet another difference is that the international support for Ho and the North Vietnamese was extensive, coming in varying degrees from countries of every political stripe and economic system.

By comparison, support for Saddam seems nearly to dance on the head of a pin with some room to spare. Opposition to the current war within the United States has thus been undercut by the absence of some appealing or, at least, accepted personality around which to develop some concrete alternative to the option being exercised by the U.S. government. Nor does the U.S. military assume this war is anywhere near over — the worst is quite distinctly yet to come, as long as any ground war develops, and they know it.

In the ethical realm, the treatment of the war in the gulf bears striking differences from that of the Vietnam War. Perhaps most curious is the notion all Americans, whether favoring the war or opposed to it, support the troops and tolerate their commitment to military service.

Consider the irony. During the Vietnam War, the draftees (in combat by governmental compulsion rather than by choice) were still regarded by many protesters as morally culpable for fighting. Now, when the Armed Forces are composed exclusively of volunteers, they are absolved of personal responsibility. Politeness and consideration toward the troops may be a display of humaneness. But preoccupation with the welfare of the troops, with immediate matters in general, may deflect the attention of the public from the larger picture and the longer-term aims that may be part of this war.

Discussion of how to finance the current war helps to illuminate this issue of long-term aims. The Kuwaiti government-in-exile has pledged payment of at least $60 billion, while Saudi officials have talked of paying as much as half of the total cost. Even if the actual cost of the war exceeds present expectations, the Kuwaiti and Saudi commitments would appear to suffice. If so, what are the purposes of pressing for commitments from the Japanese, the Germans and others?

Enter the "New World Order." Is it possible that President Bush and Secretary Baker are actually shaping a structure for financing some postwar security system rather than just seeking means to pay current costs? Consider that the United States has long regarded its costs in NATO as disproportionate, given the presumed benefits to other countries such as Germany. Unlike NATO, a new security system after the war in the gulf is over might be established on a financial basis that U.S. officials would regard as more equitable — and more advantageous to the United States, which might retain global influence on a shoestring budget.

Again, there is a difference from the Vietnam War. These days, interest in what political arrangements will be set in place, and how, when the war is over permeates the life of official Washington. Especially in a democracy, however, it would be nice to know what these people have in mind.

Smoking ban in K-State Union makes sense for most students

If Student Senate gets its way, students won't be smoking in the boy's room — or anywhere else in the K-State Union for that matter.

After a lengthy debate in Senate, a resolution was passed recommending the Union Governing Board prohibit smoking in all areas of the Union.

The UGB will consider the resolution today.

And, it shouldn't take long to decide which way to vote.

Certainly there are many students on campus who smoke, and it is a student union. But, sorry smokers, the majority must rule on this one.

By far, the number of regular smokers are outnumbered by non-smokers who do not wish to walk through or study in a cloud of smoke.

Smoking cigarettes is an addiction. When a person smokes in a public area, innocent people are unwittingly drawn into that individual's personal problem.

Allowing smoking in the Union would not be a big deal if people could keep the smoke to themselves. But they can't.

And, short of renting out bubble-helmets enclosing the smoke, the UGB is faced with deciding whether to spend $15,000 for a new ventilation system or to simply ban smoking altogether.

They should ban it.

Of course, if the Union can find a room that is well-ventilated and will not infringe on others' air space, they should happily give it to the smokers, topped with a yellowish-brown bow.

Otherwise, the smoking problem should be quickly and decisively snuffed out.

Another perspective

The Bush administration has proposed a production-oriented energy plan as a solution to our dependence on foreign oil.

The plan would encourage increased domestic output through deregulation and tax breaks. This means depleting our scarce natural resources, destroying the environment and jeopardizing public safety for a short-term supply of domestic oil.

And in the long run, the plan will make our country even more dependent on foreign oil.

The plan proposes to open 1.5 of the 19 million acres of Arctic National Wildlife Refuge in Alaska for oil exploration. It is believed that the land contains 3.6 billion barrels of oil. Even if we could extract all this oil, 3.6 billion barrels will not go far in a country that uses 72 billion gallons a year.

We can't open up wilderness lands to deplete our scarce supply of oil — and then export it so oil companies can make a larger profit. Who is this plan designed to help? The American citizens or Bush's old oil cronies.

Instead of increasing production and developing dangerous nuclear plants, we should focus on conservation and the development of safe, long-term alternatives to fossil fuel to decrease foreign dependence.

None of the proposals even encourage motorists to reduce their use of gasoline; automobile use accounts for 97 percent of oil in the United States. Conservation worked in the last oil crunch.

Our oil problem will not go away. An energy plan should focus more on long-term solutions to the problem rather than short-term rewards for rich oil companies.

Journalists in daily no-win situation

Brad Seabourn couldn't make it in to write his column this week, so I begged and pleaded with the powers-that-be to let me write one. They said I could, but they wouldn't pay me for it.

"Cool with me, man," I said. "I really don't want to study anyway." (Sorry, Clift. Duty calls. By the way, you haven't dropped me from the class roll yet, have you?)

Being a much-too-reckless staff reporter for this rag isn't all it's cracked up to be. Sure, I meet strange and new people, get in on a lot of neat information and explore all kinds of different personalities, but it seems there is always a piper to pay — some little thing never comes across in print quite as well as it looks on these 10-year-old computer terminals.

Take Cia Verschelden, for example. Last week I wrote what I thought was a masterpiece on a point of view seldom heard in this era of "U.S.A. all the way" wartime wisdom. She is a pacifist, and she is a true patriot. Someone who stands against the winds of conformity. Someone who is willing to say the government is wrong to kill people. Someone who believes America could be a better place. And, above all, she was someone who would talk to the media about her differing beliefs. Finally, I was able to write something different than what is passed off as news nowadays.

And then she called me. She said she thought I misrepresented her in the article. She said I left out some things. She said I sensationalized.

I didn't know what to say. I guess it was because she was sort of right.

I sat in the newsroom Sunday evening and watched the network news for the first time since the first 10 days of the Persian Gulf War. About 70 percent of the stories and advertising shown that night had conspicuous, and sometimes even hidden, images of American flags, maps of the United States, moms, baseball and apple pies.

This war has brought all America's neuroses to the fore. On the news every night and in the papers every morning, we can see how Americans are coping. We can see those who hate their country, and we can see those who love their country.

David Frese

Staff Reporter
Guest Columnist

I think I'd fit into the latter category. I love being able to write "I think President Bush is a pigdog." I love to vote. I love being able to go to the grocery store and buy Fruity Pebbles. I love books. I love newspapers. I love movies. I love thought.

But I guess I am not a patriot in the modernistic sense. I don't love the Saudis enough to put my neck out for them. I don't love the Saudis enough to keep them free to treat their women like camels. I don't love the Saudis enough to support my elected president for sending my friends to die in the sand.

Perhaps that is pure selfishness on my part. I would rather serve my country by defending and advocating free speech and the Constitution. I don't mind being called selfish for not wanting to die for my country. After all, that's what America is all about — personal property, personal feelings, personal freedoms.

Cia told me when she called she had received some hate mail because of the article. I don't know what the letters said, but she sounded shaken, hurt and angry. Some of that was my fault. I sought her out for a story with a new twist. I asked her to lay her thoughts and beliefs and dreams out for all the world to see. I found the news. I reported it. And she thought I bungled it. Because of that, Cia Verschelden has suffered. For that I am truly sorry.

I've written other stories about the war here at home. I wrote a story about some peace protesters receiving terroristic phone threats. I wrote about a woman whose husband left for Saudi four months after they were married. I wrote about the international students receiving a letter from the International Student Center telling them if they're going to speak out against the war, they might want to keep a low profile.

I was on post the cold November night the 1st Infantry Division got its orders to go to Saudi. The Fort Riley public affairs officers seemed like they had been given an information laxative by the U.S. government, and the kind folks there were finally able to let us know why all the trucks and tanks had been getting new beige paint jobs since August. There was a strange mix of fear and relief in the air.

And then the soldiers left. One by one, they left behind their wives and children and friends and family — some never to be heard from again. One by one, they boarded the buses, leaving behind a trail of tears marked by a path of yellow ribbons.

Two months after the initial call for the Big Red One, America went to war. I watched the news at my other job at a bookstore here in town. Midway through the broadcast, Peter Jennings broke in with a report that the bombing had begun.

A soldier's pretty young wife stood watching the television with me at the store for about 10 minutes. Her eyes were wide and her face was a little paler than when she walked into the store. She started to look more and more like just a young girl. She put her hand to her mouth.

"My husband is over there," she said. "I didn't know what to say. I couldn't say, 'War sucks.'"

I couldn't say, "This whole macho war shit is stupid."

I couldn't say or do anything. There was another, older woman in the bookstore that night. She came up and watched the news, too.

"My husband was in World War II when I was about your age," she said to the first woman. She must have heard her talking to me.

"There's not much you can do but wait. And pray."

Then the phone rang. The voice on the other end was one I've become accustomed to hearing in times of crisis.

"Dave?" the voice asked. "This is Greg. Can you come in to the Collegian after you're done at the bookstore?"

I told him I'd be glad to.

Bad Company, Damn Yankees play Bramlage

STACEY HARBISON
Collegian Reviewer

Bad Company and Damn Yankees rocked Bramlage Coliseum Wednesday night with an evening of musical entertainment.

Let's talk about opening band, Damn Yankees, for a minute. They were active and seemed to relate better to the audience than Bad Company. Several band members took turns singing, which added variety.

The only problem was when they sang "High Enough." They promised the audience we had never heard it the way they were going to play it for us, but it sounded exactly like it does on the radio.

It was obvious they weren't really playing some of the time — Tommy Shaw and Jack Blades had these neat little steps they did together while playing.

Ted Nugent looked like a zebra with a guitar to match. I got the impression he was full of himself. But hey, if I was making that kind of money, I would have a big head, too.

Damn Yankees seemed to play as long as Bad Company, so when they finally came on stage everyone was tired. But they played some good old rock'n'roll — mostly familiar songs with which we could all sing along. That really seemed to get the crowd going.

Simon Kirke, drums, sang a solo at the beginning of the show. He was the only one to sing for Bad Company besides Brian Howe, but my friends and I didn't think he was very good. I guess it was a change, at least.

I got bored about halfway through the show and sat down. A lot of people around me were also sitting down. Then, they started playing some more upbeat music, and I got into it again with the rest of the crowd.

Bad Company put on a good, but predictable, show. They had the traditional crowd-cheer competition, drum solo, guitar solo and of course, sing-alongs. Oh, I almost forgot the drumsticks and guitar picks thrown out to the crowd during the concert.

The crowd ate up these concert traditions, and most everyone went along with the screaming and yelling.

I guess after 18 years, they know what the crowd likes and have plenty of songs to pick from. They've even developed several different sounds over the years and shared these with the audience.

I even predicted Bad Company would end the concert with the song "Bad Company," and I was right. When they came back for the encore, they played "Holy Water" and "Bad

Before the encore, Howe carried a female member of the audience off the stage with him. Maybe you had to be there, but it was funny.

Both bands mentioned the Persian Gulf War. It bothered me at first because I figured I came to the concert to be entertained and didn't really want to be reminded of the war. Then I decided it was nice to show we weren't forgetting the troops — even though we were having fun.

The special effects left much to be desired. Basically, there were none, which was expected since tickets were priced so low. At least they could have figured out what they were doing with the lighting. It wasn't even on the stage half the time.

The concert featured classic rock'n'roll by Bad Company and somewhat more heavy metal from Damn Yankees. For the money, it was worth it.

HENRY V.
A BOLD NEW FILM BY KENNETH BRANAGH

This highly acclaimed British adaptation of Shakespeare's "Henry V" is one of the highest grossing specialized films of all time. After the young and uncertain English monarch, King Henry, wages war against France to claim the throne, Henry's joy turns to sadness

The Oklahoma State Cowgirls proved they were out to win the Big Eight — outright.

The Lady Cats were drubbed, 79-61, at Gallagher-Iba Arena in Stillwater, Okla., Wednesday night. Last year's co-Big Eight Player of the Year, Liz Brown, poured in 20 points to pace O-State.

"There's no doubt that this is probably the most difficult place to come into and win," said K-State coach Susan Yow of O-State's home arena. "We did a good job in the second half, but it was too late by then."

In the first half, K-State

OSU 79, Lady Cats 61

(14-10 and 7-6) and O-State (22-4 and 11-2) traded buckets and were knotted at 14 at the 14:30 mark. From there, the Cowgirls went on to outscore the Lady Cats 31-13, to take a 45-27 lead at halftime.

The turnover-bug also plagued K-State, as it had 10 in the first half — 16 for the game — compared to O-State's 12 for the game.

"I don't know what to say," Yow said. "We just didn't play well tonight and it showed. But give O-State credit. They played an almost perfect game and that's why they won."

K-State did manage to remedy the soft middle, as it was virtually even with O-State on the boards, 38-37. Still, in the last six games the Lady Cats have been outrebounded 234-200. That's 39 rebounds per game for the opponents and 33 for K-State.

The Cowgirls were able to post a perfect 10-0 record on their home court this season.

In the second half, the woes continued as O-State's man-to-man defense effectively shut down K-State. In the half, the Lady Cats shot 36 percent — for the game they shot 38 percent — and continued to turn the ball over.

At the final buzzer, K-State had committed 16 turnovers, had 12 shots blocked and had the ball stolen 12 times.

"Once again it's a case of something beyond the Xs and Os and it's just up to the players," Yow said. "I don't know what to do. I don't know that anyone expected us to win coming in here, because nobody has won."

One of the big surprises was that the K-State bench saw a lot more playing time.

"Well, (O-State) had already wrapped up the title and they were so far ahead, so why not give them some playing time," Yow said.

Yow said some of the different units did perform better than the starting unit, but they still needed to work on some basic fundamentals.

Diana Miller led the way for the Lady Cats with 15 points and Nadira Hazim and Jennifer Grebing each tossed in eight points.

Two other O-State players ended up in double figures, Lisa McGill had 16 and Jodi Fisher 11.

Crowd figures down
Behavior said to have improved at gamesJEFF STURDY
Collegian Reporter

The average attendance at men's basketball games has dropped this year, but crowd behavior has improved, K-State and Bramlage Coliseum officials said.

The average attendance, with one home game left against Missouri, has dropped more than 2,000 from last year's average.

This year, the average attendance is 10,389, down from 12,483 last year, said Kenny Mossman, sports information director.

This is the smallest average attendance since the 1984-85 season, when K-State averaged 7,300 per game.

Attendance at K-State's Big Eight home games has also dropped about 1,000 per game, compared to that of last year.

"A lot of it depends on the day of the week," he said. "We have a large number of out-of-town people, and it's hard for them to travel that far." Students are often unable to attend games during the week. Other ticket holders simply don't have enough time to make it to the game after work.

The University of Kansas game, which is traditionally the biggest game of the year, had the largest crowd of the year with 13,506. The games on the weekends, however, normally have the larger crowds. Colorado and Iowa State both drew more than 13,300 people, Mossman said.

The best way to put people in the stands is to win games, and the men's team has struggled some this year, Mossman said.

Although the attendance is somewhat down, the crowd's behavior has been very good this year, said Jim Muller, assistant director of Bramlage.

"The crowd at the Oklahoma game was the best crowd in the three years at Bramlage," Muller said. "They were involved in the entire game and yet didn't get involved with the court."

Muller said the Bramlage staff wants people to enjoy the game, but also wants people to respect the floor and the building.

This year's crowds have been more involved and, for the most part, very well-behaved groups, said Charles Thomas, director of Bramlage.

Thomas has been pleased the students have not rushed onto the court after the games.

"It does do a lot of damage to the court," Thomas said.

Strong efforts are made to protect the finish as long as possible, Thomas said.

"Aside from the ice being thrown at the Oklahoma State players after the game (Tuesday night), we have been very pleased with the crowd's behavior throughout the year," Thomas said.

Tennis team faces tough battles in Utah

TODD FERTIG
Sports Reporter

Coach Steve Bietau calls the tennis team's four days of matches in Utah this week the toughest road trip he's seen at K-State.

The distance traveled, number of matches, altitude in Utah, and high level of competition all combine to make the trip challenging, Bietau said.

The team begins play today taking on BYU, one of the nation's top-ranked teams, in Provo, Utah. Bietau said BYU was in the Top 20 during the fall and added several players who boosted the quality of their lineup at semester.

Friday, the team plays UNLV before traveling to Salt Lake City, where they will take on Utah and UC Santa Barbara. Another Top 20 team,

"This has to be one of the toughest challenges we've ever faced, when you look at all the factors," Bietau said. "These are all very solid teams, with two of them highly ranked. This is probably the toughest group of teams we've ever scheduled."

Bietau said while taking its usual toll on the endurance of an athlete, the altitude also affects the flight of the ball.

"The ball tends to sail a little in the thinner air and takes some getting used to," Bietau said. "Most of the members of this team have played in the high altitude before, so they're aware of the difference, but it gives a definite advantage to the teams like BYU who play in those conditions all the time."

The team returns to the court following a weekend break from competition. The team is pleased with the progress it showed two weeks ago at South Bend, Ind. The team showed improvement over their past matches by picking up its first win 5-4 over Purdue, Bietau said.

"I was really pleased with the weekend in Indiana," Bietau said. "We lost to Drake the first day 5-4, and they were a team that beat us last year. I thought we played well enough to win that day. We just fell a little short."

Michele Riniker and Suzanne Sim, playing at No. 1 and No. 3 singles, led the charge throughout the weekend. Both players recorded two wins in singles, and Sim added a point in the win over Purdue with one of two doubles victories taken during the weekend.

Riniker scored wins against Drake and Purdue and took her match with Melissa Harris of Notre Dame to three sets before losing.

"She was in a position to win against Notre Dame, and to get that far was an accomplishment," Bietau said of Riniker's 5-7, 7-6, 6-1 loss to Harris. "I thought she played poorly against Purdue and yet she still won. That's an indication of her ability."

Sim has provided the most consistent play of any member of the team so far this season. Her pairing with Neili Wilcox in No. 2 doubles has proven effective, Bietau said.

Angie Gover and Rosemary Hunter continue to slowly work their way back from injury, seeing increased time in the lineup. Gover played three matches during the weekend in Indiana, a number Bietau said was the most she could manage. Hunter, who joined the team at the semester break, continues the difficult process of getting into shape and honing her skills under the fire of competition. Hunter saw action at No. 5 and No. 6 singles and teamed with Theresa Burcham for a No. 3 doubles win over Drake.

The team hopes to continue making progress against the stiff competition this weekend. Bietau said the team's approach to a meet is always the same, no matter who the team may face.

"In general, we've been lifting the level of our play. I expect to see the same results as I've been seeing over the past few weeks," Bietau said. "We prepare well for matches, and we just concentrate on what we need to do to improve. Just because we play someone who is on a little different level doesn't mean we get away from what we've been doing."

Pros could add spice to Olympic team in 1992

Basketball squad moves to next level of play

Bill
Lang

Sports Reporter

In athletic terms, it's known as performing at another level.

Well, it seems as if the Olympics have finally given up on the amateur ranks for thrills and opened the floodgates for the professional athletes of the world. They are giving them the chance to perform at world level.

On the cover of a recent Sports Illustrated, the headline reads "Dream Team," and five awesome NBA talents grace the cover: Charles Barkley, Patrick Ewing, Michael Jordan, Earvin "Magic" Johnson and Karl "the Mailman" Malone.

I defy anyone to say they wouldn't enjoy coaching these guys in the Olympics and watching them run through, around and over opponents — maybe way over in Jordan's case — as they walk to a gold medal.

The committee has already tabbed Detroit Pistons' coach Chuck Daly as head coach for the Olympic basketball team. He's a professional coach, so why not have professional players?

In years past, the Olympic basketball teams were made up of the creme de le creme of college players, from Oscar Robertson and Jerry Lucas, to David Robinson and Mitch Richmond.

Times are changing, though. It used to be such a cake-walk for the U.S. Olympic teams to win. However, a loss in 1972, a no-show in 1980 and a third-place finish in 1988 has prompted many to say open the doors to the pros.

What's led to this though, is the rest of the world took note of how games have been dominated by the United States in the past. They saw how we played and learned. Heck, we even shipped some of our own players to their teams and had clinics teaching them how to play "our" game.

Well, the world has done its homework, and now many of these teams are teaching the lessons.

But for many people, the openings for the pros will only ruin the purity of the game.

Wake up! The Soviets and other European teams have been using professional players for years. The U.S. Olympic Selection Committee has given its blessing and permission to use NBA players.

Imagine the Sports Illustrated cover boys starting for the United States. Then have Isaiah Thomas, David Robinson, Clyde Drexler and Dominique Wilkins sitting on the bench. All these players conjure up images of blowouts of astronomical proportions. What the NBA All-Star Game lacked this year may just fulfill the most avid sports fans' palate.

Yes, even the United States has had a few "professional" athletes in the past 10 years representing our country.

Track and field athletes, gymnasts and snow skiers are notorious for this moniker. They say they receive appearance fees for just showing up at an event. But most contracts stipulate they must perform. The emphasis though, is placed on the appearance.

There are also the endorsement fees these athletes receive. Some receive sums in the six to seven-figure range. Not bad for just wearing a pair of shoes. I wonder if I could make $2 million for wearing an Ace jockstrap?

I hate to say this folks, as much as I like amateur athletics — such as club sports played on a collegiate level — but I have to say it's time to lift our level of play in the international realm.

Daly completes long trek up coaching ladder

By the Associated Press

To get to Barcelona start in Punxsutawney, Pa.

That was the route Chuck Daly took, beginning his basketball coaching career in a town best known for its resident groundhog. The trail wound through a couple of college coaching pit stops, four years as an NBA assistant at Philadelphia, a brief less-than-brilliant stop in Cleveland and a longer, much better one at Detroit.

Now Daly gets the reward for all those practices, all that stomping along sidelines, all that yelling at referees. He will coach the 1992 U.S. Olympic team, a club that could have Magic Johnson and Michael Jordan in the backcourt, Patrick Ewing in the middle, maybe Karl Malone and Charles Barkley on the wings.

"It could be fun," Daly decided.

Fun? It might be coaching nirvana, like landing in the proverbial pot of jam. So, uh, coach, what system do you think you'll use?

"I will adapt to the personnel," Daly said, his eyes twinkling as he thought about the possibilities. "I've coached at every level in every way, and that's how I've always done it. You do what the personnel does best. You tailor a system to their skills."

Daly started coaching in Punxsutawney, where he earned $3,600 a year — $3,000 for teaching and $600 for coaching, he said.

He moved to Boston College and Penn, to the NBA, first as an assistant, then as head man at Cleveland where he went 9-32 in his first pro head job, and finally to Detroit where his Pistons are working on winning a third consecutive NBA championship. The Olympic assignment is the last piece of his personal puzzle.

"I think anyone who has an opportunity like this sees that it's a once in a lifetime opportunity," he said. "If you're a (coaching) lifer, it's the ultimate dream. And I am a lifer."

Picking the Olympic team will be the concern of others. Daly functions as an ex-officio member of a committee of 17 charged with selecting his assistants and his players. He'll take his chances with their choices.

The team will be top-heavy with pros. How could it not be, with three or four college stars along for the ride? How will they get playing time? Who sits? Magic? Michael?

"They'd better be very good to make the club," Daly said. "But they're out there every year. Where do they come from?"

The Olympic situation could be a dilemma for some. If underdog stars like Kenny Anderson or Shaquille O'Neal turn pro, they would be longshots to go to Barcelona as NBA rookies with Magic, Michael and the others. As collegians though, they may be picked.

"It will be like coaching an All-Star team," Daly said. "I did that last year and it was the highlight of my career. One day, a half-hour practice and the players adapted."

Still, he knows there are potential problems. "Everybody wants to play 48 minutes and take 48 shots," Daly said. "National pride will enter it. They'll put aside a lot of things to see to it that we'll win."

That is top priority after the bronze medal disappointment of Seoul, and Daly knows it. "The bottom line is we've taught the world to play basketball, and frankly, we've done too good a job," he said.

Even with a team as skilled the NBA Olympians promise to be, winning is more than a matter of rolling the ball out on the floor. Every locomotive needs an engineer to drive it. Start steering, coach.

And, by the way, you might want to consider the abuse John Thompson got when he had the colossal nerve to bring back a bronze medal at Seoul.

Pressure? Daly laughed. "In the NBA, you've got 27 guys with CEO jobs averaging $290,000-$300,000 a year," he said.

Jayhawks fall to Colorado, now in tie for 1st in Big 8

By the Associated Press

BOULDER, Colo. — Colorado coach Joe Harrington praised his players' poise in withstanding a second-half Kansas rally as the Buffaloes upset the eighth-ranked Jayhawks, 79-71, in Big-Eight play Wednesday night.

Stevie Wise scored 32 points, including six 3-pointers, to lead Colorado and extend the Buffs' winning streak to three games while snapping the Jayhawks' victory string at 10.

"I told the players after the game we bent in the second half but we didn't break. I knew that Kansas would come back (from a 45-31 deficit at the half). They're a second-half team. We grew up a lot tonight," Harrington said.

"This is a great win for Colorado basketball to beat a nationally ranked team like Kansas," Harrington said, adding that, "I never felt comfortable" until the final buzzer.

As for Kansas' unexpected defeat, Harrington said, "That's just life on the road in the Big Eight. It was our time tonight."

It was only Saturday Colorado broke a 56-game, eight-year Big Eight regular-season losing streak on the road, edging Iowa State, 84-78.

Kansas coach Roy Williams said the turning point came when Kansas caught the Buffs 62-62 with 6:39 remaining, but couldn't take the lead.

"They held their poise, scored and went back ahead and we could just never get back in the game," Williams said. "I was silly enough to be confident the whole game. I felt like we could win the game even late in the second half."

"We've got to do a better job stopping outside shots. They shot 8-for-12 from the 3-point line (in the first half). We need to get more focused and we've got to do a better job. I am to blame on that."

The Buffs (15-9 overall, 5-6 in conference) were a different team than the one that fell to Kansas (19-5, 8-3) in their first meeting, 95-62, Jan. 26.

In the first half, Colorado forced nine turnovers, shot 56 percent from the field and outrebounded Kansas 22-9 to take a 45-31 lead at intermission. Kansas shot 42 percent in the half.

Although Kansas tied the game three times in the second half — the last time at 62 with 6:39 remaining — the Jayhawks never took the lead after halftime.

Colorado scored the next six points, including four from Shaun Vandiver, who scored 15 points.

Triathlon club members strive for physical fitness

SCOTT FOWLER
Collegian Reporter

The Wildcat Triathlon Club is full of individuals who say they like to stay in shape and enjoy camaraderie with others. They said the club provides both.

D'Anne Larsen, graduate student in grain science and club president, said anyone who is interested at any level is welcome to come and work out with the group.

Robert Grimes, junior in pre-physical therapy, said, "I would like to believe that our club would be defined by those people who wish to participate at any level."

Grimes said the camaraderie of the members on the team keep him motivated, but the struggle of the races is what is fun.

Alberto Delgado, associate professor of mathematics and faculty adviser to the club, said he also enjoys the competition and camaraderie involved with being a member of the club.

"I do it for the physical fitness, competition and camaraderie of doing the same activity as other people who enjoy doing the same thing," he said.

Larsen said being a member of the club gives her an outlet from graduate school and she enjoys the competition.

She said she enjoys getting ready for a big race.

"It's fun to see how all of the preparation you do compares with every one else," Larsen said.

Delgado said the group gets together and works out three times a week. On Sundays, the group takes a bike ride to Wamego where they eat pancakes before riding back to Manhattan to complete the 38-mile bike trip.

On Tuesdays the club conducts bike time trials and members ride 10 miles for speed. Then, on Thursday's the group does a track work-out, Delgado said.

In addition, Larsen said when Tuttle Creek Lake is warm enough the members will go on some open water swims.

"Although members work-out as a group," Delgado said, "triathlons are an individual competition and each individual will try to do the best he or she can in any particular race."

Tracy Anderson, a former K-State graduate in architecture and current Manhattan resident, placed 22nd in nationals last year in the 25-29 age group.

Anderson said he didn't participate in much of anything in high school and became involved in triathlons about four years ago.

"I love the competition and like to see if I can make other competitors hurt as bad as I do," Anderson said. "I like to find my limits, and it keeps me going because I feed off of that."

Ed Acevedo, director of the center for exercise research, enjoys the fitness aspect of being a member of the club as well as the social interaction.

"It's a real nice environment to work in when trying to reach your individual competitive goals," he said.

Delgado said a good way for new members to get involved in triathlons is to compete in a team triathlon. He said in a team triathlon each individual participates in just one portion of the race.

So, he said, if a person is a strong swimmer, he or she would enter the team triathlon in that area.

Anderson said the club meets at 7:30 p.m. the first Wednesday of every month in K-State Union, Room 209.

Brothers buy recreation area located east of Manhattan

MELANIE SCHOENBECK
Collegian Reporter

The former Fields of Fair Recreation Area east of Manhattan is under new ownership and is now the Blackjack Hills Recreation Area.

Joe and Dave Gabbard, brothers who co-own Smokey J's BBQ, bought the recreation area in January. Lynn Gabbard, Joe's wife, will oversee and manage Blackjack Hills.

"We had previously worked with the owner of Fields of Fair," Joe Gabbard said. "He had his winery located on the grounds and moved his store to Paxico. He did not have an ongoing everyday operation at the recreation area, and he contacted us about buying the area."

The brothers are changing the name of the recreation area from Fields of Fair to Blackjack Hills because the wine store is still an ongoing business. The change in name eliminates possible confusion, Joe Gabbard said.

"The area the park is located on is considered the blackjack region of the flint hills," he said.

"Blackjack Hills is a nice, private, secluded place to go out and have a good time and enjoy the outdoors at a reasonable price," Dave Gabbard said.

The recreation area offers guests a heated pavilion, grills, a kitchen and restrooms. Sand volleyball, horseshoes, softball and basketball. These are some of the activities available at Blackjack Hills, he said.

The management of Blackjack Hills will accommodate a range of requests from customers. This includes anything from booking bands or disc jockeys to providing transportation by bus to the complex.

"Blackjack Hills is not an uptight place with a million regulations," Dave Gabbard said. "You are not going to go out there and find posters with rules and regulations, but common sense does play a role."

"One of the owners will be on the site at all times," he said. "Therefore, when customers deal with us, they are not dealing with an employee who does not have authority to make decisions or changes."

Many groups in Manhattan have barn parties at Blackjack Hills, and Smokey J's occasionally serves the partygoers.

"It was really neat when they came into the restaurant to eat dressed in boots and cowboy shirts. Our atmosphere fits their attire," he said.

Dole Hall opens in April Building to contain communications center

LAURA BIRRELL
Collegian Reporter

The Bob Dole Hall will be dedicated in early April and will then be open to the public.

Once the building is fully functional, the Kansas Board of Regents' Telenet, the Educational Communications Center, the TV curriculum from the A.Q. Miller School of Journalism and Mass Communications and the Cooperative Extension will occupy the hall.

"The Bob Dole Hall will bring us up to the edge of our technological abilities, and hopefully it will continue to grow," Vincent Cool, assistant director of Architecture and Engineering Services and University architect, said. "As a land grant university, we not only have the responsibility to educate the students, but to research and educate the Kansas population. This building will give us the ability to communicate with Kansas through a satellite that contacts 105 county representatives.

"But, it is not something that will be in full production in a week," he said.

Mel Chastain, associate professor of the Broadcasting Educational Communications Center, said, "The Bob Dole building is a state of the art facility that will extend the sources of Kansas. We are looking forward to moving into the building."

The hall will include a variety of technology, including videotaping facilities, six television studios and educational labs.

As of now, no one is operating out of Dole Hall. The contractor is completing a punchlist. A punchlist is when a contractor inspects the building for problems.

The only problem the contractor has found is some of the studios are not muting noise as originally planned. He said this should be fixed in a few weeks.

Cool said after the contractor's inspection, the University will have to install and wire the equipment.

Groups share drug education

Conference to address abuse problems

LAURA BIRRELL
Collegian Reporter

Representatives from K-State and other universities will meet in Hays for the Third Annual Conference on Alcohol and Drug Abuse Prevention Feb. 21-22.

The conference is called "Who's In Charge of Your Life?" and is presented by the Kansas Board of Regents Systemwide Committee for Substance Abuse Issues.

K-State will send representatives from the Alcohol and Other Drug Education Service, University Counseling Services, University Housing, Greek Affairs, Health Education, the theater department and Students Against Drunk Driving.

The conference will consist of three main programs. David Leschke, director of Chapter Services in Boost Alcohol Consciousness Concerning the Health of University Students International, will present a program called "Eddy Talks" about someone who is the life of the party. He said everyone knows an Eddy at the parties, but Leschke talks about what Eddy is like when he goes home.

Ris Que Business is a theater group that presents live theater of issues related to the use of alcohol and other drugs.

"We are taking a representative from the theater department to see if they would be interested in doing a similar presentation at K-State," said Bill Arck, director of Alcohol and Other Drug Education Service.

"This program will be about the power commercials for alcohol have over your mind," Arck said. "An example would be a beer commercial and a man surrounded by beautiful women. The message this sends to you is if you drink this beer you will attract women."

This is the first year that the conference has been open to schools not in the Board of Regents. But, these schools will have to pay a registration fee, while the committee pays for all regent participants.

"I think this is a great opportunity for students and faculty of different schools to get together and share ideas," said Kenyon Madden, assistant director of Alcohol and Other Drug Education Service and faculty advisor for SADD.

"In the past, these conferences have been very energizing and informative," Madden said, "and there is a greater variety of information being offered this year."

He said he was interested in finding out what other schools' SADD organizations are doing with designated driver programs.

"K-State's SADD is a leader in this program," Madden said.

Seagulls return to tour, release album

By the Collegian Staff

A Flock of Seagulls landed on the pop charts about the same time MTV hit cable television, and Tuesday night they roosted at Snookie's.

After a couple of songs hit the charts, one of which was "I Ran," a song that played on MTV every hour on the hour during the network's infancy, the Seagulls faded into obscurity. But they're still flying, band members said, and have recently released an album titled "The Best of a Flock of Seagulls" through RCA.

Lead singer Mike Score said the band is generally touring, and he doesn't need a reason to enjoy it.

"We're touring basically because we like to play — that's why we're in a band," Score said.

Guitarist Ed Berner said he enjoys touring because he gets to meet lots of people and travel. Berner has been with Seagulls for four and a half years.

"You see every part of the country," Berner said. "You can't believe that you've driven 200 miles and hit two towns. I wouldn't do anything else if I had a choice."

Score said touring keeps the band in touch with what the people want. He said he writes all the songs himself and he said, to him, the music hasn't changed over the years — it is original.

Berner said the sound's bigger now. They still play the old stuff the way it was written to be played, but the band is better now. He said the music is pleasing to listen to and deals with their experiences together.

Score said he doesn't enjoy the spotlight often. He wants to have fun and let people know the band is still around.

"If you expect to sell out everywhere then you'll be disappointed," Score said. "When you don't expect anything and it happens — then it's a great time."

He said they rehearse just enough to remember the songs.

"There's no rehearsal like playing live," Score said.

The band expects to stop touring in the United States around the end of March. Then they may tour in South America or Australia, but if that doesn't work out they'll go back to the studio to work on a new album.

"We've got to go to the studio really soon," Score said.

Berner said he'd like to see the band working on an album or at least some demos soon. He wants to take the time to put out a quality album.

Score said he got the inspiration to name the band A Flock of Seagulls from a book. He thought it was unusual and would be remembered. He said people made fun of it, but the name got them recognition.

A Flock of Seagulls has four original albums and two different formats of "The Best of a Flock of Seagulls."

"It's more than I ever expected to make," Score said.

Group's music follows British folk-rock trend

REBECCA SACK
Collegian Reviewer

The Hollow Men's third album, "Cresta," delivers exactly what its name promises — a fizzy, fruity, sherbety, soft drink popular in Britain in the 1970s.

The band follows a trend in British folk rock to return to certain sounds of the childhood of rock music. The Hollow Men take this reminiscing and add their own unique mix of sounds to create a funky, jazzy, mellow, cool and easy album.

Tambourines, bongos, steel guitars and tiny drums accompany David Ashmore's airy vocals. Most of the songs are poetic landscapes, which have a complexity and attraction that complement the innovative resolutions of the rhythmic patterns and light melody lines.

"November Comes," was the first single from this album to be released in the United States. At first, the rhythm suggests new-wave dance music, but it resolves into floating guitar riffs and vocal harmonies that settle the album in its melancholy.

Reviewer says ...

This simplicity won't allow us to be bored, however, because the Hollow Men insert plenty of brand new sounds. "Penetra Rosa" begins with the whirring of eerie whistles. I recognized this sound from those hollow plastic tubes that sing when you swing them around in circles. This creative sound is most likely a manifestation of the group's toy-collecting hobby. It is a great sound, and this recording doesn't fully do it justice. But this and other groovy soundeffects add an eccentric dimension to the song highlighted with lyrics like, "She's gonna catch my drift."

Other poetic lyrics include, "If you think you're dying, dream yourself awake," from "Tongue Tied"; "Smile the only way that you know how," from "Headstruck"; and "Please stay misunderstood," from "Misunderstood."

"Cresta" has great musical moments as well, with guitar solos reaching the same frenzy of electric roars without any raw metal sounds. The funky rhythm throughout the album is brought to a head in the introduction to "Beautiful Sun," which sounds like Lenny Kravitz funk.

The Hollow Men do a great service to bongos and tambourines, and it would seem that with all this attention to the sounds of the sixties, the album would lose all originality and modern expression. It doesn't. "Cresta" is just as much a 1990s album as it is a reflexion of the 1960s. The Hollow Men allow the roots of their music to show through their resolution of the past — and there's not a hint of paisley anywhere on the album cover.

Flags' popularity grows with war

Local stores find problems meeting consumer demand

ARLOAH FAIRCHILD
Collegian Reporter

Flags have become a popular item in stores since the Persian Gulf War began.

Silva Hasty, department manager of Wal-Mart in Manhattan, said, "Since the war started, I have gotten at least 20 telephone calls a day asking if I have any flags. I usually have 36 flags come in at a time, and within two hours they are gone."

John Folkerts, store manager for Gibson's in Junction City, said the American flag is an item usually ordered only twice a year. Now he has had to order several more times, and flags are on back order.

"I had gotten a good buy on flags last year and had bought 400 flags," he said. "Those were sold out within three or four days after the war started."

"I get around three phone calls a day asking for flags, which is several more than normal. We even have people asking for the high-dollar flags now," Folkerts said.

Bruce Marvin, primary drill instructor for K-State's ROTC, said,

"The flag of the United States represents the living country and is considered a living thing."

The union, or the field of blue with stars is the honor point, Marvin said. When displaying the flag, the union is always in the right corner if a person is holding the flag.

"A good way to tell if the union is in the right position is to look at the flag from the front and if it is on your left, then it is in the correct position," he said.

He explained the Army uses five different flags — the Garrison flag, post flag, field flag, storm flag and interment flag.

The Garrison flag is used during holidays and important occasions, Marvin said, while a post flag — made of nylon — is used for general display and flown daily.

A field flag is displayed as the positional field flag, and an interment flag is used on coffins and is the only exception, allowing a flag to be draped over something, he said.

When there is inclement weather, the storm flag is flown, Marvin said, and if a person doesn't have a storm flag, the flag shouldn't be flown.

How to properly fold U.S. flag

To show proper respect for the flag, it should be folded the same way every time when it is put in storage.

Here are the six steps to folding the flag:

1. Fold the lower striped section of the flag over the blue field.
2. Fold the folded edge over to meet the open edge.
3. Start a triangular fold by bringing the striped corner of the folded edge to the open edge.
4. Fold the outer pointer inward parallel with the open edge to form a second triangle.
5. Continue folding until the entire length of the flag is folded into a triangle with only the blue field and margin showing.
6. Tuck the remaining margin into the pocket formed by the folds at the blue field edge of flag.
7. The properly folded flag should resemble a cocked hat.

Remember to never let the flag touch the ground.

GREGORY A. BRANSON/Collegian

In the Army, the colors — which are flags of organizations and certain civilian and military officials — are taken care of by a non-commissioned officer. Any officer between the ranks of corporal and command sergeant major are non-commissioned officers.

"It is an honor to be in charge of the colors," Marvin said. "The flag should never be used as a tablecloth,"

Arabic classes offer unique opportunity

JEFF STURDY
Collegian Reporter

K-State offers something few universities have — classes about the Arabic language.

"I think this is the only university that has (Arabic) classes in the whole state," said Ghassan Moghnieh, instructor of Arabic. "I believe that KU fazed it out."

Moghnieh, who is from Lebanon, enrolled at K-State in the fall semester of 1986. He is currently a graduate teaching assistant in agricultural economics.

Moghnieh began teaching the classes in the spring semester of 1988. There are currently four levels of Arabic classes offered. Levels one and three are taught in the fall semester and levels two and four are taught in the spring of 1988, Moghnieh said.

"They (Arabic language students) most usually come from political science majors and are interested in the Middle East," Moghnieh said. "There are also many Pakistani students."

He said enrollment size usually varies between 10 and 12 students.

"I'm interested to see if the events of the past few months will have a big effect on the size of enrollment," said Bradley Shaw, head of the Department of Modern Languages.

K-State does not offer a major in the Arabic language, however, students have reasons to learn the difficult language.

"It started out as a cult study, then I found out there was a lot of money in translation for the big oil companies," said Lance Tuck, junior in psychology.

Tuck said he is enrolled in Arabic level four.

Maria Santucci, junior in theater and costume design, is currently enrolled in Arabic level two. She has different reasons for learning the Arabic language.

"I spent half of my life in Saudi Arabia and Kuwait, so it's more of a personal thing," Santucci said. K-State has had some outside funding that has allowed Arabic to continue, Shaw said.

"We fully intend to continue teaching Arabic, provided the funds are there," he said.

Greeks unite, change places

ANNE TATUM
Collegian Reporter

This year, for the first time, black greek organizations participated in rotating roommates and brotherhood exchange with other campus greek organizations.

Every year in February, the Panhellenic and Interfraternity Councils organize the event. About three people from each sorority and most fraternities participate in the 10-day swap, which started Sunday and continues through Feb. 27.

Mindy Loughman, junior in human development and family studies and Panhellenic executive secretary, organized the rotating roommates for sororities. Loughman said it was part of Panhellenic's goals to become more interrelated with the black greek organizations.

"Our main goal this year was to work with the multicultural organizations and work on relations with them," she said.

Sigma Sigma Sigma, Pi Beta Phi, Alpha Xi Delta, Gamma Phi Beta, Kappa Delta and Delta Delta Delta were sororities hosting members from the three black sororities.

Although all sororities would have liked to participate in the exchange, Loughman said, there were room restrictions in the other houses and not enough bed space for the women.

Fraternities call this exchange of men a brotherhood exchange.

IFC President Johnny Gaffney, sophomore in pre-law, said plans for the exchange were made last semester.

The men are given choices as to where they would like to stay and then everything possible is done to see they get their first choice.

"The National Interfraternity Conference, National Panhellenic Conference and the Panhellenic Conference developed a program to provide more interaction between the organizations," he said. "It was coincidental that the week to participate in the program and the week of brotherhood exchange and rotating roommates was the same."

Gaffney said this was an excellent opportunity for the black greek organizations to see what a chapter house was like.

Yesterday's Cryptoquip: REAL ESTATE ATTORNEY'S SLOGAN: "DO GOOD DEEDS."

Today's Cryptoquip clue: H equals C

The Cryptoquip is a simple substitution cipher in which each letter used stands for another. If you think that X equals O, it will equal O throughout the puzzle. Single letters, short words, and words using an apostrophe can give you clues to locating vowels. Solution is accomplished by trial and error.

Emma, played by Camille Diamond, junior in theater, comforts her lover, Jerry, played by Jeff Frye, sophomore in elementary education, during rehearsal of "Betrayal" Monday night in the Purple Masque Theatre.

Play tells story of love triangle

LISA NOLL
Collegian Reporter

K-State students won't have to tune into their favorite soap opera this week, they can see "Betrayal" instead.

"Betrayal" by Harold Pinter will be presented at 8 tonight and Friday in the Purple Masque Theatre.

The play is a study of a nine-year violation of trust and focuses on three main characters, Robert, Emma and Jerry. Robert and Emma are married, and Emma is having an affair with Robert's best friend, Jerry.

"There's more backstabbing in the show than in any soap opera," said Jeff Kaufman, graduate student in speech and play director.

Kaufman said he thinks students will enjoy "Betrayal" because the show is intense.

The love-triangle story is portrayed in reverse. In the opening of the play, Robert, Jerry and Emma are shown two years after the affair. The play ends with the three as the affair began.

Kaufman said the play is intriguing because it is so ambiguous. The characters have a way of talking in which they mean one thing but say something else, Kaufman said.

Jeff Frye, sophomore in special education and Jerry in the play, said he enjoys the hidden meanings throughout the play.

"Even now, the actors are finding out new things about their characters," Frye said. "I'll be happy if we can convey half of the meaning to the audience."

Tickets for the production are available at the McCain Box Office. Prices are $1 for students and $2 for faculty members.

Strickland, a member of the Alpha Phi Alpha fraternity, said he wanted to be part of the exchange to gain an understanding and education.

"A lot of things are misunderstood on this campus because of ignorance," Strickland said. "This was a good chance to learn the differences and similarities of the fraternities."

Tamara Morrow, junior in food science and former president of Alpha Kappa Alpha, was planning to stay in the Tri-Sigma house, but because of schedule conflicts she was unable to participate.

Morrow said she wanted to do it because she knew it would be an interesting experience.

"I've never been in a sorority before, and I thought it would be interesting to stay in one," she said.

Christi Baldon, senior in marketing and management and a member of Zeta Phi Beta, said she thought it was a good idea.

"I think it is good," Baldon said. "It gives us both a chance to learn about organizations and how they work, and at the same time they can learn what mine is all about."

Calvin Mayfield, senior in electrical engineering and a Phi Beta Sigma, said he is participating because the chance was offered to him. Mayfield is staying in the Alpha Tau Omega fraternity.

"The biggest thing was that it was offered," Mayfield said. "They put their hands out to us and our duty was to put our hand out and grab the opportunity."

"Who knows what will happen from here," he said.

"It should be turned into something positive," said Stunkel. Incentives to have the inspection certificate should be encouraged, she said.

Changes and improvements need to be made in order to provide safe housing, Candidate Linda Ferguson said. She also said apartments should be inspected every three years to ensure safety.

"I think we have to address substandard apartments," she said.

Raborn said rental inspection is needed, but shouldn't cost landlords or tenants very much.

Cooperation from landlords is also essential, Stunkel said.

"We need to educate renters before they rent, not after," Stunkel said.

Education goes both ways, and landlords need to be educated too, Candidate Helen Cooper said.

"Anytime someone uses the mass media to reach a particular audience to influence them to do something, that is propaganda," Nelson said.

Both Bush and Saddam are engaged in propaganda, he said.

"It is interesting that both presidents Bush and Hussein are using the same phrase — that this is a just war — to sell it to their target groups," Nelson said.

Monica Fitch, junior in secondary education and math and an audience member, said her husband and thousands of other American soldiers are fighting the war to liberate Kuwait.

"Let's think about the people in Kuwait who are dying because he (Saddam) stepped in. We're in it getting back what belongs to the Kuwaitis."

Flags

He said the only exception to the rule of the blue being at the top is when the flag is flown upside down as a distress signal.

When taking down the flag to fold it, it is important the flag doesn't touch the ground, Marvin said, because it could get soiled and become disserviceable.

The flag should be displayed from sunrise each day until sunset, Marvin said, the raising of the flag occurs every day at 6 a.m., and the flag is brought back down at 5 p.m. This is a worldwide tradition.

Always fold the flag in the proper manner and display in a position of prominence and honor, Marvin said. The flag should never be put in a desk drawer or in a pigeon hole.

"A flag shouldn't be left out at night unless there is a spotlight shining directly on it," Marvin said, "and when the flag becomes disserviceable it should be burned."

"This isn't like burning the flag in a demonstration dishonorably," he said. "The ceremony should be honorable. Usually the Army does it at a military installation."

Judge upholds kennel ruling

By the Associated Press

OTTAWA — A judge Wednesday upheld a ruling that dogs in a woman's kennel were seized illegally because authorities did not have a search warrant.

The Oct. 5 raid on Marilyn Marsh's kennel was organized by the state attorney general's office. Evidence seized included 126 dogs, nearly all of them Akitas, which the office said were poorly cared for.

But Franklin County District Court Judge Jules Doty upheld a magistrate's ruling that the evidence should be suppressed. He said he regretted his ruling.

"The evidence I've heard indicates to me there were terrible conditions existing in this (kennel)," the judge said.

But he said the lack of a search warrant violated Marsh's Fourth Amendment rights under the U.S. Constitution.

The raid followed a state animal officer's inspection of the Marsh property the previous day.

Doty said the state's newer puppy mill law was flawed because it didn't provide that the animal health division should get a search warrant before seizing animals. In two other highly publicized puppy mill raids — one in Topeka and one in Miami County — search warrants were used, the judge said.

The attorney general's office filed the misdemeanor cruelty charge against Marsh, a Topeka resident, after Franklin County Attorney Wendell Barker refused to do so. Baker said the state should have gotten a search warrant.

CONFERENCE

principal-counselor-student

The Office of Admissions cordially invites former students of these high schools to attend the 1991 Principal-Counselor-Student Conference. High school principals and counselors will be on campus to visit with you about your preparation for and experiences in KSU academic programs. Your participation will help the University build a stronger relationship with your former high school faculty. You are welcome to drop by between 10:15 a.m. and 12:15 p.m. on Thursday, Feb. 21. This is an excellent opportunity for you to renew old friendships with former classmates. The Provost has asked that your instructors excuse you from these class periods.

Iraq accepts Soviet plan

By the Associated Press

WASHINGTON — The Soviet-Iraqi proposal to end the Persian Gulf war is unacceptable to the United States, a senior Bush administration official said early Friday.

This official, speaking under rules that prevent use of his name, volunteered the assessment following a meeting of President Bush with his senior national security advisers that lasted more than an hour and 40 minutes.

"The main conclusion is that the Soviet proposal represents a conditional withdrawal which is clearly beyond the scope of the U.N. resolutions," the official said.

"The Soviet call for lifting of economic sanctions and lifting the U.N. resolutions amounts to a conditional withdrawal that would be unacceptable to the United States."

The official said administration officials were communicating that conclusion to coalition partners and expected to make public comments later Friday.

Bush

Before Bush's meeting, which broke up at midnight, the administration was careful not to reject the Soviet plan, saying only that Bush had serious concerns about it.

"The war itself continues," said White House spokesman Marlin Fitzwater, acknowledging Bush had not decided yet whether to open a ground assault that for days had seemed imminent.

Earlier in the day, Defense Secretary Dick Cheney said allied forces were massing for one of the largest land assaults of modern times, a comment that lent urgency to the Iraqi mission to Moscow.

Fitzwater said, "We have had our hopes raised before" but pledged that "we are taking a look at" the Moscow plan. He said the White House would consult with coalition leaders, and Secretary of State James Baker III began the contacts with calls to foreign ministers of Canada, Britain, France and Egypt.

Bush himself went to the theater, but then summoned advisers to the late-night meeting to review Moscow's plan, officials said. One administration source said among the problem areas were a proposed early end to sanctions against Baghdad and the avoidance of war reparations by Iraq.

Soviet President Mikhail Gorbachev called Bush Thursday night to brief him on details of the plan. The president thanked him for his efforts "but raised serious concerns about several points in the plan," Fitzwater said.

"The president has indicated there could well be some difficulties here," Fitzwater said. It was far from a rejection, but the White House resisted questions about whether there was anything positive in the proposal.

"I don't want to give it any characterization," Fitzwater said.

In the administration's view, the Soviet plan deals primarily with an Iraqi withdrawal from Kuwait and an assurance that Saddam's troops will not be attacked as they leave.

The 12 U.N. Security Council resolutions go much further imposing an economic boycott against Iraq. "They were imposed for a purpose, and lifting them requires more than just a pullout," an official familiar with the proposal said. The administration believes the sanctions should be kept in force even after complete withdrawal, he said.

Fort Riley keeps busy with media

Post public affairs office serves as 1st Infantry information way-station

DAVID FRESE
Staff Reporter

Mark Meseke has been busy. Since the 1st Infantry Division received orders to deploy to Saudi Arabia, Meseke and his staff at Fort Riley's public affairs office have been contacted by media from New York to Tokyo.

"Before deployment, we averaged maybe 20 media visits a month," Meseke said. "Since deployment, we have had at least 20 visits a week and sometimes that many a day."

Fort Riley public affairs is the way-station for all information, what there is of it, out of Saudi Arabia that pertains to the 1st Division. Fort Riley receives no word of positions of the division, and it receives little information at all before the rest of the world does.

"We watched on television the announcement that the 1st Division was going to Saudi Arabia—that was our official notification," he said. "We saw it when the rest of the nation did."

Part of the reason for that is Fort Riley is not in charge of the 1st Division any longer. The Big Red One's orders now come directly from the top.

"Schwarzkopf and Bush—they're the ones making the big decisions," Meseke said. "We're the little guys. Little guys don't make the big decisions."

That lack of command leaves Fort Riley and Fort Riley public affairs in the dark about many crucial issues, such as when a ground war might start—Meseke said he didn't know—where the division is—Meseke said he couldn't comment at this time—when the troops might be back—Meseke said he couldn't second-guess the president—and why no more troops are being sent over—

Meseke said he had no idea.

Since the division doesn't report to Fort Riley any longer, there is no specific need at Fort Riley to know where it is or what it is doing, Meseke said. The exception to that rule comes when a soldier from the division is injured or killed. And that chain of information is a tough one to follow.

When a soldier is injured or killed, the information comes to Fort Riley through what Meseke called "certain channels." That information is given to notify the family of the casualty. After notification is made, it is sent back to the Department of Defense and then released to Fort Riley, which can then give the information to the press.

"A lot of times that means we are not able to confirm incidents until several days later," he said. "It is something the Department of Defense is controlling just to ensure families are notified properly rather than hearing it on the radio or on television."

Meseke said all reports out of Saudi Arabia are supposed to be cleared by the Defense Department. But some reports, no matter how reliable the sources, cannot be confirmed by Fort Riley until it receives word from its proper channels.

Despite Fort Riley's lack of current information, Meseke said he anticipates an invasion of media-types when a ground war begins.

"We've had several promises by members of the media that they were going to camp out on our doorstep when the ground war begins," he said.

"Once the ground war starts, we'll probably just sit all the reporters in a room and turn the television on CNN," he said.

Officer released from duties

Friendly fire deaths fall on commander

By the Associated Press

WITH THE 1ST INFANTRY DIVISION IN SAUDI ARABIA — The commander of a battalion of Apache helicopters has been relieved of his post after mistakenly firing on two U.S. armored vehicles, killing two American soldiers.

Officers in the 1st Infantry Division said Army Lt. Col. Ralph Hayles, of Corpus Christi, Texas, violated division guidelines stating commanding officers were not to personally engage enemy forces.

Hayles had been flying the Apache with the same crewmen for 15 months. He had been involved in aviation modernization for 12 years in the Army.

The two American soldiers were killed Sunday while a division task force was conducting screening operations just inside the Iraqi border and was attacked by an armored column. U.S. troops returned fire with TOW missiles and artillery, then called in the Apaches for closer support.

Two Iraqi tanks were reported destroyed. There were no American casualties at the hands of the Iraqis. Six soldiers were wounded.

The division said in a statement released at the time that the Apache crew was a well-disciplined and trained crew.

In an interview last month, Hayles said aggressive use of the Apache would ultimately reduce American battlefield casualties.

"I think opportunities exist to use the Apache right from the start," he said. "I think we have a big license to go out there and maximize our technological advantages to minimize casualties. I'd like to see some bold use of the Apaches."

Casualties falsely attributed to Fort Riley soldiers in gulf

DAVID FRESE
Staff Reporter

Officials at Fort Riley said preliminary reports of casualties in the 1st Infantry Division in Saudi Arabia this past week were attributed to the wrong brigade.

The incident in which Iraqi mortar fire killed two soldiers involved the 2nd Armored Division (Forward), which has been assigned to the 1st Infantry Division in Saudi Arabia in support of Desert Storm.

An infantry division usually consists of three brigades, said Mark Meseke, Fort Riley public affairs. The 1st Division's third brigade, the 1st Infantry Division (Forward), was stationed in Germany and in the process of being deactivated when the Persian Gulf War began. The 2nd Armored Division (Forward), which was also formerly stationed in Germany, filled the void left by the 1st's Forward brigade for Desert Storm.

The 2nd is now a part of the 1st Division and is under the command of Maj. Gen. Thomas Rhame.

Meseke said he could not comment on the structure and the artillery of the 2nd Division, but said an armored division typically has tanks and is armor-heavy. The primary weapon of the 2nd is the M1A1 Abrams tank, which is a main battle tank with a 105mm gun in its turret and a crew of four.

"It's not that the 2nd Division has anything the 1st doesn't have," Meseke said. "It is a third brigade to round out the division."

Senate debates priorities for Legislative funding

ANDREW CAPPS
Collegian Reporter

Student Senate discussed the endorsement of the Legislature's priorities on state budgeting for the upcoming lobby day last night.

Student senators will lobby for state funding for K-State Feb. 26 in Topeka.

The priorities were set by Todd Heitschmidt, student body president, and Sean Cash, arts and science senator. Senate's priorities for the Legislature are as follows: full funding of the base budget, initiating a plan for the completion of the Throckmorton Plant Science Building, full funding of the Margin of Excellence and a 100-percent graduate teaching assistant fee waiver.

"I don't believe we're asking for too much," Heitschmidt said. "We are just asking for help in supporting higher education."

With the completion of the Throckmorton project, Farrell Library's renovation and addition will become the first priority on the Kansas Board of Regents' capital improvements list.

Heitschmidt said he didn't expect to have all the goals met, and they would settle for a combination of changes in budgeting.

"The financial situation of the state is not great," Heitschmidt said in explanation to why all the goals cannot be achieved.

Senate also passed a resolution for the approval of the 1991 Athletic Ticket Sales Committee.

Students were selected based on experience, previous involvement and personal interviews. Kent Calhoon, junior in finance, was selected as tribunal chancellor and will act as committee chairman.

"The committee will be primarily concerned with the possibility of disbandment of the campout procedure for basketball tickets," said Jeff Peterson, agriculture senator.

Hard work successful for team

MARLA ROCKHOLD
Collegian Reporter

The K-State debate team has been ranked No. 1 in the nation since November 1990.

But having a top debate team is nothing new to K-State. Last year's team took second at national competition.

Providing leadership for the team are some upperclassmen who are doing incredibly well, said Susan Stanfield, director of debate.

She said at the last tournament, K-State "closed out" the University of Missouri-Kansas City in the final round.

The team of Martin Horn, senior in speech, and Dan Molden, senior in speech, tied the team of David Filippi, senior in speech, and Richard McCollum, senior in speech, for first place, Stanfield said.

The debate team will compete in the prestigious "Heart of America" tournament Saturday and Sunday at the University of Kansas.

Stanfield said there will be about 70 teams, including some of the best in the nation at this tournament.

"It is a really big, prestigious tournament," Molden said. "A lot of teams from all over the nation will be there."

Scholar studies Mozart's death

NEW YORK (AP) — A French scholar believes Mozart died of a head injury, not rheumatic fever or poisoning as many thought. The conclusion by anthropologist Pierre-Francois Puech of the University of Provence resulted from his finding a fracture in the skull believed to have been the composer's. Archaeology magazine reports in its March issue.

The magazine said Mozart was known to have begun suffering severe headaches in the spring of 1790, more than a year before his death.

Puech said the fracture, of the left temple, may have been the result of a fall.

Puech found indications that the fracture caused chronic bleeding that might well account for Mozart's headaches, weakness and fainting, culminating in his coma and subsequent death Dec. 5, 1791, the magazine said.

FDA approves new cancer drug

WASHINGTON (AP) — The Food and Drug Administration has approved a new, genetically engineered drug it said could annually help an estimated 225,000 cancer patients.

The drug works by boosting production of infection-fighting white blood cells, which are reduced or killed entirely by many kinds of cancer-fighting drugs.

FDA Commissioner David Kessler said the drug, called granulocyte colony-stimulating factor, or G-CSF, is a pioneer therapeutic product.

While other biotechnological treatments have proven useful for only small numbers of patients, he said, a large number of cancer patients can benefit from G-CSF.

The drug may be used for patients undergoing myelosuppressive chemotherapy, a type that destroys cancer cells and certain immune cells. These patients, an estimated 225,000 each year, are vulnerable to infections that can be life-threatening, he said.

Bill could add 10 days to school year

TOPEKA (AP) — During its first hearing Thursday on a bill that would add 10 days to the school year, the House Education Committee heard testimony from only one proponent of the measure and one opponent.

However, Rep. Al Ramirez, R-Bonner Springs, warned his fellow committee members that when word of the bill gets out, hearing rooms will be packed.

Under the bill, the number of required school days would increase from 180 to 190 days. Although the bill only names public schools, the compensatory attendance law requires private schools maintain the equivalent of the number of hours required by public schools.

Brilla Scott, representing the United School Administrators of Kansas, said her group's members support the bill because they believe more time is needed to complete the objectives of education. However, she said administrators also want schools to receive more financing if school years are increased.

Craig Grant, representing Kansas National Education Association, said his association's members reluctantly oppose the bill.

Gang member sentenced for murder

WICHITA (AP) — A 21-year-old man, one of four gang members convicted of stomping a woman to death, will not be eligible for parole for 90 years.

On Thursday, Sedgwick County District Judge Russell Cranmer sentenced Darrell Bailey of Wichita to a controlling term of 50 years in prison and a consecutive life sentence with no possibility for parole for 40 years.

Bailey was convicted of first-degree murder and 13 other crimes in a 24-hour spree during which Insane Crips gang members celebrated his leader's birthday.

Michael Studtman, Bailey's defense lawyer, said Bailey is remorseful about the July 21, 1990 death of Roseanna "Pat" Johnson, 49, and the other crimes. He said Bailey had a clean record before that night.

Shooting suspects returned to jail

WHEAT RIDGE, Colo. (AP) — Five men arrested in Colby for the violent robbery of a Wheat Ridge, Colo., church were returned to Colorado and placed in the Jefferson County Jail, authorities said.

The suspects were brought back from Kansas by car, said Wheat Ridge police spokeswoman Peggy Rowlett.

The five, held for investigation of first-degree assault, aggravated robbery and committing a violent crime, are being held on $1 million bond each. They waived extradition Tuesday after being arrested early Sunday for speeding.

One of the suspects admitted shooting The Nguyen, 57, in the leg with a shotgun during the robbery at Queen of the Vietnamese Martyrs Catholic Church in Wheat Ridge early Saturday. Doctors later amputated the leg.

Committee updates AIDS booklet

The K-State Committee on Communicable Disease revised and updated its Questions and Answers at a meeting in the Union Thursday.

Questions and Answers is a booklet of information concerning Acquired Immune Deficiency Syndrome (AIDS) published yearly to educate students about AIDS and the HIV virus, and to inform students about campus policies and procedures involving students or personnel who have tested positive for the HIV virus.

The committee — with the help of Scott Rich, director of the Topeka AIDS Project — reviewed the current edition of the pamphlet and decided there were several areas to be updated and revised before they send it in to be printed for the fall.

One correction the committee said needed to be made is to address the disease as the HIV virus rather than specifically referring to it as AIDS, so as to include all people who have had a positive HIV test, not just people who actually have AIDS.

The new, revised version of Questions and Answers will be published this summer in time for the 1991 fall semester.

Debate leads student senator to resign

CINDY BRIGGS
Collegian Reporter

Following an intense debate over a resolution to prohibit smoking in the K-State Union, Laura Vetter, sophomore in philosophy, resigned from Student Senate Feb. 7.

Senate Chairman Pete Marsh, junior in hotel and restaurant management, said Vetter, a non-traditional student, will be missed.

Marsh said she was an advocate for non-traditional students in a student body where the majority of students are 18- to 23-years-old.

"I wish she wouldn't have (resigned)," he said. "She definitely had a different perspective on all the issues. We didn't see eye-to-eye on all of them, but I valued her different views. It added spice to Senate — that will be missed."

Todd Heitschmidt, K-State student body president, said after talking to Vetter, he remains unclear on the reasons she resigned her Senate seat.

Heitschmidt said his main disappointment with Vetter's resignation was because she had fought hard to bring in the non-traditional point of view, and by resigning her seat she achieved the opposite of her intentions.

"We are definitely going to miss her point of view," he said. "Not necessarily her college constituents' views, but her non-traditional constituents' views," he said.

Vetter said the defeat of the smoking resolution was the last straw, but she didn't quit because she couldn't handle the defeat.

Vetter said when she ran for Senate last October, it was to represent the views of non-traditional and minority students. Earlier this semester she realized why non-traditional students are poorly represented in Senate and came to the conclusion she could no longer remain an effective senator for them.

"Non-traditional students can't afford the time to devote to Senate," she said. "Many non-traditional students express the desire to get involved with student government, but they can't juggle it with school, work and family."

Because of these restraints, she said she found herself unable to fulfill her obligations as a senator.

"I have one vote and many constituents that I, alone, represent," she said. "By virtue of just being me, there isn't enough representation. What I was getting out of it, I don't think, balanced the cost to my personal life and my family."

Vetter said there are too many senators, which makes it hard to hear everyone's voice and causes meetings to become lengthy. Non-traditional students with families can't devote that much time.

"I don't feel like there's a move in Senate to make it hard on non-traditional students," she said. "They just don't know what to do to make it different. There's not enough of me to do it for them."

If it wasn't for the need to spend time outside work and class with her family, Vetter said she would like to have remained in Senate.

"I just feel ineffective in the capacity. I really enjoyed Senate," she said. "If I could quit my job, my school, my family, then perhaps I could be an effective senator, but the representation of non-traditional students is so non-existent. Alone, I didn't feel I was effective."

Bernard Franklin, assistant dean of student life and Student Senate adviser, said he was also disappointed in Vetter's decision.

"The part that frustrates me is that we live in a day where people would rather complain about the system than participate in the system," he said.

Franklin said he perceived Vetter as a non-traditional, liberal voice who represented a significant amount of the student population. He questioned her reasons for quitting, because he said it is the students she represented who lose.

"People have to learn that the system is frustrating," Franklin said. "You'll not get everything you want. You learn to persevere through it." Franklin said Vetter sent a message to her constituents she couldn't take it and was no longer going to represent them.

"We want to make sure everyone is represented in Student Senate, and when students feel like they can't handle it, then the system becomes less sensitive to those we need to represent," he said.

Sen. Heather Smith, sophomore in political science, said there are other non-traditional senators, but most are graduate students who also don't have much time and aren't as outspoken as Vetter. She said she never realized there was a barrier between traditional and non-traditional students until the smoking resolution when many non-traditional students spoke at Senate.

"I'm sorry for her resignation because she could have done a lot for her constituents," Smith said. "We're still a diverse group, but she was so good at representing them."

Marsh agreed about the diversity of this year's Senate.

"It is a loss, but we're still a more diverse group than we've been in years past," he said.

Although Senate resignations aren't frequent, Marsh said most are due to conflicts in schedules. He said graduate students resign often because of conflicts with studies.

Greeks begin open rush

VALERIE HEARON
Collegian Reporter

Sigma Kappa and Sigma Sigma participated in open rush this week.

Both houses are conducting the open rush to increase membership to meet the standards set by the Panhellenic Council. "Open rush is an unstructured rush; only the houses that are in need of more members go through rush," said Jenny Barenberg, president of the Panhellenic Council.

Sigma Kappa, which had colonization last fall, is participating in open rush to increase the number of members in the house.

"Since we are a new chapter, Panhellenic is giving us the opportunity to increase our membership this spring. So, we are going to take advantage of it," said Karen Lind, colony president of Sigma Kappa.

The Panhellenic Council recently raised the quota of the total number of members each greek house at K-State has to meet. The total is now 130 members per house.

Currently, the Tri Sig house has 95 members and Sigma Kappa has 121.

"If you drop below total, then you can participate in open rush," said Mary Skinner, president of Tri Sig. "You can go over total, but only during fall rush."

To participate in open rush, a potential member must register in the Greek Affairs Office. The names are then given to the participating sororities and the proceedings are then up to the individual house.

One similarity between formal rush and open rush is the series of informal and preference parties potential members must attend.

"We call the girls and invite them for Coke dates, or informal gatherings, so we can get to know them and they can get to know us," Lind said.

Other sororities said they support the houses going through open rush.

"I think they are doing very well, and I wish them the best of luck," said Amy Harvey, president of Alpha Delta Pi.

OWLS provides unique support

Organization formed to address needs, problems of non-traditional students

By the Collegian Staff

Older Wiser Learning Students is an organization formed to address non-traditional students' problems because traditional students and organizations often can't understand the problems of non-traditional students.

"OWLS is an advocacy support group," said Dorothy Roberts, president of OWLS. "Most of the people who come to OWLS need things right away and when their needs are met, they may not be in contact with OWLS until they need something again."

"This causes OWLS to be a very changing group," Roberts said.

There is no way to identify a non-traditional student, she said. It's hard to know how many non-traditional students are enrolled at K-State because it's against the law to ask background questions of enrolling students. This makes it hard to target the non-traditional students and tell them about the services of OWLS, Roberts said.

Annita Huff, former graduate student who worked with OWLS, said many people think OWLS is only for older people, but the group is also open to young people who do not consider themselves traditional students.

OWLS is a volunteer organization and because many of the members are mothers, the group tries to plan social activities children can be involved in — these activities are usually picnics or barbecues.

The difference between non-traditional and traditional students is not an issue, just a recognition.

—Dorothy Roberts
president of OWLS

"Most of the social events are informal," Roberts said.

"The difference between non-traditional and traditional students is not an issue, just a recognition," Roberts said. "For many non-traditional students, it is hard to remember when they didn't have a lot to do or when they had time to participate. The degree of responsibility is different because a lot of non-traditional students have to go to school, study, work and take care of children."

Huff said, "OWLS has been reorganized because of loss of members. It is hard to get such a diverse group of people organized, and many have to commute to school."

Ad promotes K-State

BETH PALMER
Collegian Reporter

For 30 seconds, K-State will have the limelight.

A new commercial promoting scholarship will be aired Saturday during the basketball game, said Ron Kelley, assistant director of News Services. It will air only once during the televised game and will be shown the last three games of the season.

"It points out the high occurrence of scholars that K-State produces," said Jim Kinser, producer and director at the Educational Communications Center.

The commercial is set in Anderson Hall with President Jon Wefald and students who have received Rhodes, Marshall and Fulbright scholarships and the Top Black Engineering Student in the Nation.

The goal is to show prospective students and the Kansas taxpayers the track record K-State has in producing academic success, Kinser said. The commercial is shown on Raycom in Kansas and in the state K-State is playing.

"Each team (playing in the game) gets a 30-second spot to talk about their university," Kelley said.

Kelley worked with Wefald in deciding the best way to promote K-State. They decided to key in on the academic success the University has had over the years.

This is the second commercial K-State has made this year. The first commercial showing since football season is more generic with different campus scenes being highlighted, Kelley said. It gives an overview of K-State academics and the campus.

"We've been producing commercials for years, for at least seven-10 years," said John Fairman, assistant vice-president for institutional advancement.

K-State is unique among other universities in that it produces commercials with its own students, faculty and facilities, Fairman said. Most universities use outside sources, including professional media services.

Among the Big Eight, K-State is the only school not using a media service. K-State only spends a total of $1,200 on its production costs. The media services, in comparison, run much higher. Colorado spends the most at $50,000, while KU spends a minimum of $25,000.

"There is a difference in quality in some of these spots. They may not be as entertaining or as colorful as the others," Fairman said. "Our equipment is not as good as professional companies. You can see a difference when run back to back."

The recruiting success remains high for K-State though. Students say the campus atmosphere is like the video, no gimmicks.

Croatia, Slovenia invalidate laws, initiate secession from Yugoslavia

By the Associated Press

ZAGREB, Yugoslavia — Croatia has invalidated all federal laws on its territory and is joining its independence ally Slovenia in initiating secession from Yugoslavia.

Croatia's parliament, the Sabor, voted overwhelmingly to proclaim the superiority of its law over federal legislation. It unanimously approved a resolution formally starting its secession from Yugoslavia's federation of six republics and two provinces.

The parliament of Croatia's neighboring republic, Slovenia, took similar action Wednesday.

The moves raised the stakes for today's scheduled meeting of the federal presidency in Sarajevo. Four previous rounds aimed at sorting out Yugoslavia's ethnic, political and economic differences have failed.

All 340 deputies in the Sabor voted to adopt the resolution that foresees dissolving Yugoslavia, a nation of 24 million people, into two or more countries.

Any like-minded republics could join Croatia in a new, looser association of states that fully respect each others' sovereignty, the resolution said.

It said the federation should be dissolved in a peaceful manner and republics should emerge with their former borders intact.

Bill hits problems, misses the solutions

Recently a new bill outlining a laundry list of qualifications for admission to Kansas Board of Regents' schools was introduced into the Kansas Senate Education Committee. This bill, similar in content to one killed in the House only a year ago, gives strict conditions a prospective collegiate must adhere to in order to attend either Emporia State University, Wichita State University, Pittsburg State University, Fort Hays State University, Kansas College of Technology, the University of Kansas or our own purple paradise. "Why revive this suggestion?" one might ask. Well, perhaps by considering some of the major arguments founding this debate, we can discover the reasons behind this thinking and come to some sort of conclusion as to its validity.

A good place to begin would be at the proposal itself. The requirements outlined in Senate Bill 145 are basically as follows. Aspirants under 21 years of age must fulfill at least one of the following:

- Complete, with no less than a 2.0 grade point average, a pre-college curriculum designed and prescribed by the regents.
- Have a composite ACT score of at least 23.
- Rank in the top one-third of their high school class through seven completed semesters.

Those 21 or older wishing to drink from the well of regent education need only to have earned a GED certificate with a score of 50 or higher or to have graduated from an accredited Kansas high school.

There seem to be several basic assumptions founding this proposal.

We want better students attending our colleges.

This is an admirable goal, and I applaud our bosses in Topeka for trying. But, I would contend that with our contingent of Truman, Marshall, Mellon, Fulbright and Rhodes scholars (to give attention only to the big-name awards) we have attracted at least a few exceptional students through the status quo. K-State also possesses two national top-10 colleges in Engineering and Architecture. The Hotel and Restaurant Management program has experienced tremendous amelioration in the face of a wilting budget and I can personally vouch for the college of Arts and Sciences. Thus, I do agree somewhat with Wefald's token phrase, "This school must be doing something right."

With selective admissions, better-prepared students could reduce the number of years needed to complete a degree.

I would wholeheartedly agree that a better-prepared student could substantially shrink school time, but the answer doesn't lie in making the top tougher. In order to make the students better prepared, prepare them better in the lower phases of the educational process. Place more emphasis on reading comprehension, writing skills and more indi-dual attention, for starters. Build upward from there.

Another thing to keep in mind is that as the "real world" becomes more technologically dog-eat-dog, I think we'll witness a corresponding increase in basic graduation requirements as well — most assuredly in modern language proficiency.

Currently, there are too many freshmen dropping out, resulting in undue expense and frustration.

True, people do drop or flunk out of school, but college isn't for everyone. Some can't hack it, some find it boring or too expensive and some just find it different from what they expected. Nevertheless, people should have the ultimate choice. At present, with the standard admissions procedure, extensive network of junior and technical colleges, financial aid and wide-range of programs, almost anyone who wants to go to college can discover for themselves what is best.

That's the way it should be.

Believe it or not, not everyone likes or does well in high school, and this does not inherently mean these same people will make lousy academics. Some people who were not known for their previous book prowess discover an area for themselves, having burgeoned in a university setting. Others may have to overcome obstacles concerning race, sex, religion, socio-economic background or similar social stigmas. The last thing these people need is to find themselves subject to further restrictions.

Problems have already surfaced as to the cultural bias of the ACT. It is estimated that at K-State only about 30 percent of minority students would possess qualifying ACT composites under the newly proposed system. Sure, there are two other proponents to the bill, but the final two options also cater to somewhat specific backgrounds, possibly omitting many potential achievers.

The ACT may be somewhat biased, but 15 percent of incoming students may receive exemptions.

Here again, I think their heart is in the right place. However, the fear is that this 15 percent will rapidly be devoured by minority student athletes, leaving little room for gifted students, for example, who in bored frustration barely slide grade-wise through high school, but still wish to attend a university.

Senate Bill 145 hits the problems, but misses the solutions like a Scud missile. If you want selective admissions, apply to the Ivy League schools. The facts in the Midwest are that grades K-12 are in the most dire need of attention, and perhaps it's time for the Kansas Board of Regents to consider exercising its influence in the State Legislature in order to solve these problems. Gov. Joan Finney and her band of merry men and women need to steal more from the rich and give to the poor, devoting more purse power to innovative educational approaches and less to the interstates.

Students should leave Kansas high schools with a better understanding of the world as not merely a collection of separate spheres, but as a global community of interesting cultures and peoples, each deserving of admiration. More emphasis needs to be placed on the actual learning itself, instead of cold plastic GPAs that indicate very little about the degree of subject comprehension.

I'm not saying that I have all the answers, that's why it's called innovation — new approaches, new ideas. However, if the regents continue to neglect a grass-roots approach to educational problem solving, few plausible solutions will indeed succeed in dispelling the current learning crises plaguing the Kansas system.

Gorbachev offers peace plan, but rejects it on his homefront

On one hand, Mikhail Gorbachev comes bearing peace. He has stepped in prior to the imminent ground war in the gulf with a cease-fire proposal, the details of which are secret other than the withdrawal of Iraqi troops from Kuwait.

With the other hand, the one behind his back, he has rejected Lithuania's independence poll. He has ordered a Kremlin-controlled referendum instead — one designed, of course, to elicit a "yes" response to preserving the Soviet Union and to not allow the Baltic republics to choose independence.

It seems strange that one man would support the freedom of Kuwait and reject the cries for independence of another people. The actions do not seem to fit a Nobel Peace Prize winner who is supposed to be the epitome of peace. When the Baltic states asked for independence, they were given tanks and an ultimatum, not a negotiable proposal. Now, he is trying to stop tanks from overrunning soldiers in the gulf.

One has to wonder why Gorbachev would suddenly want to initiate peace, unless of course, he is worried about his image. He may have just realized how it looks for the current Nobel Peace Prize recipient to have tanks silencing protesters and Soviet officials dictating the wording of an independence poll.

Well, Gorbachev, it didn't work. You have already blown your image, causing us to wonder if you really deserved that peace prize. It seems you haven't completely fooled your own people, either, as they are now calling for your resignation. Offering to assume the role of the humble mediator does not hide what is going on in your own backyard.

If you are going to proffer peace, you need to do it with both hands, and to all people.

Access a must

Editor,

It is shameful that the U.S. military will not allow American reporters access to the truth of what our massive attack against Iraq is doing to thousands of innocent people in that country. Huge numbers may not be getting killed, but hundreds of thousands are being driven from their homes, and hundreds of thousands more are living in truly barbaric conditions.

We must face up to what our military forces are being ordered to do in the name of the American public. Much of what is being done sounds hypocritical in the face of our denunciations of Saddam Hussein.

If we are truly a moral country, let us urge our leadership to both spare the suffering of innocents and give the media appropriate access to enable them to tell us what is going on in the Middle East, so that we can find out if our demands are being carried out. Such levels of censorship and the brutalization of civilians is immoral no matter whose government is giving the orders.

Wendy Sue Herdman
senior in theater

Stop funding

Editor,

The United States exemplifies the democratic government that the Baltic States wish to create, yet, Mikhail Gorbachev has decided to remove all traces of democracy by military force.

Lithuania and Latvia, two of the 15 Baltic States, have become quarry to the panic of Gorbachev. Faced with the outcome of his accelerated reforms, panic consumed Gorbachev, forcing him to impose many of the restrictions previously removed under his reform policies. Since the merciless killings of Lithuanians, Gorbachev has placed restrictions on free speech and censored the press and television, thus blocking what was supposed to have been economic reform. Gorbachev's idea of the Kremlin's economic revival was based on the republics accepting a new union treaty keeping the Kremlin in supreme control. This new Union treaty only broadened the say the Baltic States would have on certain issues.

The National Review noted that at least seven of the 15 republics refused to sign the treaty and many had already elected non-Communist governments. Many Lithuanians have given their lives protecting their newfound faith in democracy.

While many Americans hail Gorbachev as a hero, the Baltic States suffer under the hand of this Nobel Peace Prize winner. Where is the peace or nobility in the destruction of the Baltic States? Various peace-seeking groups in the United States are screaming for us to stop the war against Iraq and place that money into social aid for our own country. I see it as more reasonable to channel the screams toward withdrawing the $1 billion in aid from the Bear while it seeks to destroy the democratic movement of Lithuania and Latvia.

Those who believe the myth that the Soviet Union is no longer a threat should view the Kremlin's military alliance against the Baltic States with renewed vigor. Everyone can understand the words "nuclear-capable." As long as the Soviet Union has the means to promote a nuclear war, they will always be a threat. So I ask, why are we providing aid to a country that allocates a larger percentage of its gross national product toward nuclear defense when claims are made of its babies starving? These questions can only be answered by the politicians advocating this gross misuse of funds to bail out the Bear. However, we will have to wait and see if the $1 billion (in aid) benefits the United States' businesses as greatly as Capitol Hill believes it will.

The misuse of governmental funds to help a potential dictatorship is much more dismaying than the appropriate use of funds to dismantle a dictator (Saddam) that may pose a greater threat in the future. Moreover, the $1 billion should be pulled from the Nobel Peace Prize winner until he can establish peace in the Baltic States with a democratic government.

Problem solved

Editor,

Whenever someone has a problem, they always look for a solution.

Problem: K-State Student Publications doesn't have enough money to fund its budget.

Solution: The K-State faculty and staff read the Collegian for free everyday.

Solution: Student Publications could charge a per person fee for everyone on campus, not just the students. Problem solved.

Discussion necessary

Editor,

This is regarding the Feb. 15 article about classroom discussion about the war. I am currently in the class Marlene Howell spoke of — women's studies. Of all my classes, physics, calculus, etc., her class is the only one in which the war is ever mentioned or discussed. Now I, of course, realize an open debate is not going to break out in the middle of a calculus lecture, but I find silence about the war disturbing. All of us are somehow affected by it, and as I sit there hearing about centripetal force and antidifferentiation it all seems so absurd! How are we supposed to detach from all the conflict and simply sit taking notes?

The last thing I want to do is depress people in class by talking about the reality of our men and women risking and fighting for their lives, but it seems like we are ignoring an awful lot. Howell said in the article, "I can't ignore reality and feel true as an educator." If nothing else, let's please offer ourselves the assurance that we can continue to learn about it all and not hide behind our classes, schedules and meetings. We are here to be educated and to educate each other. So please, talk about what you're thinking and express it to your friends and classmates. We are students; we should set the stage.

Lynn Hughes
sophomore in construction science

Smoking recourse

Editor,

In his Feb. 18 letter to the editor, Neil Payne asks those student senators who voted in favor of a resolution to ban smoking in the K-State Union to please explain their votes.

I voted in favor of the resolution because, in direct response to a question by me, it was pointed out that the ventilation system in the Union is so inefficient that smoke in any location in the Union cannot be efficiently vented outside. Smoking in any part of the Union simply adds to the general air pollution of the Union. The alternative is to spend $15,000 in ventilation improvements which apparently the Union intends not to do, nor did any senator suggest legislation which would increase student fees for such a system.

Consequently, it seemed to be in the best interests of most users of the Union to support making the Union smoking free; I supported the resolution.

If Payne can find a student senator who voted in the affirmative, and convince that senator to introduce a motion to reconsider, followed by a two-thirds vote in the affirmative by the student body, the issue could be debated again.

Phillip Anderson faculty representative to Student Senate

Care not taken

Editor,

Most journalists reserve their personal opinions for the editorial page, but the Collegian editors have allowed their anti-U.S. bias to flavor their headlines. The Thursday, Feb. 14 issue of the Collegian had a headline that screamed "Allies bomb shelter; 500 dead."

Why is it that Collegian editors accept everything emanating from Baghdad as gospel-truth and choose to take all information supplied by Allied briefers with a grain of salt?

If this Collegian headline had given our own country the benefit of the doubt, we would have read "Allies bomb command center; Iraq claims 500 dead." As it turned out, Iraq reduced its own death toll by several hundred within 24 hours of the attack.

If a student shot a professor on campus, the story would abound with the term "alleged." When it comes to the Persian Gulf War, however, no such care is taken.

Finney represents

Editor,

I know that I speak for women throughout Kansas, as well as across the United States, when I say that we are very pleased to have a female governor.

Gov. Joan Finney's election sends a clear message: women are as bright and capable as men and can serve in the same offices with as much success (if not more).

This message needs to be carried over into other areas, as well. Women currently have the right to make very personal decisions about their bodies and reproduction. Unfortunately, there are some legislators who would like to take these rights away from women. Apparently, most feel that women can not make decisions on their own. These legislators wish to restrict the availability of safe, legal abortions. Ultimately, they wish to restrict the availability of many types of birth control, as well.

I realize that Finney is a Catholic and that she has a strong tie to the beliefs of her faith. I respect her for having such a strong faith. I also respect her as a politician who was elected not to push for her own needs, but for the needs of the voters. I am a member of the majority of Kansans (and Americans, as well) who support freedom of choice regarding reproductive freedom. We are not pro-abortion, rather we feel that this choice should be left up to the individual and not the state or one church.

I would like to thank her for supporting and being a symbol of women everywhere. I would also like to thank her for not imposing her personal religious beliefs on the entire state. I know that this is a position, which is difficult for her to take, especially in light of her religion, but it is more important that she follow the dictates of the people. I thank Finney for putting the people first.

Collegian balanced

Editor,

After reading Margaret Schmidt's letter to the editor in the paper last week, I felt compelled to write this letter. I too believe Ed Skoog is a half-wit, and I probably wouldn't give Brad Seaborn the time of day. I do believe, however, that all people are entitled to their own opinions, and I am very proud to attend a university where they allow everyone's opinion to be heard and not censored.

Margaret, there are plenty of good things about the Collegian. Eric Becker's editorials keep getting better every week, and where would we be without our daily doses of Jim's Journal? Don't give up, yet. Just think, eventually Brad and Ed will grow up and move into the real world with the rest of us.

War deceives

Editor,

In the past weeks I have read letter after letter supporting the troops serving in the Middle East and many condemning the acts of the Coalition military forces in the region. The latest, and probably most misinformed, is the series of editorials on the bombing of the civilian/military bunker in Baghdad. I feel it is time someone spoke up in support of the U.S. military and the job they are doing.

There are many things that need to be addressed, but I will limit my comments to the issue of the bunker-bombing editorials. In the second editorial the point was made again and again that the Coalition's use of the term "total war" is an "oxymoron for a superpower." I take this comment to mean that the military is purposely targeting civilians for some unknown reason.

Let's take a look back to World War II and see what total war really is. In 1943, the German city of Hamburg was bombed by Allied bombers. These raids were strategic in nature and targeted the city as a whole, including civilians. In that city 300,000 homes were destroyed, 750,000 people were left homeless and 60,000 to 100,000 people were killed. In a later raid on Dresden, the city was virtually destroyed, and upwards of 60,000 people were killed. The raids were carried out by B-29 and B-17 bombers. A modern F-15 can carry more conventional explosives than a B-29. The payload of a B-52 is beyond comparison to that of a B-29.

My point here is that it is clear that we are not carrying out total war on the Iraqis. If we were, the city of Baghdad would be destroyed many times over with a thousand times the civilian casualties that have been suffered so far.

If one believes the U.S. military's claim that this bunker was a command and control center, then Saddam Hussein is to blame for using human shields. If one does not, then they must believe that it was a mistake. War is full of deception, and it is possible that we were deceived. We are not perfect.

KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN SPORTS

Coach Susan Yow expressed frustration with her team at a press conference Thursday afternoon in Bramlage Coliseum. After a 6-2 start in the Big Eight, the team has dropped four of its last five league games.

MIKE VENOS/FILE

Yow: Team's play of late not really all that surprising

TODD FERTIG
Sports Reporter

Coach Susan Yow summarized her feelings toward the Lady Cats' late season tailspin Thursday, saying "You reap what you sow. We've been on a collision course all season."

Following Wednesday's loss at Oklahoma State, the Lady Cats dropped to a third-place tie in the conference after holding a spot on top just three weeks ago.

Having seen her club surrender five of its last six games, Yow expressed disappointment in the team's attitude and desire at a press conference at Bramlage Coliseum. "Their attitude is bad," Yow said. "You can't win unless you have the attitude. I think that your attitude is your key to success."

"I'm just really disappointed. We were sitting really nice for first or second, and we just let it slip away. I'm not down, because I think we (the coaches) have done all that we can do. And I'm not down on this team, but now I think you have to just let it run its course. It's been a tough year for me."

Yow declined comment on what specific elements were disrupting the team, but said it had been addressed in a variety of ways — all to no avail.

"I really believe in people, and I enjoy the challenge of pulling people together," she said. "It's a challenge to a coach; it's what makes you tick. But when you can't get it done, it's very frustrating, very disheartening."

Yow said throughout the recent slide the team has possessed the attitude that it could pick up the intensity when the chips were down. That attitude will not carry the team far, however, Yow said.

"I think this team thinks when they want to turn it on they can turn it on," she said. "Well, you can't. You have to work at this. I never believe that you can be completely out of it or can't do it, but I personally don't think now it's a matter of talent or of knowing what to do. It's a matter of our team being united."

The team enters a game Saturday with Kansas that will play a large role in seeding positions for the Big Eight tournament. With the tournament drawing near and several seniors playing for the last time at home, Yow still doesn't think the team will find the motivation to overcome its slump.

She downplayed any chance of a surprise resurgence in the tournament.

"That'll never happen, or I don't know much about coaching. I just don't see how you can change your attitude," she said of the team's chances for winning the tourney in Salina.

"We will try (to use the tournament as a motivational tool). But I think it's escalated in the past couple of weeks. We thought all along that you could overcome it, but you just cannot. It's just a basic principle of life. You reap what you sow. I think they'll regret it in retrospect. Five years from now they'll regret it."

Yow inherited the team this season following a national search initiated in December 1989, upon the resignation of then-coach Matilda Mossman. With a talented group of seniors, the season looked bright. Without a deep bench and what Yow called an element of disharmony present throughout, the season has taken a bitter turn.

Yow suggested the team has lacked desire to work under her guidance. ■ See YOW, Page 7

Earlier column too harsh

To err is human, to forgive divine. This isn't a plea for forgiveness, but rather an attempt to help ease some of the pain caused by something that appeared on this page Monday morning.

And, yes, the guy who wrote that biting piece of opinion is the same one who's writing this one.

The column I wrote on the Lady Cats' recent woes has caused more of a stir than almost anything I've written during the entire time I've been here as an undergraduate or graduate student.

And probably rightfully so. With regard to much of what I put down on paper — and the manner in which I did it — I goofed.

The charges have been made, so now it's time for me to answer them. ■ The column was far too harsh on Gaye Griffin, the team's interim coach last season — guilty.

Griffin did an admirable job filling in when Matilda Mossman resigned. She was understandably popular with the players, and she was a good friend of mine — heck, we even played co-rec softball together.

And how am I to know how good a bench coach she was or is? I wasn't in the team huddles on the bench during timeouts late in the season. For all I know, she could have been brilliant down there.

Second-guessing coaches is pointless, as I've found out as a coach myself. Evidently, I forgot that as I was writing.

■ The claim that any player should or shouldn't be playing would be impossible for you to substantiate — guilty.

I've seen every home game this year, but I haven't made road trips, and, more importantly, I'm not at practice every day. I know from coaching that sometimes players can shine for a moment or so in games and be absolutely awful in practice day after day.

That's another thing that obviously just slipped by.

■ The talent level of this team relative to others in the league is something you really can't establish — guilty.

I have watched the Lady Cats probably more than any other reporter over the last four seasons. During that time, I've watched Diana Miller, Nadira Hazim and Kristie Bahner emerge as some of the best — if not the best — players in the league at their positions.

But I have not seen how they interact with others at practice, and what effect that might have in games. And, more importantly, I haven't watched the other Big Eight teams practice and play, other than when they've been in Manhattan.

And one look a year really isn't enough substance on which to base an informed opinion.

■ The piece was written from a fan's standpoint, not the standpoint of a seasoned, professional sports editor — guilty.

Lifting meet concludes

DAN WICKER
Sports Reporter

The third annual bench press intramural meet concluded Thursday evening at the Chester E. Peters Recreation Complex.

The competition included 21 men in five different divisions and four women in one division.

Evan Simpson successfully defended his crown as the best lifter. Simpson won the overall competition as well as the 191-and-above weight class. On his second lift, he set a meet record by lifting 500 pounds.

Two other performers also repeated as the champions of their weight class. In the 125-150 class, Chuck Allen took the title. In the women's division, Sandra Trentman repeated as champion.

Other winners included John Steenbock in the 151-160 division, Roland Destina in the 161-175 class and Matt Laurie in the 176-190 division.

Lady Cats to end regular season

TODD FERTIG
Sports Reporter

After battling for the driver's seat in the Big Eight Conference midway through the season, a second-half Lady Cat slide has cast Saturday's 7 p.m. contest with Kansas in Bramlage Coliseum into a different light.

With conference title hopes accompanying a 6-2 start, the Lady Cats have taken a swan dive in the standings, dropping four of their last five.

With a title no longer in reach, the Lady Cats suddenly find themselves desperately looking to the conference tournament for some incentive. Now, in a four-way tie for third, seeding advantages in the Big Eight tournament are on the line.

The Jayhawks moved into the four-way tie by winning their last three. A 73-72 win over Colorado in Lawrence on Wednesday gives the Jayhawks a chance to steal an upper-division seeding position from K-State, an opportunity that seemed out of reach a few weeks ago.

Following their last meeting with the Jayhawks, everything was looking up for the Lady Cats. The 74-73 overtime thriller at Lawrence moved the Lady Cats into a tie with the conference-leading Cowgirls.

Coach Susan Yow called the last meeting between the two a game like she'd never seen before. It looked as if an emotional victory on the road would add fuel to the fire, helping K-State gain momentum in the conference race. But instead, the squad dropped a game to cellar dweller Oklahoma to start the downhill slide.

Though the Lady Cats held on to win at Lawrence, Yow admitted she was just glad to be in the hunt during the contest. Her club was physically overmatched by the athletic Jayhawks, who had two opportunities to win the game, one at the buzzer in regulation and one in overtime.

Kansas' leading free throw shooter, Kay Hart, missed two from the line with her team trailing by one and four seconds showing on the clock in overtime.

Hart, however, was instrumental in the late-season surge for the Jayhawks and scored 18 to tie her season high in leading KU past Colorado. After leading the entire game, the Jayhawks fought to hold off a Colorado rally down the stretch. Hart hit four free-throws in the final 37 seconds to secure the victory for KU.

Lady Cats' tournament scenarios

The Lady Cat basketball team could wind up being seeded as high as third or as low as sixth in the Big Eight Tournament, depending on the outcome of this weekend's games. Here are the possible scenarios.

Lady Cats win: (8-6)

Assured of either third or fourth.

If Colorado beats OSU, the Lady Buffs would get the third seed in front of K-State because of their 2-0 record against the Lady Cats.

If Colorado loses, K-State would take third seed.

Lady Cats lose: (7-7)

Assured of either fifth or sixth.

If both Colorado and Iowa State win, K-State would be the sixth seed.

If Colorado loses and Iowa State wins, the Lady Cats would still be the sixth seed because of Colorado's 2-0 record against K-State.

If Colorado wins and Iowa State loses, the Lady Cats would get the fifth seed ahead of Iowa State because of their victory of league-champion OSU.

If both Colorado and Iowa State lose, K-State would be the fifth seed.

Current Big Eight Standings

1. Oklahoma State (11-2)
2. Nebraska (8-5)
3. Kansas (7-6)
4. Colorado (7-6)
5. Kansas State (7-6)
6. Iowa State (6-6)
7. Oklahoma (3-9)
8. Missouri (2-11)

Source: K-State Sports Information

GREGORY A. BRANSON/Collegian

In their previous meeting, the Jayhawks outbounded K-State 66-36. Center Marthea McCloud led the KU charge with 16 points and 13 rebounds. The advantages in rebounding and quickness the Jayhawks hold worry Yow.

"They probably have the most athletic team in the Big Eight," Yow said.

Wildcats, minus Howard, to face Nebraska

'Chances' key to team's year-end efforts

SCOTT PASKE
Sports Reporter

Before 1977, a K-State basketball team with a 12-12 record would have started talking about rebuilding and recruiting. Not an NCAA Tournament berth, anyway.

But where there's a postseason chance to qualify, there's a way. That's the logic the Wildcats will take to Bob Devaney Sports Center in Lincoln, Neb., Saturday when they face No. 14 Nebraska.

"It's frustrating that we've let some games slip away that we should have had," senior guard Steve Fritz said. "But we have an opportunity to make up for that."

That shot won't come until the Big Eight Tournament begins March 8, an event the 'Cats will likely enter as the bottom seed for the first time in the tourney's 14-year history.

Standing in the way are conference games with Nebraska, Missouri and Oklahoma. At 2-9 in league play, K-State's chance of crawling out of the cellar is limited.

Opportunities for soul-searching are not.

"We realize in order for us to do well in the tournament, we've got to solve some problems with our team," Fritz said. "We can look at these last three regular-season games as a chance to make the adjustments we need."

Getting well against the Cornhuskers is not as easy as in past years. Nebraska, picked eighth in many preseason league polls, has been one of the nation's surprise teams at 22-5.

K-State coach Dana Altman said Nebraska's 91-71 loss at Missouri on Wednesday, which knocked the 'Huskers into third place in the league, will make Saturday's game an even tougher test.

"The first thing that flashed in my mind is they're really going to be upset now," Altman said. "With Kansas losing ... it would have put them in a position to control their own destiny."

K-State's destiny may exist in other forms besides watching the NCAA Tournament on television or playing in it. The 'Cats' record gives them an outside chance at the National Invitational Tournament.

"We wouldn't turn down any postseason opportunities," Altman said. "But we realize we've got to scratch out a couple wins for that to even be a possibility."

Fritz said Wednesday's oddities of Iowa State's road win at Oklahoma, Colorado's win over No. 8 Kansas, and Missouri's rout of Nebraska gave K-State added incentive for the Big Eight Tournament.

"It could be wide open," Fritz said. "That's reassuring to us. If we play well, we feel we can beat some of those other teams."

Tip-off for Saturday's game at Lincoln is 3:05 p.m.

Altman questions suspensions, lack-there-of

SCOTT PASKE
Sports Reporter

K-State coach Dana Altman told reporters at his weekly press conference Thursday that there are inconsistencies in the interpretation of the NCAA's new rule regarding players involved in fights during basketball games.

When questioned about Wildcat forward Wylie Howard's ejection for punching Oklahoma State's Byron Houston in Tuesday's game at Bramlage Coliseum, Altman said the punishment — the ejection and a one-game suspension that Howard will serve Saturday at Nebraska — was correct.

He said, however, there were ruling discrepancies in Howard's incident and a scuffle 12 days ago when Arkansas forward Todd Day and UNLV's Larry Johnson scuffled in the second half of the Runnin' Rebels' 112-105 win.

Altman

Howard

In that fight, Day took two swings at Johnson before players separated the pair. Neither was ejected nor suspended.

The new rule states that the first time any squad member or bench personnel participates in a fight during the season, he will be suspended for the team's next game. If the player is involved in a second fight, the penalty is suspension for the remainder of the season.

"It's a good rule," Altman said. "I don't think fighting has a place in college basketball. It's a rule that applied in our case because Wylie did overextend the boundaries of sportsmanship."

"I'm not sure what the reasoning was for the (Day-Johnson) ruling, but it's not consistent. Consistency is something that coaches look for. Things are not always equitable, things are not always even."

Altman said he was uncertain whether the fact that Houston, Day and Johnson are highly-regarded players had any effect on the rulings in the two incidents.

"Officials are human. They read the papers, and they know who is playing well," Altman said. "Maybe those things play into it."

Howard, who was ejected late in the first half of Tuesday's game, said he regretted taking the swing at Houston.

"After everything settled down and I finally looked back on it, I realized how I hurt my team."

Fort Hays State, Friends to Frank Myers for twinbills

DAN WICKER
Sports Reporter

The K-State baseball squad will take a step back in competition this Saturday and Sunday after opening their season last weekend against No. 7 Arkansas.

Although the team will not be pitted against a Top 20 team, the early-season matchups remain important to help K-State lift its level of play.

"It is important in that we need to continue to improve our level of play," K-State Coach Mike Clark said. "We can work on things in practice, but games are good to see if they can improve in pressure situations. We have four tests this weekend. I hope we will be prepared to handle them."

The Wildcats will be faced with two double-headers this weekend.

Saturday, they will face Fort Hays State beginning at noon, and Friends will be in town on Sunday for a 1:00 p.m. twin-bill.

Clark is unsure of what to expect from the two schools and said he believes in focusing more on his players early in the season.

"I don't know a lot about them. At this point we are concerned more about our team than what the other team has," Clark said. "If we do our job, we'll be OK."

In previous matchups involving the teams playing this weekend at Frank Myers Field, K-State has dominated its two foes. They have won 10 in a row from Fort Hays dating back two 1986, and Friends has not captured a victory against K-State since 1912.

Clark said the team has worked on hitting in the past week. Against Arkansas he said he was pleased at times and not so pleased at other times. K-State got blanked in late innings by Arkansas's top relievers in the two losses.

"We've been working on hitting. Coach (Phil) Morgan has spent a lot of time on hitting, getting them some good cuts and having intrasquad games," Clark said. "On the defensive side of the ball, we played on astroturf, so we are trying to get them used to our field and the grass."

K-State is coming off of a tough series loss to nationally ranked Arkansas. The Wildcats took the first game 6-0 and dropped the next two by 3-2 scores.

"I feel real good about our performance, but there are a lot of areas we need to improve on," Clark said. "Each individual had two or three things we challenged them with to improve on. As a whole I am pleased, and I am looking forward to four games this weekend."

Kent Hipp will get the start in Saturday's first game and will be followed by Sean Pedersen in the second game. Dave Christensen and Chris Hmielewski will take the mound for the 'Cats in the double-header against Friends.

Clark was overjoyed with the performance of his pitching staff in Arkansas. The starters for this weekend are the same as in Fayetteville, plus Christensen.

"I was really happy. They threw strikes, competed hard and threw tough pitches in pressure situations. We did an excellent job pitching on the same level as theirs," Clark said. "It definitely put some pressure on some of the other pitchers on our staff."

Yow

dance, and the situation is not a new one.

"No matter how it got like this is not important. It's happened," Yow said. "It's happened to two coaches, so if you're thinking it's the coaches, I'd be rethinking."

"What's so hard in going out and working hard and playing the game that you love so much, working for someone who wants to believe in you? I never understood why that was so difficult."

The team loses four seniors following this season and will be forced to develop a new personality. Yow's frustration is causing her to look to the future despite the opportunities remaining in this season.

"I'm glad I'm here. I've got a lot of energy to get it turned around. I'm excited about what can take place here," she said. "But if I had known, I would never have applied for this position because of what has happened. I would never have touched it with a 10-foot pole."

Column

During the course of watching this team play for the past four years, I've become as attached to this unit as any other — except, maybe, for the Wildcat baseball team.

I so desperately wanted this team to win a Big Eight regular season title in the midst of all of last year's incredible turmoil that I was frustrated when it didn't happen.

And this season, the desire the players had to win the title was probably matched by those watching them — myself included.

But the frustration, the disappointment — it's all because so many of us feel for these players.

I wanted the Lady Cats to win the league for themselves. They deserved it after all they had been through. That's what was so frustrating.

Maybe that's what should have been expressed from the outset.

■ College athletes, and particularly this group of players — who have already been through so much — don't deserve this kind of criticism — guilty.

Very few will ever know just what these players went through emotionally last year. And most of us will never know what went on behind the scenes leading to these outcomes.

The only outcomes we see — and those we can write or talk about — are those that occur on the court.

But it is unfair to blast non-professionals who have likely given all the circumstances will allow them to give.

■ It's not right that anyone has a chance to express such feelings in a public forum — not guilty.

It is the right of the person whose picture appears above a work to express an opinion, and much of what I wrote Monday morning, I'm not alone in thinking.

And it's also the right of the same person to admit he's wrong about some things he's written, or to think better of some of them and attempt to make amends.

This is the type of lesson we all must learn at one point or another in our lives. I'm just sorry the lesson I learned affected so many people I care about.

That wasn't fair, and for that, I'm sorry.

I've talked to everyone I attacked since Monday morning, and I found some peace in doing so. But the players are the ones who deserve peace the most.

They've earned it.

Track teams to compete at Big 8 meet

JENIFER SCHEIBLER
Sports Reporter

This is the biggie.

The K-State men's and women's track squads hope to put their best foot forward at the Big Eight Indoor Championships Friday and Saturday in Columbia, Mo.

Coach John Capriotti indicated the importance of the meet.

"This is the meet we train for all season," he said. "We need to have our best performances this weekend."

A pre-meet poll was released in which conference coaches picked the Wildcat women to finish the meet second behind Nebraska, the current defending Big Eight Indoor Champions.

When asked about his team's chance to win the championship, Capriotti said the women are in the best position they've been in for two or three years but need to have a great meet to dethrone the Huskers.

"We are counting on everybody," he said. "It's going to take a total team effort to win the meet."

This is the first year the meet is not being held in Nebraska's facility, so the Huskers will not have the home advantage, Capriotti said.

The ladies enter the meet with several athletes having posted marks ranking them in the top three in 10 events within the conference this season.

All-American Angie Miller, who returns to defend her 1990 indoor title, has thrown the shot put 49-4 1/2 to lead the conference competition.

Freshman pentathlete Gwen Wentland also leads the field of Big Eight competitors with the highest point total, 3,441, recorded this season.

The women will be without three-time All-American Janet Haskin, who is sitting out the indoor season due to an injury.

On the men's side, Iowa State looks to be the solid favorite.

"Iowa State is one of the best Big Eight teams I've seen in a long time," Capriotti said. "They're loaded everywhere."

K-State, picked to finish third behind the Cyclones and Nebraska, will be in a close battle with Nebraska and Oklahoma for second place, Capriotti said.

The final result will depend on the Wildcats' current injury situation, he said.

"We'll need to be healthy to finish second or third," he said.

Three Wildcats currently hold or are tied for conference bests in the men's field.

David Warders holds the top spot in the mile with a time of 4:10.7. All-American Clifton Ethridge shares the mark for the triple jump at 51-4 1/2 with Iowa State's Desmond Hunt and high jumper R.D. Cogswell is tied with Nebraska's Tyson Smith with a leap of 7-0 1/2 for conference leading honors.

In addition to these top marks, the men have five athletes ranked in second and third positions in their respective events.

Although current injuries may plague the men's team, Capriotti said he's optimistic about the overall health of the athletes.

"We're going into the Big Eight meet and we're the healthiest we've been all year, he said."

Officer Adam Angst places a Manhattan resident, arrested for domestic battery, into his patrol car to be transported to jail.

Cruisin' Manhattan with Riley County Police Officer Adam Angst

The red lights circle hypnotically, and the siren wails a two-note melody. In the rearview mirror, the ominous blue patrol car looms from behind like the grim reaper.

The sight has quickened pulses and created sweaty brows on many college students. In fact, it has led to many misconceptions regarding the police, said Adam Angst, patrolman for the Riley County Police Department.

"There are no such thing as quotas," Angst said of the longstanding belief that policemen are required to issue a certain amount of tickets per month.

People still complain about quotas when they are given a ticket, he said. But Angst has developed a response to these accusations.

"I tell them, 'No sir, I've already met my quota. This one's just for fun,'" he said.

Just because there is no quota system doesn't mean Angst can go a month without giving a ticket, he said. If he did that, his superiors would question what he was doing during his 10-hour shift.

Police shows on television help distort perceptions of what a police officer does on his or her beat, he said. The shows tend to glamorize the violence. A cop show without gunfire is like a K-State basketball game without Willie the Wildcat.

"When do you ever see a policeman sit down and do paperwork?" Angst said. "When you see a policeman parked along a street, nine times out of 10, he's writing a report. Most people think we're running radar."

The paperwork mounts when an arrest is made, Angst said. On the average, an arrest report takes about a half hour to an hour to complete.

When Angst was called to provide back-up for a domestic disturbance at 8 p.m. Feb. 16, the process was set into motion.

Upon arriving at the scene, Angst was in charge of interviewing the male suspect while another officer obtained a statement from the woman who called in the complaint.

The man admitted to slapping his girlfriend and Angst arrested him for domestic battery. Throughout the questioning, Angst attempted to soothe the man so another violent outburst did not occur. He tried to treat him without any malevolence.

"I don't like what he did, but I have nothing personal against him," Angst said after spending 25 minutes going through the arrest procedures at the Riley County jail. "I'm not the judge or jury. I'm there to enter him into the criminal justice system."

Accidents are another source of paperwork, Angst said. These reports take about the same amount of time, but they don't have to be completed by 8 a.m. the next morning as arrest reports do. Again Feb. 16, Angst was called to Aggieville for a hit-and-run accident.

Witnesses told Angst a gray Thunderbird had been attempting to turn from 12th Street onto Moro Street. The driver veered to the right and slammed into two cars and then backed up and left the scene.

"This was an unusual hit and run," Angst said.

"In most hit and runs, nobody has seen anything, but in this one we have three witnesses who separately gave me the same license plate number."

The driver was found the next day and charged with leaving the scene of a property-damage accident — but not before leaving the police officer another 30 minutes of paperwork, Angst said.

He said most calls are not of the violent variety. About 80 percent of them are service calls dealing with such things as barking dogs and loud parties. The other 20 percent deal with burglary, theft and other criminal actions.

Several weeks ago, Angst said he was called to quiet a boisterous party located on the top floor of an apartment complex.

Angst said he noticed two men leaning out of a top-floor window, urinating into an open convertible directly below.

"I wasn't able to catch them because there were too many people," Angst said. "I felt sorry for the owners of the convertible."

Angst keeps in shape so he will be ready for a foot chase such as the one that followed a questioning at 12:30 a.m. Feb. 16.

In the Hardee's parking lot, Angst questioned a man about a long, slender metal pipe the man had just thrown in the back of a van. As Angst was going to his patrol car to talk on the radio, the man bolted toward the Manhattan City Park.

Angst found the man after he had been picked up in a friend's car. He chased the car to the corner of 11th Street and Bluemont Ave., where the driver let the man out.

Angst chased the man for a half a block before catching him behind a residential house.

"I've only been outrun by one or two people," said Angst, who runs four to five miles a day. "It's the kind of stuff that's typical of a Friday or Saturday night."

By the time Angst had rounded up the suspect, who had actually been a victim of a battery that night, it was nearly 1 a.m. and the end of his shift.

"Now I'll go home and watch 'Cops,'" Angst said. "Maybe I'll see what cops really do in the big cities."

Student begins embryo business

K-State entrepreneur performs embryo transfers, trains farmers, sells supplies

SHANNAN SEELY
Agriculture Reporter

Helping expand the cattle embryo transfer industry has become a focus for a K-State graduate student.

John Lynn Curtis, graduate student in alfalfa forage research and nutrition, is president of Agtech, a business started in Manhattan for this purpose.

Embryo transfer involves administering a drug that allows a superior cow to produce more than one egg, like a sow, said Jeff Stevenson, associate professor in animal sciences and industry.

About six to eight days after fertilization, the eggs are flushed from the cow. Then, viable embryos are non-surgically transferred into recipient cows.

These surrogate mothers are in the same stage of estrus as the donor cow. Heat synchronization and proper procedures result in successful pregnancies.

Curtis performs embryo transfers for farmers and ranchers, trains farmers and veterinarians to do embryo transfers and sells embryo transfer supplies.

Recently, he set up a booth in the trade show at the National Western Livestock Show in Denver, Colo. In two weeks, about 100 cattle producers signed up for the training program.

Farmers provide the cows for on-farm training. Other producers in the area pay $600 to attend the workshop.

"A whole lot of small steps all done correctly is what it (embryo transfer) comes to," Curtis said. "Attention to detail is important."

He is working on making Agtech a main distributor to Central and South America.

"We want the technology to be more accessible," he said.

Curtis said he is aware of state and federal regulations involved in opening Agtech.

According to state law, only licensed veterinarians may perform embryo transfers for hire.

Curtis said he is exempt because he provides training to farmers and veterinarians.

In a statement to Earl Gatz, secretary of the Board of Veterinary Examiners, State Attorney General Robert Stephan said, "A non-licensed person may, in effect, practice veterinary medicine if the person is performing acts which are accepted livestock management practices."

Farmers are only eligible to perform embryo transfer on their own livestock.

To sell prescription drugs to a farmer, Curtis must have a written statement of approval from the farmer's veterinarian.

"Our smallest margin is pharmaceuticals," Curtis said. "Only eight of about 150 are prescription drugs."

Some veterinarians want to legislate who can perform embryo transfers to keep embryo transfer income in their pockets, he said.

Gatz said the law about veterinarian practices is a complicated gray area. Some veterinarians feel they are the only ones qualified to perform embryo transfers.

"It has been controversy for the last 10 years," he said.

Curtis said embryo transfer allows the owner of a high-milking cow to make a lot of money.

Debate

Last year's national champion, University of California at Los Angeles, will be there, Stanfield said.

The topic of debate this semester concerns police power of law enforcement agencies.

"Each team has the same topic, but people debate it differently," Stanfield said.

Molden said the team has been researching for at least 20 hours a week at Farrell Library and the libraries at KU and Washburn University.

He said they have a good shot at winning this weekend.

"One advantage we have over other teams is that we have depth."

Stanfield said the K-State team is more successful than most because they work hard, are very talented and spend a lot of time researching and putting together arguments.

Stanfield said she is hopeful about the national tournament, which will be March 29, 30, 31 and April 1, at Belingham, Wash.

'This is Spinal Tap' classic parody, bible for heavy metal rock bands

ERIC MELIN
Collegian Reviewer

The film that has practically become a bible for heavy metal bands across the country can now enrich your life as it has mine.

"This is Spinal Tap," a movie about the world's most unlucky fictional band. The movie plays at midnight tonight and Saturday in Forum Hall.

"I think the fact that there was a Stonehenge monument onstage that was in danger of being crushed by a dwarf tended to underestimate the hugeness of the object," said David St. Hubbins, guitarist/singer for Spinal Tap, after a typically disastrous concert.

You see, I am one of those lonely people who has memorized every line to this hilarious parody.

When I first saw "This is Spinal Tap," I was 13-years-old. Just to give you a little background on myself, my favorite bands at the time were Twisted Sister and Quiet Riot. For my art project, I painted a cardboard cutout of KISS' "Hotter Than Hell" album cover.

My family was at the grocery store one night, and we were looking for a movie to take home and watch on our brand new Beta VCR (My dad was really up on technology.)

I asked if we could get "This is Spinal Tap." I had seen the video for "Hell Hole" on MTV and thought they looked like a cool band.

Needless to say, Dad wasn't too thrilled with my selection, so we compromised. He would let me stay up late and watch "Spinal Tap" after he watched the movie he rented — "Missing in Action."

Spinal Tap was soooooo cool! They had a big skull onstage behind them and smoke filled the air around them. They wore tight spandex pants and sang songs about girls with big bottoms.

The movie was very close to reality. So close I couldn't tell the difference between Spinal Tap and my favorite bands. They wrote songs that were political, like "Working on a Sex Farm." And in "Stonehenge," they sang about "a race of people who lived thousands of years before the dawn of history," just like Dio.

I kept feeling sorry for the band throughout the film. I thought they should have gotten top billing over the puppet show at the "Funland Amusement Park." Then the guitarist quit, and they had to perform a "free-form jazz exploration" because they couldn't fake all his guitar parts. I was crushed. But it had a happy ending, so I was satisfied. Then my bubble was suddenly and rudely burst. At the conclusion of the credits, some words appeared on the screen: "If you thought Spinal Tap was a real band, THEY'RE NOT!" I had been fooled!

They continued, "and there's no Easter bunny, either!" I felt cheated. In a matter of an hour and a half I had gained a favorite band, only to have my hopes dashed to the ground.

Years later, I rented "Spinal Tap" again. This time, I found myself laughing consistently at the subtle, yet clever jabs it took at the bands I had loved so dearly. The reason it looked so real, I found out later, is that over half the movie was improvised on camera.

Now is your chance to see what I consider the funniest film ever made. You'll be able to recognize me. I'll be the one telling my friends, "Sssh! This is the good part," every five seconds.

Conference promotes community service

RYAN HAYTER
Collegian Reporter

Events replicating real-life community problems stressed teamwork and involvement of all ages at the first We Can Do It! Youth and Community Together conference in Manhattan Wednesday and Thursday.

All corners of the state were represented with 80 students and 60 adults from 25 Kansas communities in attendance.

A variety of people from sixth graders to community college students and adults brought their individual talents and energies together to develop ideas to improve their hometowns.

In an opening address, Mark Hager with the Community Service Program at K-State, said youth and adults need to take action.

"Adults need to realize what insights youth can put into a community and give them opportunities," he said. "It only takes one adult to tear down any initiative."

Keynote speaker Hank Walter, a nationally recognized advocate of youth volunteerism and community service, said, "When young America gets involved, America always gets better."

He challenged participants to set the example of working hard, doing well and having fun.

"The interest is out there," Walter said. "Youth want to know how to get involved."

Bryndon Meinhardt, senior at Wamego High School, and Michelle Munson, senior at Chapman High School, helped organize the event and were excited about the strong and positive interest the participants took in learning how to develop community programs.

Small group discussions featuring students who had worked with leadership programs, entrepreneurship initiatives and community service programs in their own Kansas communities gave participants models to fashion their own programs after.

"Models went very well. Kids enjoyed hearing real-life examples of all this idealistic stuff we've talked about," said Munson.

"It made it easier for them to relate to the concepts of getting involved," she said.

Meinhardt, who helped develop the Wamego Junior Community Council, said the model city discussions gave people ideas to take back with them.

"A lot of good ideas were brought up, and people learned that the ideas were reasonable," he said.

Meinhardt complimented the caliber of students who came to the event.

"These are the kids that want to be here," he said. "They want to learn about their communities and how to improve them."

Small groups worked to create slogans, banners and build tinker-toy structures in different events, stressing cooperation and team work.

The end result of the conference was representatives developing a plan for youth involvement to implement in their own communities.

Scholarship options discussed

Golden Key National Honor Society sponsored an informational meeting Thursday concerning scholarships available to students desiring to go on for master's or doctoral degrees.

Among those in attendance could be the next recipients of a Rhodes, Fulbright, Lehman, Phi Kappa Phi, Rotary Foundation, National Science Foundation, Mellon or Marshall award.

Students with a grade point average of 3.5 or above were contacted by mail to attend this meeting.

"About a thousand letters were sent. That's a lot more than in the past, but we still had about the same turnout as in the past," said Eric Grey, junior in biology and pre-medicine, treasurer of Golden Key and event coordinator. "I counted about 185 in attendance — that's a pretty typical number."

Nancy Twiss, academic adviser and special assistant to the provost for scholarships, acted as moderator for the meeting. She informed students the object of the meeting was to familiarize students with the special scholarships available to them. Students were briefed on application processes, requirements and any other pertinent information related to the scholarships.

"This meeting has been held for several years. I think Golden Key performs a wonderful service to the University for giving the opportunity for students to find out about scholarships and opportunities after graduation," Twiss said.

"Golden Key is an honor society that honors all disciplines," said Wilford Nelson, associate director of the Center for Student and Professional Services and faculty adviser for Golden Key.

"It consists of juniors and seniors and is strictly student-run. It provides a lot of leadership opportunity," Nelson said.

Technical crews assist production

Costumes, lighting important to plays

JODELL LAMER
Collegian Reporter

Technical crews are involved with every aspect of a show's planning and design including: sets, props, lighting, costuming, sound and production.

One problem crews face is dealing with different-sized stages.

Nichols Theatre was built because it costs more to do a production in McCain Auditorium due to the larger size, said Mary Ann Lewis, faculty designer in theater.

Lewis paints sets for shows in both McCain and Nichols. She said the larger size at McCain requires her to be more exaggerated in painting than at Nichols.

Sets for shows are built at a scene shop located in McCain. They have to be built in pieces small enough to be moved onto the stage at McCain or transported by truck to Nichols.

Lewis said Nichols is a more prop-oriented facility than McCain because the audience is much closer to the stage in Nichols.

"We have a little more forgiveness in McCain because of the distance that we have," Lewis said. "In Nichols you have to be more specific in what you select."

She said the unfortunate thing about props at K-State is that there is no shop.

"Props have always been a problem at K-State," she said. "It is a very weak area."

Some good changes have been made lately due to the work of Dana Pinkston, a graduate student who has been serving as a props supervisor, Lewis said.

Props also play a major role in productions taking place in the Purple Masque Theatre. The theatre presents a special problem because of its size and also because it is an open stage that does not use a curtain.

Michelle White, freshman in business working as props director for "Betrayal," said the props crew practices the prop changes, which take place in between the scenes.

In "Betrayal" all prop changes are done completely in the dark. The crew members wear black to hide their movements.

The head crew member has to read and analyze the script of the play to decide what suggestions on lighting and sound changes to give the director.

Sarah Feldman, sophomore in theater, said she spent 30-40 hours preparing the lights for "Betrayal."

Feldman is in charge of the play's lighting. She said the lighting sets the play's mood.

Costumes are also important in setting the mood and time frame of a play.

Michele Bielser, junior in theater and employee of K-State's costume shop, said she does research when doing costumes for a show.

"Then I talk to the director to see what he or she wants," she said. "We have loads of costumes to choose from."

Technical positions are open to students in any major. Credit for drama participation is available to theater majors.

Early auditions help actors

DARLA GOODMAN
Collegian Reporter

The audition process for K-State Players' productions help student actors manage schedules through the semester.

Auditions for all semester productions take place the first two days of class each semester for two reasons, said K-State Players adviser Kate Anderson, associate professor in theater.

Anderson said the process allows roles to be distributed more equitably between students, giving different people a chance rather than the same people appearing in all performances.

Students also benefit from the opportunity to plan their semester from the beginning instead of finding out mid-semester they need to juggle large amounts of time, Anderson said.

"It really makes it easier for non-majors to audition," said Amy Strathman, junior in radio and television.

She said the practice allows students to know when auditions are automatically, rather than having to watch for announcements. If auditions were held for each show individually throughout the semester, students in the major might have an advantage.

Camille Diamond, junior in theater, said this method is the most efficient one for auditioning.

"I think it's really good for this University because a lot of our people come from outside the major," she said.

Time is an important part in the commitment of taking a role in a production, Anderson said. Rehearsals for most performances run for six weeks, although musicals or pieces with classical language may rehearse for seven or eight weeks.

Rehearsals take place five nights a week from 7-10 p.m., Anderson said.

"We try to make that an important part of the audition process, to make it very clear so that people understand the time commitment," Anderson said.

The commitment is important so people don't change their minds after the show is cast.

"You cast a show in terms of balance and combinations," she said. "You want people to say that if they get a part, they'll take it. You want that commitment."

James Smith, senior in theater, said it is easier for theater majors to work around the busy schedule of a production because the work deals with their majors.

"I've gotten down to the point where my whole day is on a schedule," said Smith, who has had roles in "Amadeus," "Medea" and is now working on "A Midsummer Night's Dream."

The time commitment necessary for a production varies from play to play and according to the role, said Chris Turner, senior in horticulture.

Turner, who has had roles in "Good" and "Pump Boys and Dinettes," said one of his classes suffered during preparation for a show, but does not feel that is really a drawback to productions.

"For the most part I don't think it's too much of a problem if you have teachers who will work it out with you," he said.

Turner said the benefits of being in the plays outweigh any drawbacks. "It's kind of addictive," he said.

Turner said being involved with the productions has helped him be more outgoing and spontaneous.

"When I'm the most busy, that is when I feel the best," he said.

The actual process of auditioning involves two nights of open auditions where people are usually paired up and move from room to room to read scenes for directors of scheduled productions.

Anderson said the auditions are cold and require no prepared pieces, so the process is fair to both majors and non-majors. Reading copies of the plays are available for check-out so people can become familiar with the piece. She said auditioners for musicals can do a prepared piece, but a musician will help you work something up at the audition. The same applies to the choreography of a dance number.

During auditions, majors try to make non-majors feel welcome because non-majors can feel intimidated by not knowing directors and department members.

"That's always sort of a scary thing, and we try to make people as comfortable as possible. And it gets easier," Anderson said.

Turner said he was uncomfortable at auditions at first.

"I didn't know what the director wanted. But those things never go away. It's a very competitive group," he said.

Women's rights legislation proposed

By the Associated Press

WASHINGTON — Senate Minority Leader Bob Dole, R-Kan., led a group of Republican legislators in proposing legislation to combat job discrimination, sexual harassment and violent crimes against women.

Dole said at a news conference that the legislative package was to help women win the fight against intimidation and discrimination.

Key provisions of the legislation, called the Women's Equal Opportunity Employment Act, would toughen penalties for some sex crimes; establish a fine up to $100,000 for first offenses of sexual harassment in the workplace; require expedited AIDS testing of people charged with a federal sex crime; permit increased federal aid for rape prevention and family violence programs; and establish a commission to study ways to eliminate barriers that keep women and minorities from the top ranks of corporate management.

Sponsors of the legislation said the current law was inadequate in protecting women's rights in the workplace. For example, Dole complained that current law permits a victim of sexual harassment in many cases only to recover back pay and court-ordered relief to halt the practice.

Rep. Susan Molinari, R-N.Y., is the chief House sponsor of the measure.

You're invited to a party you'll never forget...Neil Simon's newest hit play, Rumors. Join Peter Marshall, five-time Emmy Award winner for "Hollywood Squares," as a guest at an elegant anniversary party. Your host is in his bedroom with a bullet hole in his earlobe and the hostess is nowhere to be found. With Mr. Simon at the helm, the results are bound to be hilarious. In fact, the New Yorker calls it "Neil Simon's funniest!"

It's no rumor that student tickets cost only half what the public pays; it's the gospel truth!

Student/Children: $10, 9, 7
General Public: $20, 18, 14
Senior Citizens: $18, 16, 12

Presentation of Rumors is made possible in part with support from Manhattan Federal Savings and Loan Association, Steel and Pipe Supply Company, the Friends of McCain, and the Fine Arts Fee.

McCain Auditorium, Kansas State University

For best available seats, call 532-6428 and charge your tickets by phone or come to the McCain box office, noon to 5 p.m. weekdays. Box office opens at 3 p.m. day of performance. Tickets also available (with service charge) at Bramlage Coliseum, K-State Union Bookstore, Manhattan Town Center customer service desk, and ITR (Fort Riley).

Colorado's Favorite

We're Colorado's Favorite Ski Resort for lots of reasons. Like more snow. Year in and year out, we average more than any other major Colorado ski area; almost 31 feet per year. That snow means consistently great skiing on our three interconnected mountains. We have the variety to excite any level of skier, from the gentle, well-mannered slopes of Vazquez Ridge to the awesome chutes and bumps of Mary Jane. We keep things moving with 19 lifts, including three quad SuperChairs. The new Zephyr Express will zip you from the bottom to the top of Winter Park in just 7 minutes. Families love our expansive Children's Center, and everyone agrees that we may just be the friendliest ski area in Colorado. For a great value on a Colorado ski vacation you'll never forget. Come Play at the Park!

Students present biology research

ULRIKE DAUER
Collegian Reporter

The Division of Biology has its 17th Annual Forum for Student Research at 8 a.m. Saturday in the K-State Union Big Eight Room.

Twenty-two undergraduate and graduate students of biology, mostly of master's and doctoral programs, will present their ultimate research.

The presentations will cover a broad span of topics from membrane reconstitution to nuclear localization of virus protein.

The forum is an opportunity for students and faculty to get an update on what's going on, said Terry Johnson, director of the Division of Biology.

"It's an opportunity for students to present their research — sometimes for the first time," Johnson said.

He said it gives experience to students in a formal meeting, which helps them for further presentations at national meetings.

Jim Guikema, associate professor of biology, co-chair of the biology graduate affairs committee and organizer of the meeting, said the forum is important because it lets the students show to faculty and their fellow students what they have been doing in their research.

The forum also provides the opportunity to learn what other parts of the biology division do, Johnson said. The biology division has over 200 researchers.

"These ceremonies, which bring us together once a year, are a bonding for the mechanism of the division," he said. "It's a big party to share all the kinds of science."

The division was formed 20 years ago as an experiment to determine if bringing together diverse interests would evolve interesting relationships, Johnson said.

"It was a successful experiment," he said. Only a few days ago he learned the division, which also is a NASA Center for Commercial Development of Space, was selected for a $100,000 grant by NASA.

Johnson said he appreciates the competition between scientists with the major institutions across nation.

"You will marvel how sophisticated and well-prepared the students are," he said.

Johnson said about 100 undergraduate students who have participated in the research will attend the forum. Faculty and students from other regents universities will also attend.

It will be the first forum dedicated to a former student in 10 years, Guikema said.

Johnson said he hopes some members of the administration will take the opportunity to see what the division is all about.

The forum is dedicated to the memory of Kenneth Bassett, a former student in the biology division, who died about a month ago. Bassett graduated from K-State in 1986, with a master's degree.

The students asked for the dedication because Bassett still has many friends in the department, Guikema said.

Blood donations below goal

842 more units of blood needed to reach Red Cross quota

MARLA ROCKHOLD
Collegian Reporter

The amount of blood donated for the KSU Bloodmobile is down again this semester.

Thursday, Cindy Burke, director of health education at Lafene Health Center, said it looked as if the goal of 1,400 units of blood would not be met.

The goal for each day is 350 units, and the bloodmobile collected 284 units Tuesday and 274 Wednesday.

Burke said she was hopeful more units would be collected toward the end of the week.

"Thursday and Friday are the biggest days," Burke said.

"I think a lot of it (the reason the numbers are low) has to do with the plasma center," she said. "Ever since it opened, the number of volunteers has dropped."

"People don't realize where that blood (from the plasma center) is going," Burke said. "It is sold to pharmaceutical companies and only helps people in a roundabout way. The blood donated to the Red Cross can directly help save lives."

Christine Pottorf, senior in electrical engineering, donated her blood.

"I had a lot of friends tell me you feel good because it helps other people," Pottorf said. "When I finally did (donate blood), I did feel good."

Bruce Ramundo, research assistant in plant pathology, was another volunteer. He has donated blood 22 times. "It is needed and is something I can do," he said. "It is not a big deal."

This was the second time Sean McBride, junior in public administration, donated blood. He said he started donating when he realized how important it was to volunteer after a family member needed blood. The bloodmobile receives donations from many first-time volunteers. There were 56 volunteers Tuesday and 57 Wednesday.

Burke said many people donate the first time because of pressure from friends and family.

Sandy Setzkorn, senior in pre-physical therapy, was a first-time donor.

"I wanted to do something to help people out," Setzkorn said. "I was a little nervous, but it wasn't as bad as I thought."

With more than 20,000 possible donors, including students, faculty and Manhattan residents, Burke said she does not understand why more blood is not collected.

"I guess some people are just scared," she said.

Blood donors wait about one hour in line at Union, but agree Red Cross donation process is painless, fun

Blood donors spend about one hour at the blood drive at the K-State Union, but many agree the process is painless.

Donors fill out a blood donation record form that requires address, social security number, birth date and basic health information.

Several students joked while waiting to fill out the donation record. "They'd better use a clean needle or I'll be upset," said Eric Rasmussen, sophomore in mechanical engineering. Rasmussen was a first-time donor.

"I'm not nervous," he said. "Not really. I'm sure I'll still be alive tomorrow."

"Is this the food stamp line?" asked Jeff Geist, freshman in civil engineering and another first-time donor.

After filling out the initial portion of the record, donors proceed to a station where a volunteer checks temperature and blood pressure.

"We just check their vital signs to make sure there isn't anything drastically wrong," said Debbie Boller, certified nursing assistant at Saint Mary Hospital and blood drive volunteer.

After vital signs, the rest of the blood donation record is completed at another table. The remaining questions concern drug use, sexual history and exposure to AIDS or hepatitis.

Next is an ear prick to test for iron content to make sure the donor is not anemic.

"The ear prick didn't hurt," Geist said. "It hurt more when she squeezed my ear to get a drop of blood."

After the ear prick, donors are met at the doorway by a volunteer who escorts them to an available lounge chair where the blood is drawn by a nurse. Volunteers and nurses circle throughout the room to check the condition of donors.

"We talk to the donors constantly to make them relax," a volunteer said. "Some of them are pretty nervous, but very few of them actually have problems."

The actual donation process takes about 15 minutes.

After giving blood, donors are encouraged to sit down and drink orange juice or coffee and eat doughnuts for another 15 minutes. This rest period allows nurses to make sure no one feels faint or ill.

Erin Rhoades, sophomore in microbiology, got dizzy after donating blood.

"I didn't know we weren't supposed to eat right before we gave blood. I almost fainted, but they laid me back down, and I was fine," Rhoades said.

But most donors had no problems with donating blood.

"It was virtually painless," Geist said. "You hear a lot of horror stories about huge needles and all, but it's not that bad."

Other first-time donors agreed. "The anticipation was the worst part," said Bev Meitler, freshman in math.

"The only pain was when they stuck the needle in," Rasmussen said. "It stung for a split second. When they took it out it stung, too. Kinda like hitting your funny bone. But it wasn't really bad."

Big Brothers/Big Sisters will be trying to strike it rich this weekend.

The Manhattan chapter of Big Brothers/Big Sisters will be the host of the 1991 Bowling Classic, Feb. 23 and 24. The event will have two locations. It will start at Wildcat Lanes from 1 to 5:30 p.m. on Saturday and conclude Sunday in the K-State Union Lanes from noon to 5 p.m.

Participants in the Bowling Classic get as many people as they can to sponsor them. The minimum pledge is 7 cents per pin, or the sponsor can make a flat pledge of $7.

Gwyn Crumplar, executive director for Big Brothers/Big Sisters, said Big Brothers/Big Sisters serves children age 6-17 who live in families without the support and involvement of two parents. The program provides mature volunteers who give guidance, companionship and role modeling to young persons.

Money from the annual Bowling Classic allows Big Brothers/Big Sisters to recruit, screen and match volunteers to local children, she said.

Crumplar said she is very positive about the Bowling Classic.

"Last year we (had a) collected gross around $25,000," she said.

Crumplar said their original goal for this year was $25,000, but because of the recession, the goal has been considerably lowered.

Bryan Johnson, junior in marketing and hotel restaurant management and president of K-State Friends of Big Brothers/Big Sisters, said it is harder to get support from K-State students, because they don't have the money to pledge.

"I know the support has been greater in the past, but we are trying to get the word out to as many people as possible," Johnson said.

Allied troops approach Kuwait City

General reports light casualties, 5,500 Iraqi POWs

By the Associated Press

DHAHRAN, Saudi Arabia — American and allied troops stormed Kuwait by land, sea and air early Sunday and wrested pieces of the emirate from Iraqi forces. By day's end, U.S. paratroopers were reported holding outer edges of Kuwait City.

The Desert Storm offensive, striking along a 300-mile front, also swept up into southern Iraq in the largest American-led invasion since World War II.

Allied Commander Gen. H. Norman Schwarzkopf said allied casualties were remarkably light, and 5,500 Iraqi prisoners were taken by late afternoon. He gave no figures for U.S. dead and wounded.

Led by hundreds of tanks, troops from 11 nations raced across the desert battlefield, at times under pounding rain. Aircraft screamed in low, attacking through black smoke from 200 oilfield fires.

"They're fighting; they're resisting," said a Marine colonel. But Schwarzkopf hailed the first day as a dramatic success. No information was available on Iraqi casualties.

One column of Saudi and Kuwaiti troops punched 20 miles into Kuwait, but a U.S. military source cautioned the campaign could take several days of heavy fighting.

Hours after the invasion began at about 4 a.m. Sunday (7 p.m. CST Saturday), Saddam Hussein went on official Iraqi radio to urge his troops on.

"Fight them and show no mercy," the Iraqi president said.

Iraqi military communiques later asserted the offensive has so far failed and claimed to have wiped out paratroopers who dropped behind Iraqi lines in western Kuwait.

The long-expected ground assault came just eight hours after a deadline set by the Desert Storm allies for Iraq to begin a pullout from Kuwait.

The Iraqis dismissed that ultimatum as "shameful." The Bush administration, at the same time, rejected a Soviet-sponsored plan for a slower-paced withdrawal.

An air umbrella of fighter-bombers and helicopter gunships fanned out over the smoke-shrouded battlefield Sunday as battalion after battalion of Marines and British tankers, French legionnaires and U.S. Army cavalrymen, Saudi, Egyptian and other Arab troops rolled across the border in a multi-pronged attack that stretched from the Persian Gulf coast far west to the vast plains of the desert.

Offshore, the battleships USS Wisconsin and USS Missouri opened fire on Iraqi coastal positions.

"I can't fathom the size of this operation," said Lt. Col. Randy Bigum, an Air Force F-15C pilot back from a mission over the desert. "I can't grasp it. It's enormous."

Reports on battle action were sketchy — because the Desert Storm command was issuing only limited information — and dispatches from reporters in news pools at the front were slow in reaching rear areas.

On Saturday, the U.S. command had added a further note of urgency to the campaign to free Kuwait City, reporting that Kuwaitis were being summarily executed in the streets by Iraqi forces.

Alliance sources said Sunday that Iraqi troops, previously reported to have set dozens of oil-well fires, were now blowing up key buildings in the city, including the Parliament.

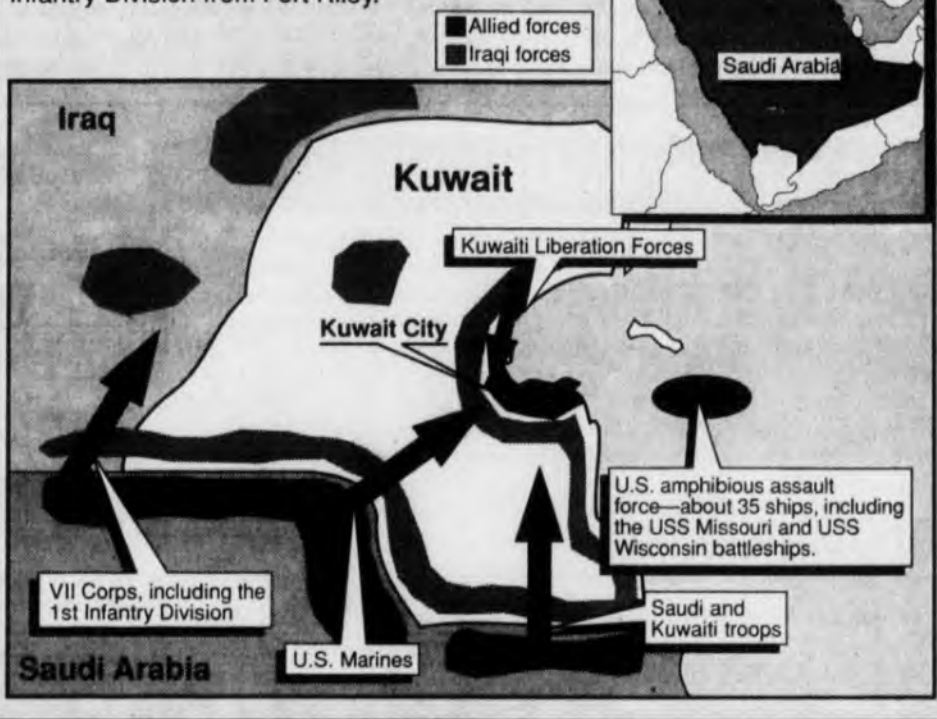

The U.S. Marines' 1st and 2nd Divisions, pushing up from Saudi Arabia's northeastern corner, first met only sporadic resistance, Gray reported. The 2nd Marines took only two hours to advance through the first sand wall and minefields, behind special mine-clearing equipment. 2nd Marine spokesman Lt. Col. Jan Huly said they later reached the capital.

Huly said three Marine tanks were damaged or destroyed. One Marine AV-8B Harrier jet crashed and the pilot was missing, the Marines reported. Huly said the front-line Iraqi division the 2nd Marines faced as they broke through the defensive barriers doesn't exist anymore.

The 2nd Marine Division said it suffered one dead and eight wounded and took at least 1,500 Iraqis prisoner. Farther west, the 1st Marine Division reported two Marines killed, nine wounded and more than 3,200 Iraqis captured.

Allies launch ground attack

Feb. 23, U.S. and allied military forces launched the largest ground offensive since World War II. The United States has more than 500,000 men and women stationed in the area, including the 1st Infantry Division from Fort Riley.

Aggieville calm during gulf invasion

Students, Manhattan residents express concern for soldiers in Middle East

PAUL NOEL
Staff Reporter
and SAMANTHA FARR
News Editor

Most of Aggieville remained calm as news of the coalition's ground offensive invasion was released Saturday night.

Few people wanted to express their views and opinions.

Management at Espresso Royale Cafe declined comment on the situation in the gulf and said they refused to allow employees to comment, because they feared their opinions would be mistaken for the opinion of the establishment as a whole.

A customer in Amigos, who said she sent letters to various Marines at the beginning of the crisis, expressed concern for the soldiers.

"It's the beginning of the end," said Elvira Piero, Manhattan. "I'm scared. With someone like Saddam Hussein, you don't know what's going to happen."

Piero said everything happening now in the Middle East is explained in chapters 13 and 14 of the book of Isaiah.

"Chapter 13 talks about the desolation of Babylon — Kuwait is a part of Babylon," she said. "There's a part in the Bible that says they (the soldiers) cannot see the sun — the smoke from the burning oil has already shaded the sun."

David Norvell, San Diego, Calif., answered one of Piero's letters, and they have been pen-pals ever since.

"Every time I hear of someone getting killed, I worry that it's David," she said. "I feel there is going to be a surprise ending. Something has to happen — it can't be that smooth."

Fort Riley soldiers at the Spot Saturday night said they were ready to help free Kuwait.

"There's only about 5 percent of the people left at Fort Riley, and they're ready to go," said Sgt. Ruben Hood.

Sgt. Robert Greger said he thinks the media are overstepping their boundaries in war coverage.

"All those reporters think they're all high and mighty," Greger said. "Bush is the commander in chief, and he doesn't have to answer to anybody (about his policy)."

Hood said he didn't think Saddam would remain in power after the war is over.

"Saddam is a madman," he said. "Why would anyone want to have someone like him as a neighbor?"

Sgt. Robert Hazel said he felt there was no other choice but to send in the ground troops.

"Saddam has been given so many chances to pull out of Kuwait," Hazel said. "There's no other choice but to go in."

Although many residence halls were quiet and almost empty Saturday night, students in a TV room in West Hall watched as President Bush informed the nation of the decision to initiate a ground war.

Leann Reid, freshman in psychology, said she understands and agrees with what Bush decided to do.

"I know that something had to be done," Reid said. "And I don't see how the Soviets' plea for more time would have helped."

"The Soviet peace plan was way too late. If it was going to have an impact, they should have done it a long time ago. I didn't expect (Saddam) would totally comply with the U.S. deadline."

Reid said she listened to the radio Saturday morning for news about the war.

"I kept hoping that something miraculous would happen, as most people were, I think," she said. "I turned on the radio at 11 this morning because I knew of the deadline. I didn't know what to think. I was just kind of numb for awhile."

Big Red 1 leads 'enormous' infantry assault

By the Associated Press

ON THE SAUDI BORDER — A part of the 1st Infantry Division moved several miles north of the Saudi border Sunday morning and prepared to blast a gap in Iraqi lines.

The division was assigned the job of breaching enemy lines and opening the way for a massive armored assault by the VII Corps, which could be the decisive campaign in the Persian Gulf War.

sian Gulf War.

"This is an enormous armored force," Lt. Col. Lon Maggart of Raleigh, N.C., who commands the 1st Brigade, 1st Infantry. "I don't think even in World War II you had this amount of armor in this small of a place."

Division Commander Maj. Gen. Thomas Rhame said, "As far as my reading of military history, I can't recall a massing of this much fire power in an area this size."

The battle plan called for a large portion of the 1st Division to move forward to a line north of the border shortly after dawn Sunday morning.

That advance had been cleared by air assaults by B-52s as well as precision raids by fighter bombers and several days of artillery raids.

Saturday night, Apache helicopters swept the lines ahead of the division in an air reconnaissance. The Apache pilots had orders to destroy any Iraqi vehicles north of American positions.

The initial assault was to be aimed at an Iraqi light infantry division, which is believed to have lost all but a handful of its tanks and armor from various bombardments.

Civilian actions reflect concern

JUNCTION CITY — Late Saturday night the clerk in a convenience store didn't answer a customer's questions.

"What's wrong?" the customer said. "How come you're not smiling?" He walked from the counter to the store's front door, stopped and looked back at the clerk.

"Oh yeah, I know," he said. "The war started tonight." He walked out the door.

The clerk, Rochelle Konopacke, rang up the purchases of another customer. A few moments later, she explained that her father and husband are both in Saudi Arabia with the 1st Infantry Division.

"I'm scared," Konopacke said. "I'm not ready to lose my family. I don't want them to get hurt."

"I'm just wondering what's going to happen," she said.

Konopacke said she is not afraid of the phone ringing, which is the way military officials have told her she'll be notified if her husband is wounded.

"Usually, when the phone rings, I'm expecting it to be him," she said. "But I know he can't call me now."

If her husband is killed in the conflict, an Army official will come to her house with the news, Konopacke said. To keep her mind off of the war, she keeps busy.

"I keep busy. I work a lot," she said. "I spend time with my mom. We try to help each other out."

Konopacke said she planned to go home and watch television after getting off work.

"I tell you, 'em to come home," she said. "I just want 'em all to come home."

At another convenience store, clerk Judy Brown listed the things customers Saturday night were saying about the start of the ground war.

"That this war's uncalled for," Brown said. "That they think he (Saddam Hussein) should be shot. They say he's too stubborn to back down. That he wanted the ground war and now he's got it. That the United States is going to kick butt."

"I tell you," Brown said, "my nerves are just about shot. I've been shaking since this thing started."

She was also worried about her nephew who is with the 1st Division.

"They called my niece up to Fort Riley and she left all hysterical," Brown said. "I don't know what happened. I hope it's nothing bad."

Brown said business had been slow Saturday night.

"I just wish them a lot of good luck," she said. "My thoughts and prayers are with each one."

At Veterans of Foreign Wars post 8773, manager Bob Marsh, who served two tours in Vietnam, said, "I'd rather fight them there than fight them here. I think America should fight her battles overseas."

Only three people were in the VFW post just south of I-70 in Junction City. Marsh said he expected more to come in later that night.

"The truth is the wives are at home listening to the phone because of the news," he said.

Appeals process floods committee

MELANIE SCHOENBECK
Collegian Reporter

Appealing a parking ticket is a process that can take months. Currently, the Traffic Citation Appeals Board is reviewing appeals from as far back as September.

Anyone desiring to appeal a ticket must do so within 14 days of its issue. The appeal form must be accompanied with a self-addressed stamped envelope. After TCAB responds to the appeal, the student has another 14 days for payment purposes if the appeal is denied, Annette Boddy, keyboard operator and coordinator of the appeals process for the K-State Police, said.

"I am not a good judge of how many appeals we are backlogged. I would say it is between 300 to 500," Boddy said.

One reason for the large amount of appeals being made by students can be attributed to the fact that the campus police have more ticket writers and therefore, more tickets are being issued. The parking areas are being covered more thoroughly.

Another factor that may play a role in the backlog is students appeal tickets for the sole reason of postponing payment. The appeals process ties up the financial aspect of citations.

"We get a lot of appeals. I would guess that we receive in the neighborhood of 25 appeals daily. Plus, I receive some appeals through the mail. I have one girl who works to find the original tickets and it is getting to the point where she needs more help," Boddy said.

Some contributing factors to the backlog include a new computer system in the office at the campus police station and not enough manpower on TCAB to review the large amount of appeals brought before the board.

Protesters support Yeltsin's demand

MOSCOW (AP) — About 100,000 people rallied Sunday in support of Boris Yeltsin after he was blasted by Communist Party hard-liners for demanding the resignation of President Mikhail Gorbachev.

The enthusiastic demonstration for Yeltsin, president of the Russian republic, filled a square next to the Kremlin in central Moscow. After chanting Yeltsin's name, the crowd turned against the Soviet president, chanting "Gorbachev resign!" and "Gorbachev, go away!"

"Red Filth, Hands Off Our Yeltsin!" read a sign in support of the 60-year-old politician, who was not at the rally.

In a nationally televised appearance Tuesday, Yeltsin accused Gorbachev of sacrificing political and economic reforms to gain personal power and demanded that he resign.

Crowd rallies against democracy

VIENNA, Austria (AP) — Anti-democracy demonstrators demanded Sunday that Albania's Communist government ban the opposition Democratic Party and hang its leaders.

The rally came just hours after the government, seeking to prevent more bloodshed, denied it had asked provincial authorities to organize supporters of the late dictator Enver Hoxha to march on the capital, Tirana.

But pro-democracy crowds, who blame Hoxha for four decades of poverty and repression, last week toppled a giant statue of him as well as other monuments.

Skydiver falls to death during jump

DELAND, Fla. (AP) — A skydiver fell to his death Sunday when he was knocked unconscious during an attempt to link a world record 153 skydivers in a single jump, organizers and witnesses said.

The 27-year-old Tampa man fell about 16,000 feet and landed in a pasture north of Deland Municipal Airport about 2:30 p.m., said police Sgt. Tim Mattingly.

The skydiver, whose name was not immediately released, was among skydivers from Europe, Canada and the United States trying to break the record of 144 jumpers who linked in Illinois in 1988.

Inferno brought under control

PHILADELPHIA (AP) — A high-rise inferno that burned for almost 19 hours was brought under control Sunday after killing three firefighters and gutting at least nine floors of a 38-story skyscraper across from City Hall.

The 12-alarm blaze raged from 8:30 p.m. Saturday until 3 p.m., when it reached a floor with automatic sprinklers and firefighters were able to direct a stream of water into windows, Fire Commissioner Roger Ulshafer said.

Hours earlier, fire crews stopped fighting the blaze from inside the building after engineers warned the charred and soot-covered high rise could collapse.

The city's main downtown intersection, the traffic circle where Philadelphia's two major arteries loop around City Hall, was closed.

At least 12 firefighters were injured. Two were hospitalized in stable condition.

Finney pledges to fight for plans

TOPEKA (AP) — Gov. Joan Finney promised Saturday to barnstorm the state to build support for her legislative proposals, and implored fellow Democrats to remain united in the future.

Finney and members of the party gathered in Topeka during the weekend for their annual Washington Day celebration. She said the party captured the governorship and a majority in the state House of Representatives because of its unity.

"We, the Democratic Party, have won by joining together," she said in her keynote speech at the Saturday night dinner, attended by about 700 party members. "We have formed a coalition of groups, groups that must remain united."

Before her speech, Finney sought to counter Republicans' contentions that there is not significant support for her legislative program, especially her property tax relief proposals.

Coups worries ambassador nominee

LAWRENCE (AP) — The man whom President Bush intends to nominate as the new ambassador to Thailand said he was disappointed by a coup in that Southeast Asia nation.

"The fundamental problem from an American standpoint is we hate to see a democratic government removed and hope there will be a restoration of democracy as soon as possible," said David Lambertson, a visiting political science professor at the University of Kansas.

Lambertson, 50, learned last week that Bush intends to nominate him for the Thailand post. He is a career member of the U.S. Foreign Service and is currently serving as diplomat in residence at the University of Kansas.

High-quality research at the edge of biological science was discussed Saturday in the Union.

Twenty-two young scientists presented the latest findings of their running master's and doctoral theses at the 17th Annual Forum for Student Research of the Division of Biology. The presentations were directed to an audience of about 80 people.

These graduate students are involved in research ranging from simulating and manipulating bone formation in vitro to identifying the antigens causing diarrhea and cholera-like symptoms in AIDS patients, with monoclonal antibodies. They are also researching mutating major capsid proteins to render viruses noninfective and are identifying essential elements of photosynthesis with synthetic peptide antibodies.

The forum was organized to give students an opportunity to present their ideas, research and experimental results and receive constructive criticism and review from other students and colleagues.

Michael Tilley, graduate student in microbiology, said he thought speaking at this forum was an important opportunity.

"I have talked at regional and national meetings, but this is important because these are the people that we see every day. We like them to know what we are doing, too," he said.

The forum was dedicated to the memory of Kenneth Bassett, graduate student and research assistant in the Division of Biology between 1982 and 1985, who died one month ago.

The memorial to Bassett includes a permanent endowment fund of $5,000 set up through the Center for Basic Cancer Research in the Division of Biology, said Dale Claassen, graduate student in biology.

This fund is meant to support graduate students' training. It will help graduate students cover travel expenses when they give talks at national meetings and workshops.

"That's one source of funding that is sometimes hard to come by for graduate students," Claassen said. "This is the first time that graduate students have set up a memorial for one of their own graduate students. Usually they are set up by the family."

He said students felt such a loss as a result of Bassett's death that they thought there should be something they could do to have a lasting memorial to him.

"This was one formal way we could acknowledge his contribution to science and to the Division of Biology in a professional way and also in a personal way," Claassen said.

LaDonna Grenz, graduate student in laboratory medicine, was one of Bassett's roommates and also a very close friend. She said the idea was to use a graduate student fund as a memorial fund in honor of Bassett.

"We plan to have it as a long-term fund," Grenz said.

"Hopefully it will be enough that we can give a sum yearly," she added.

They are currently raising the money from former graduate students and current faculty and graduate students, Claassen said.

Jim Guikema, associate professor of biology and forum organizer, said he was glad so many people came, not only biologists, but also guests from other departments.

Group raises funds in support of campus art

ERIN BURKE
Collegian Reporter

Friends of Art had a membership tea and art show Sunday afternoon in Nichols Hall.

Friends of Art is a support organization for the University's collection, and members are invited to the show to view new art, said Mary Doolittle, K-State art curator.

The show is a yearly event to raise money for purchasing new art and restoring damages to any pieces in the Permanent Art Collection.

Depending on the amount of money donated this year, members receive either a print or a poster of a piece by exhibiting artist Elizabeth Layton, Doolittle said.

Layton and John Stewart Curry, who died in 1946, were the two featured artists, Doolittle said. Layton is an 81-year-old woman who creates art from her home in Wellsville.

Layton took her first art class when she was 64, said Don Lambert, Layton's representative.

Lambert said he's been showing Layton's art since he discovered her talent when he was a reporter covering a local art show, which included her paintings.

Her works have been on display in more than 150 towns across the country, and in 1992, her art will be shown at the Smithsonian Institute in Washington, D.C.

Friends of Art has a traveling exhibit named "Buildings and Landscapes," comprised of 21 pieces from K-State's Permanent Art Collection. K-State began its art collection in 1928 and has obtained about 1,500 pieces, Doolittle said.

The most important purchase was made in 1990 when Conte Crayon by Curry was added to the collection.

"He was the most famous artist Kansas ever produced," Doolittle said.

Most of the art is kept in storage, aside from the pieces displayed in campus offices.

"It's a terrible pity these things are in storage where the students can't see, where the teachers can't see," Doolittle said.

This might change if plans to build a campus museum succeed.

A $4-million funding goal has been set, and about $3 million in pledges has been raised, Doolittle said.

Union committee to study smoking areas

CINDY BRIGGS
Collegian Reporter

Due to the recent student concern over prohibiting smoking from all areas of the K-State Union, the Union Governing Board Thursday night created a subcommittee to study several options limiting designated areas for smoking.

UGB Director Dennis O'Keefe, junior in business, said the committee will consist of a diversified group of students including both smokers and non-smokers. He said the committee should be formed by next week due to the urgency of the issue.

O'Keefe said after studying available options and considering student opinion, the committee will present a proposal to UGB and from the committee's suggestion, UGB will make its decision.

"We've redirected our course to consider a proposal for a limited-smoking K-State Union," he said.

O'Keefe said he would like the committee to present the proposal by the end of March. He said he would then like to see UGB reach its conclusion sometime by the end of the semester.

The decision to form a subcommittee came after an outpour of concerned students voiced their opinions of Student Senate's resolution to ban smoking from all areas of the Union. A petition signed by over 300 smoking and non-smoking students in opposition to the resolution was given to UGB.

About 30 concerned students, staff and faculty attended the open session of the UGB meeting speaking both for and against the resolution.

Scott Walker, junior in accounting, objected to Student Senate's resolution.

"Assuming that Senate has done a reasonable job representing the student body, we need to look at the actual vote, which was 24-28," Walker said. "The important thing to look at is almost one-half of the students think the Union should provide some place to smoke."

Those who spoke in opposition to the resolution said they want more dialogue and a compromise from UGB.

Dorothy Roberts, graduate student in student counseling and personal services, said no one told smokers they were going to be moved out of the stateroom.

"No one told us. We just got shoved out into the hallway until someone comes to take our place," Roberts said. "We like the Union — it's a good place to eat and study. We don't want to be run out of here."

In support of the resolution, John Geise, professor of physics, said the decision to move smokers out into the hallway was a mistake. Geise, who has cystic fibrosis, said walking through the hallways and recreation areas of the Union are an impediment to his health.

"During the 12 years I've been at this University, I've had to suffer from smokers in the Union. As faculty and a student, I need to use the Union, too. This is the only cafeteria on campus," he said.

A concern brought up by Terri Eddy, recreational manager of the Union, was the loss of profit in the recreation area if UGB decides to prohibit smoking.

"I don't care what decision you make as long as you can live with it," she told members of the board.

Eddy estimated a profit of $150,000 a year comes from users of the bowling and billiards area. Of that amount, she said she estimates the Union would lose $83,000 due to an estimated 30 percent drop in usage from those who would like to smoke as they use the area.

O'Keefe said he would like the subcommittee to present the proposal to UGB before the end of March so UGB can reach a decision by the end of the semester.

Unfocused eyes will see much in ground war

War changes everything.

I lay in bed at 3 a.m. Sunday after a long Saturday, nervous and looking around the room. I have always had trouble getting to sleep. After I turn off the light, I have to look around the room to make sure there aren't monsters or murderers crouching behind my laundry. It's irrational, but I can't sleep otherwise.

Sunday morning, I thought was the most likely time for something to spring at me in my sleep. I usually listen to a tape or to the radio when I go to bed, but I turned off the radio as soon as I turned off the light, not wanting to hear one more thing about the ground war, which really had begun a few hours earlier. I thought war news would be a magnet for whatever bad things could happen to me. If a large-scale war can be fought, why can't some horrid creature from the Land of the Wild Things launch itself from behind my underwear and tear into my throat while I sat there listening? These are things I think about as I try to sink into sleep. Nothing profound here.

I couldn't stop thinking about the war even with the radio off. Still fully awake, I put in my MCS tape and considered what had happened during the day. Fred "Sonic" Smith's distorted guitar noise rolled out of my bedside cassette player, and I thought about the dead eyes of the sheep we had moved and the biggest lamb A.J.'s stepmom had ever seen, wrapped in a blue blanket on an empty house's bathroom floor.

The day had started with a neck cramp, my punishment not only for sleeping on a friend's couch at a weird angle, but also for banging my head shamelessly at the previous night's big Tuber/Roach Factory show. Somehow, I got up and drove home, wearing the clothes I slept in, which always feels good. It was about 8 a.m.

At home, a friend from out of town had crashed on the couch. He woke up and we listened to some good albums, while eating grapefruit and drinking coffee. He had been in the Navy, but we didn't mention the war even in passing. Instead, we discussed the trivial matters good rock music inspires: which member of Husker Du was the better songwriter, Grant Hart or Bob Mould, and which member of KISS had the best make-up.

He left and I hopped in the shower. When I got out, A.J. was waiting for me to drive out and help his father move. I dressed, pulled on my cowboy boots and left. It was 10 a.m.

His father was moving from a distant farm south of town to a compound just a little south of town. He had rented a U-Haul and enlisted A.J., A.J.'s roommate and me to move the major furniture. It was a nice drive, on 177 past I-70, through the Flint Hills.

A.J.'s father has a bunch of livestock. He wasn't going to move them on Saturday, thankfully. I admit I'm a city boy, and although I worked in the Topeka Zoo for a little while, I have no idea how one moves regular livestock from one farm to another, so I was glad we were only out there to move furniture. He has some horses, geese, a pony and a slew of sheep. On the drive out, A.J. said one of the ewes gave birth the night before.

Ed Skoog
Collegian Columnist

The two-story farmhouse was far off the road. We parked next to the U-Haul. Sheep shuffled around nervously in the yard next to the red barn, except for one that was lying down. Inside, the house was empty except for dusted furniture set near the front door and the bed frames upstairs, which needed to be disassembled. The rugs were rolled up, and the bare floors stared up at us. Our voices echoed in the way only human voices can echo in an empty house — lifelessly. Voices in a deserted house sound more like barks than speech. I felt unwelcome, not by A.J.'s dad, but by the house itself.

It was around noon by the time we moved everything out and rearranged it in the U-Haul. A.J.'s dad rolled down the U-Haul's door, and we went back inside for a Coke. A.J.'s dad had to call someone, and we stood around by the bathroom door drinking Cokes and watching A.J.'s stepmom nurse the black lamb, not even a day old, from a baby bottle.

Let me stop here a second and tell you about what we thought was happening with the war at that time. A.J.'s dad said he had been listening to the radio and it sounded like the Iraqis were pulling out of Kuwait and sacking Kuwait City as they left. We didn't say anything else about it, but I was trying to figure out how I would express my "told-you-so" attitude in today's column. I thought about a friend's mother, whose other son is in the Marines and how relieved she would be to know her son was going to come home safely.

A.J.'s stepmom said this lamb was going to be real big when he grew up, and he was the largest baby she had ever seen. She wouldn't have believed he was only a day old if she hadn't seen the birth herself. Poor thing. A.J.'s dad got off the phone and spoke.

"Well, there's just one thing left to do. We need to move that ewe up to the driveway so Louis can come get it. C'mon," he said.

Until that moment, I had not thought anything was odd about the lamb being hand-raised. I just thought he looked cute in the blue blanket on the bathroom's tile floor. As I said, I am a city boy. I didn't immediately understand what a lamb too large meant — that during birth, a lamb too large could pull out its mother's insides.

We trudged out into the yard and the sheep fled into the barn at our advance, leaving the dead ewe alone with us in the muddy yard. A.J. and I grabbed the ewe's front legs and dragged the carcass through the yard, out the gate, through another pen and deposited it against a stone fence next to the driveway. The stiffened hooves kept catching in the gates, and no matter how hard we tugged, the ewe's eyes never focused or blinked.

Not that I expected them to, but as I laid in bed at the end of that same day, after I heard the real deadly war had begun and after having my relief about the end of the war turn into uncomfortable dread, I also didn't expect something to slither out of my desk drawer and smother me in my sleep. But that's how man thinks. We are not always rational. And as the war unwinds across Iraq and thousands of corpses are dragged across yards and left along stone fences, reason will leave us. And maybe we will think all this means something to the unfocusing eyes of our dead.

Bramlage lives up to billing

Bramlage Coliseum is building a reputation.

Many students were concerned with the idea of spending student money on the construction of the coliseum. They feared the building, although promised to be multi-purpose, would strictly be a place to watch the 'Cats in action.

This fear was unfounded. Through the help of conscientious promoters, Bramlage Director Charlie Thomas and his staff are slowly building a reputation as a concert stop for many bands.

The students can sigh with relief.

For once we have been given what we were promised. They told us when we reluctantly gave them money Bramlage would become a place for more than just basketball games.

And, it has.

Bramlage has become a competitive venue for country music, fundraisers, comedy shows and rock concerts. It is also opened to business fairs like the Little Apple Business Show.

We got what we paid for this time.

The community has reaped benefits from the coliseum, too. In a couple of weeks, Bramlage will be filled with students for the class 2A men's and women's state basketball finals. The numbers of people brought into Manhattan for such an event will surely be a boon to the city's economy.

Congratulations, Bramlage. It is nice to see something building a reputation for itself so it can benefit the students and the community to a greater degree.

Letters

Reviews better

Editor,

Let me start off by saying I'm glad I finally got to see a concert review that didn't make me want to set my paper on fire after reading it.

However, there were a few annoyances I felt were uncalled for.

First, the comment about the song "High Enough" being exactly the same as the radio was kind of silly. Perhaps the reviewer has been listening to that particular song on fast forward or something. Granted, the basic parts of the song were the same, but I think the tempo difference should've at least been noted. Failure to mention that made it seem like the Damn Yankees didn't know what they were talking about.

Next was that all-too-popular comment about the "were they or weren't they doing it live" issue. Come on, folks. There were three different guitars going practically all the time, and yet people are still trying to convince me certain parts just had to be Memorex. If you want to pick on someone about that, try Madonna. Besides, if that stuff is really so obvious, then why don't I ever hear anyone else complain about it?

Thirdly, could we possibly lay off Ted Nugent? Perhaps it's just me, but I never got the impression he was full of himself. I've heard about him, as I'm sure many people have, and I realize his reputation probably proceeds him. But I honestly thought he was the funniest thing I've ever seen. It seems to me people take the things he does too seriously at times. I think he has an outrageous sense of humor, as opposed to an outrageous ego.

In all, I am pleased this review wasn't as nasty as some previous ones. However, I do think the reviewers could be a little less picky and just maybe come out and admit the show was good or they liked it. Sometimes I am not even sure why we have music critics. Different people, different views and different opinions. Entertainment is supposed to be fun. Maybe someday we can all just sit back and enjoy the ride.

Freedom expressed

Editor,

Two weeks ago, I sat in my "tiny windowless office" with a Collegian reporter and talked about pacifism. We talked about the definition of a pacifist, the moral and religious reasons for being one and about my experience of being a pacifist in this country during a time of war. We also talked a little about politics, a little about taxes and a little about my children.

When the story appeared in last Wednesday's paper under the headline "Professor pulls daughter from school," I was shocked and dismayed, to say the least. Not only did the Collegian choose one small point to emphasize (for its sensationalist value, I guess), but the report was inaccurate and incomplete. The story said I had taken my daughter out of school because her class was going to sing "God Bless America." Let me tell you what really happened.

In December, I heard there would be an all-school assembly where yellow ribbons were to be placed on the front of the school, and some children (not my daughter's class) were going to sing "God Bless the USA." After talking with the principal, I expressed my concerns to one of the planners of the event. I had questions about the potential for political manipulation of symbols (e.g. politicians could choose to interpret the public display of yellow ribbons as support of U.S. policy in the gulf, therefore giving them encouragement to further commit our troops in a war) and about the educational impact of such activities on children. My ideas were welcomed and considered in the planning of the event.

As Mennonites, my family believes that is wrong. We choose not to have our children participate in activities related to the war or to the military. I explained my views in a letter to the principal and to my daughter's teacher. We took her out of school for the afternoon of the event. Our beliefs have been treated by the school personnel with the greatest respect possible, and they have consistently shown our daughter it is all right to have different ideas.

Although the public school system is very tolerant of alternative viewpoints, I have learned some people are not. I have received two "hate" letters (anonymous) from people who seem to believe the freedom of speech means it is OK to speak freely as long as you agree with the government. This is not freedom. After those hostile letters from unknown sources, it felt almost good to read a signed response in the Collegian Friday. Monica Fitch, I thank you and respect you for your honesty. I know you do have to suffer a great deal because your spouse is in the military. I sympathize with you and hope he comes home safely.

Fitch, I do not hate this country, and I certainly think it could use God's blessing. I care about this country and feel I am a responsible citizen. It is exactly because I care that I take a stand on issues important to me. My right to do that, and your right to disagree with me, are what make this country "free."

Raborn represents

Editor,

Craig Raborn. Have you heard of him? He is a junior at K-State and a candidate for the Manhattan City Commission. If you have not heard of him, we know why. His opponents have outspent him on their own campaigns 5-to-1 and in two cases 10-to-1.

While they have been raising thousands of dollars, Raborn has been meeting the people, expressing his concerns and finding out the concerns of the Manhattan residents. He is waging a credible campaign, one in which people, both students and Manhattan residents, are put first.

Raborn has been a resident of Manhattan for 16 years. His parents have been longtime residents of the community.

During the campaign Raborn has had a clear grasp of the issues and has been honest about where he stands on them. From day one of his candidacy, he said safe rental housing was a priority. We believe Raborn is the kind of person who won't yield to the wishes of the landlords just because they are campaign contributors.

He will also work for community image and for economic development in the Manhattan area. These two things are vital for all of Manhattan.

The over 14,000 K-State students that live off campus need representation. The 21,000 students from K-State are the single largest economic contributor to the Manhattan community. Raborn will benefit the community as a communications source to this important asset.

We encourage the students of K-State and the residents of Manhattan to vote Tuesday for the candidate who is qualified, dedicated and earning their vote, Craig Raborn.

Plans for Earth Day underway

RYAN HAYTER
Collegian Reporter

The 1991 Earth Day Fair is taking shape with plans for environmentally informative activities on the drawing board.

"The purpose of the fair is to create and maintain community awareness of the issue of protecting our earth and the environment," said Paul Davidson, junior in social sciences and president of Southwind.

The Manhattan Environmental Council will start events with an Earth Week Awareness rally April 15 and will feature speakers throughout the week. The fair will be April 21.

The free Earth Day Fair in the city park will include displays and activities from over 20 local groups and organizations.

Students Acting to Save a Vulnerable Environment is coordinating bands to play during the event.

"The thing is to pick out bands that are involved with environmental issues," said Ernest Cantu, freshman in mechanical engineering and the public relations director for Southwind. "We want bands who perform songs that relate to the environmental cause."

Recycling bins will be available for people to leave paper, aluminum, glass and certain kinds of plastics.

Davidson said several tons of material were brought last year.

The American Institute of Architecture Students is coordinating a hazardous waste pick-up.

"People who come to the fair may bring material that is hazardous in households and have them disposed of properly," Davidson said.

Political Reaction to Issues of the Modern Order will sponsor a Dash for Trash. The event will be a competition for residence halls, fraternities, sororities and independent groups to collect waste and raise awareness of environmental issues at the same time.

Southwind is planning a Kiddy Korner to educate children and keep them occupied while parents are attending other events.

The council is planning to have an Earth Day event every year.

"Last year's fair was very successful with over a thousand people attending the event," Davidson said. "We want to keep the momentum going."

Extension leader serves as link

Professor joins K-State, Washington, D.C.

BETH GAINES
Collegian Reporter

Barry Flinchbaugh chewed on a green, House of Windsor cigar while he talked adamantly about agricultural policy-making.

"I don't get involved in partisan politics," Flinchbaugh said. "I work very closely with both sides of the aisle."

Flinchbaugh's dedication to the policy-making process radiates from his spacious office, as pictures of senators and past secretaries of agriculture decorate the walls.

For the past 21 years, Flinchbaugh has served as a link between the Midwest and Washington, D.C.

Before arriving at K-State, he completed his doctoral work in agricultural economics at Purdue University.

While Flinchbaugh's bachelor's degree from Penn State was originally in animal sciences, he said the addition of agricultural economics has been very beneficial for his stay in Kansas.

"It's the best of both worlds," Flinchbaugh said. "I have a strong base in animal agriculture and the economics on top of that works very well in Kansas."

Flinchbaugh is now the State Extension Leader, which includes teaching Agricultural Policy.

Ag Policy is only offered in the fall semester and is typically a full class.

Gay Conley, senior in agricultural economics and finance, said it was one of the best classes she has taken in her college career.

"Dr. Flinchbaugh is a very motiational speaker," Conley said. "He is so knowledgeable in the field of ag policy, you believe every word he says. He convinces you to believe."

Flinchbaugh's expertise in policy making has resulted in contacts in the nation's capital.

Flinchbaugh informally advises the Kansas Congressional delegation as well as several other agricultural trade organizations such as Farmland Industries, U.S. Feed Grains Council and Cenex Land O'Lakes.

"My work consulting has been a natural evolution out of my interest in policy-making and agricultural policy," Flinchbaugh said.

"One of the greatest satisfactions is to have both Pat Roberts and Dan Glickman tell farm audiences that Flinchbaugh plays a key role in helping us sort out the facts. That is a great satisfaction," he said.

Flinchbaugh's colleagues appreciate his visibility. Art Barnaby, professor in agricultural economics, said Flinchbaugh takes a lot of the heat in the department.

"He is so visible, when a controversial issue is brought up in policy, Barry acts like a lightning rod and attracts the attention," Barnaby said. "Arguing is something he likes to do, so we all let him deal with the situation."

Flinchbaugh said he understands the influence internationalization has had on agriculture by traveling abroad every other year.

Last October, Flinchbaugh went to Japan with the U.S. Feed Grain Council on a trade mission.

"To understand the impact you must have been there," Flinchbaugh said. "We no longer have a domestic agriculture."

Although Flinchbaugh may be busy both in Washington and abroad, he still finds time for the students at K-State.

Jackie McClaskey, senior in agricultural economics, said he is always willing to help.

"Dr. Flinchbaugh helped me a lot outside of class. He was able to give me insight into several areas of agricultural trade talks," McClaskey said.

Flinchbaugh has been approached by both political parties to consider running for election, but has yet to do so.

He said that after retiring from the University, though, he might consider the option.

Barnaby said Flinchbaugh's strength lies within his ability to present material.

"He is very effective verbally," he said.

"After I retire from the University I will probably be a freelance speaker," Flinchbaugh said. "In fact, I could probably do it now."

Bowling proceeds benefit local youth

Pins were falling this weekend to raise funds for Big Brothers/Big Sisters.

The Manhattan chapter of Big Brothers/Big Sisters sponsored the annual Bowling Classic Saturday and Sunday.

Money raised by the Bowling Classic will be used to help Big Brothers/Big Sisters recruit, screen and match volunteers to local children.

Participants in the event had to get as many sponsors as they could. Sponsors gave a minimum pledge of 7 cents per pin. League bowlers also helped by getting sponsors and bowling all week for Big Brothers/Big Sisters.

Gwyn Crumplar, executive director for Big Brothers/Big Sisters, said the fundraiser went very well and the turnout was great.

"A lot of people that didn't even sign up showed up," she said.

The Bowling Classic was at Wildcat Lanes Feb. 23. Sue Taylor, manager of Wildcat Lanes, said the bowling alley helped donate $1.10 for every game bowled.

Pizza Hut donated free pizza all day for the participants, she said.

Everyone involved with Big Brothers/Big Sisters was encouraged to participate. Bowlers included families of the little brothers and sisters, board of director members and children who are currently on the waiting list for Big Brothers/Big Sisters.

Jeff Pittman, 11, of Manhattan, is on the waiting list for a big brother. He said he was having a lot of fun bowling, and he is looking forward to getting a big brother who will play video games with him.

Mark Knackendoffel, president of the board of directors for Big Brothers/Big Sisters, said the money raised by the Bowling Classic accounts for about half of the organization's budget.

Much of the money raised will be used to pay staff members who help match volunteers with the children, he said.

"Donations are real critical, and we certainly have a lot of enthusiasm," Knackendoffel said.

Knackendoffel said the deployment of the soldiers to Saudi Arabia has taken a toll on Big Brothers/Big Sisters. Many of the soldiers were volunteers in the program.

Paintball simulates war

New tournament field to be open for combat by March

JIM STRUBER
Consumer Reporter

A tournament field for the simulated combat sport of paintball should be ready this spring.

Cris Backman, owner of Crazy Kris' in Aggieville, sells and rents paintball equipment and is planning to open a field west of Manhattan near Keats.

Backman said he is designing three different fields that should be ready for a county zoning request in mid-March.

"Zoning property is a long procedure, but we should be able to play paintball by the end of March," Backman said.

The fields are situated on 13 acres of hilly land, much of which is covered with thickets of brush and cedar trees. Most of the land slopes down to a forested gully and a dammed pond, and there is a wall of limestone blocks bordering the eastern property line.

Players wear camouflage clothes, goggles and masks. They carry CO2-powered paintball guns that fire the paintballs at no more than 300-feet-per-second for safety reasons. If tournament players are hit by a glob of paint larger than the size of a quarter, they are out of the tournament until they start another scenario.

Backman said he stresses safety, and before a tournament begins he explains the rules to the players.

"Without safety, it is just not a game anymore," Backman said. "Safety is extremely important."

Aaron Daily, sophomore in architecture and "Highlander" team captain, said the field will be a good place to practice for larger tournaments, which award prize money. He and members of the team helped Backman build the field. Afterwards, they separated into an "orange squad" and a "white squad."

The orange squad left first, separating into smaller groups to hide in the forest and ambush the white squad. They were unsuccessful, and no white-squad members were hit with paintballs.

The white squad captain said he was optimistic until they switched sides and lost a closely contested 35-minute elimination game.

Molly O'Neill, Manhattan high school student, said this was her first time playing paintball. After getting paintballed early in the second contest, she said she was confused and inexperienced, yet enjoyed the new game.

"It's pretty cool, but I didn't even get to shoot that time," O'Neill said. "I haven't done anything like this before."

OPERATION DESERT STORM

Franz Samelson, retired psychology professor, protests American involvement in the Persian Gulf Sunday near St. Isidore's Chapel. The vigils are sponsored by the Manhattan Coalition for Peace in the Middle East.

Changes needed at end of gulf war

ERWIN SEBA
Staff Reporter

With a possible conclusion to the Persian Gulf War in sight, peace groups should start working for solutions to domestic problems and the long-term Israeli-Palestinian conflict and shift efforts away from opposing the war.

"Unless we get bogged down, it's pointless to raise the cry of stop the war," John Exdell, associate professor of philosophy and a member of the Manhattan Coalition for Peace in the Middle East, said Sunday while participating in the coalition's weekly peace vigil on the grounds of St. Isidore's Chapel and Catholic Student Center.

Following the war's end, peace activists should also raise questions about the way the United States makes foreign policy, he said.

"A quick, successful, relatively painless war may persuade people that war is good," Exdell said. "Like during the 1980s when the cry was greed is good, the banner of the 1990s may be war is good."

Administrations since the 1960s have been trying to persuade the American people that war is good, Exdell said. He said the people need to be shown there are ways of making foreign policy other than war.

One of the first steps to solving domestic problems is holding the Bush administration to its promise to cut defense spending, he said. He said defense spending has increased since Bush became president.

"The administration claims it's going to be reducing defense expenditures in the coming years. I think that has got to be treated with suspicion," Exdell said. "And the arms industry is in full cry for all the weapons that have been on display."

Solving the Israeli-Palestinian conflict, which the United States has prevented, is a key step to long-term stability in the Middle East, he said.

"That is the underlying foundation for all of the anger, resentment and hostility to the West among Arabs," Exdell said.

Preparing for a time when people realize war should not be used to make foreign policy is what peace groups should begin doing, he said.

"Building grassroots organizations, talking with small groups, taking the long view and not giving up because there may be a time when people are ripe for that message," Exdell said.

Anne Cowan, a Manhattan physical therapist also participating in the vigil, agreed with Exdell that peace groups need to educate people about American foreign policy toward Third World countries.

"America's policy in the war is very consistent with its policies to Third World countries," Cowan said. "The U.S. is trying to keep control of it for its own benefit."

The difference between the gulf war and past U.S. efforts to control other countries like Nicaragua is the administration is killing U.S. citizens and not only citizens from Third World countries, she said.

Peace groups will need to raise the public's political consciousness, provide alternative media sources and increase their numbers to have greater influence through representatives in Washington, she said.

"It's not just the situation in Iraq, it's general U.S. foreign policy," Cowan said.

About 30 people held signs for passing drivers to see during the vigil late Sunday afternoon. Three people, in passing cars, yelled "Take peace by storm" at the coalition members. Other drivers honked their car horns.

The coalition has tentatively scheduled a forum on the implications of the war for 12:30 p.m. Thursday in the K-State Union Courtyard, said Lyman Baker, instructor of English and coalition member.

Saddam popular target for shooters

HOPE SWARTZ
Collegian Reporter

The Persian Gulf War is permeating all parts of American culture, including sport. The newest trend in target shooting is using a poster of Saddam Hussein as a target.

Pat's Gun Shop in Ogden sells about 10 to 15 targets per week. Owner Pat Livingston said people are buying them as novelty items.

"It's a fad. We had Qaddafi when we had trouble with him, now we have Saddam. It seems to be whoever the villain-of-the-week is."

Livingston said he's never heard any objections to the posters, which feature a black and white silhouette of Saddam's torso with a bull's eye and "Insane Hussein" written across the top. The target is 2 feet by 30 inches and sells for about $1.99.

Bill Wierman, senior in civil engineering, said he prefers shooting at the poster rather than at animals.

"Ninety percent of the time we just shoot at beer cans — I don't like killing animals," Wierman said. "People who like to shoot like to make it interesting. Bull's eyes get old after awhile."

Wierman and his shooting companions buy regular posters for target practice also.

"I have a Madonna poster that's pretty riddled-up," Wierman said. "I'm working on obtaining a Vanilla Ice poster and another New Kids on the Block one."

Wierman said he enjoys going out to Osage Lake shooting range to practice and meet other gun enthusiasts. He said he's met several K-State students, police officers and former military men.

"This isn't about politics or killing anyone," Wierman said. "It's just fun."

Arab students question Middle East future

War should end with stability in region

ELVYN JONES

City/Government Editor

Two Arab students at K-State said they are upset with the Persian Gulf War and pessimistic about the future.

Abdu Durrar, graduate student in agronomy, said he is torn between loyalties. He became a naturalized American citizen last fall and now finds his adopted country fighting fellow Arabs.

"On a personal level, this is the worst thing that could happen to me," he said. "I'm extremely depressed. I like to watch the news to see what is going on. But the more I watch, the more I get depressed."

Rami Ali, graduate student in physics from Jordan, said he is in shock by the reality of a ground war. "I really don't know what to think right now," he said. "I'm incapable of thinking. I'm just watching television in shock. On Jan. 16, I was in shock for 24 hours, but I got back to normal."

Durrar said he thinks the long-term interest of the United States in the Middle East should be ensuring the stability of the region.

"War is not the answer," he said. "The more you kill, the more it plants the seeds for future hatred and vengeance."

Originally from Libya, Durrar said the feelings of the masses in the other North African countries of Morocco, Tunisia, Algeria and Egypt are strongly against U.S. and coalition policies in the gulf, and those feelings could destabilize the present regimes in those countries.

"I don't know if they are honest, but some of his (Saddam's) ideas, such as sharing the wealth of the Middle East, are appealing to the masses," he said. "They feel it is an unjust, amoral war. They will rebel against their leaders who support the

Durrar said as many as 500,000 people recently marched in Morocco to protest the American-led war effort, even though Morocco's King Hassan has sent 1,200 troops as a token gesture of support for a fellow king.

"The fundamentalist movements are getting stronger," he said. "People go to the mosques and hear they (the coalition) are killing babies and other innocent people, and they see the destruction caused by the bombing."

Many Arabs are afraid the removal of Iraq as a military power will mean Israel can carry out expansionist policies, such as the removal of Arabs from the West Bank, with less restraint, Durrar said.

The influx of Russian Jews to Israel throughout last year and Israeli Prime Minister Yitzhak Shamir's recent cabinet appointment of a right-wing politician who advocates the removal of all Arabs from the West Bank only strengthens such fears among Arabs.

Leaders share in decisions

SHANNAN SEELY
Agriculture Reporter

American leaders in the Persian Gulf War have instant communication and consult each other before certain decisions are made.

Sometimes, those meetings are off the record, which disturbs historians because there are no memos, said Robin Higham, professor in history.

Under the U.S. Constitution, the president is in charge of the military, he said.

Since President George Bush is commander in chief, the military works from civilian advice, he said.

"The ultimate decision is a civilian decision," he said. Bush was a World War II flier, head of CIA and an ambassador to China.

Higham said Bush is more knowledgeable about the world and the military than former presidents Johnson or Kennedy. Bush has been less likely to dictate battlefield tactics.

With the help of advisers, the president sets national policy of the general principles of war strategy.

The national policy also allows generals and lower commanders to carry out war tactics and ensure the troops are in position.

"Tactics is the art of the general," he said.

Army Gen. H. Norman Schwarzkopf, as commander in chief of the U.S. Central Command, is in charge of various war tactics. He manages all American forces in the Persian Gulf and is stationed in Riyadh, Saudi Arabia, said Newsweek magazine. He also served two tours in Vietnam.

Chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff Army Gen. Colin Powell serves as the military adviser. Dick Cheney, Secretary of Defense, is the civilian adviser to the president and was a former Wyoming congressman.

Powell is the first black chairman, Newsweek said.

Higham said the career pattern of promotion is a gradual process, however, Powell skipped several ranks to his present position.

Usually, the military deals with the details of tactics and combat in battle. Powell manages the carry-out of these principles.

Each general has a staff. Higham said staffs are important because they have several important duties, including talking to people, giving guidance to generals and informing generals of the latest news.

While the leaders have joint meetings, each leader realizes his limitations. They consult each other about changes.

Stress, depression may follow ground war

PAUL NOEL
Staff Reporter

An increase of stress and depression for people with family and friends in the Persian Gulf War accompanied the start of a ground attack.

Dori Lambert, clinical coordinator at University Counseling Services, said although she has not seen a decrease in morale, there are many programs to help students deal with their depression and anxieties of being separated from a loved one.

"Sometimes there is a lag time from when a person hears bad news and when the shock begins," Lambert said.

University Counseling offices are open from 8 a.m. to 5 p.m. and are located in Lafene Student Health Center 232.

The first five sessions are free to full-time students and the first three for part-time students. Cost is $7 per session afterwards.

Steve Bollman, professor of human development and family studies, said the department provides individual therapy on a pay basis. The cost is decided by what the person can afford.

Charles Smith, extension specialist in human development in the Department of Human Development and Family Studies, said parents should explain what their children see on television.

"Children know what's going on, and there's something quite frightening about it," Smith said. "They will also see things they may not understand."

He said parents should try to watch the news with the children and explain what they see, not lecture about things they haven't been exposed to.

Smith said one warning sign that a child is experiencing high levels of stress from the gulf crisis, is that the child will try to watch excessive levels of the gulf coverage on television.

"That would show the child is extremely frightened and apprehensive about it," he said.

Smith said parents should be careful not to convey negative stereotypes against people who are Arab or Muslim.

"It's important to talk about what is going on," Lambert said. "Our campus has a good support system, but people should also know they can come in and talk to someone on a more personal basis."

Group therapy is emphasized because counseling services is functioning at a maximum and has a small waiting list, she said.

Strategy for amphibious assault

When the U.S. Marines assault the shores of Kuwait, this is the strategy they are likely to use.

Marine helicopters fly under friendly shells to drop Marines behind the first line of Iraqi defenses. These Marines will cut off retreat and attack from the back. Air support and shelling should keep the second Iraqi line from advancing.

The USS Missouri and USS Wisconsin fire one-ton shells into Iraqi secondary defenses, while staying 15-20 miles from shore. These two World War II ships are the only ships in the U.S. Navy capable of providing this type of ground support.

Marines attack the shores and the first line of Iraqi defenses in a frontal beach assault. LCAC Equipment Bearer Hovercraft land Marines and their equipment on the shore.

Debbie Jones, a volunteer at Manhattan Cares, gives a telephone number to a caller Sunday. Manhattan Cares is a support group for military dependants and is located in the Manhattan Town Center.

Volunteers see mail increase

MEREDITH JONES
Collegian Reporter

Project Manhattan Cares volunteers working in Manhattan Town Center have noticed more people in the mall since the ground war phase of Operation Desert Storm started Saturday night.

"People are anxious," said Debbie Jones, a Manhattan Cares volunteer. "You can see they're worried."

Gabriele Rector, coordinator of volunteers for Manhattan Cares, said she has definitely seen an increase and is now expecting more traffic through the mall.

People are showing great concern for their loved ones, Rector said.

"People are more concerned and need to have support from everybody," she said.

Both Jones and Eavan Mages, a volunteer and graduate student in modern languages, said they agree that although the mall has been busy, it is also quiet. Mages' husband is serving in the Persian Gulf War.

A television at Manhattan Cares attracts people who come in and want to watch news and tapes of Fort Riley soldiers, which were made by Fort Riley media.

Jones said many people in Sunday's large crowd were just walking around.

"If wives can get out of the house and away from the TV, it's a good sign," she said.

Manhattan Cares is a support group that can give information to military wives 24 hours a day.

It also gets mail to soldiers, offers babysitting and helps out in emergencies. The hotline number is (913) 539-7508.

Volunteers helped a woman who was seven months pregnant move while her husband is serving in the Middle East, Jones said.

Volunteers are there to listen to people needing to talk, lend a helping hand and help people deal with stress.

Old, new weapons in use

B-52s, fighting vehicles only part of massive land assault

ERWIN SEBA
Staff Reporter

Though often portrayed as high-tech and state-of-the-art, the weapons being used by American forces in the Persian Gulf War have a variety of ages.

Ships such as the USS Wisconsin and the USS Missouri were outdated when originally built during World War II for sea battles against the Japanese. By the time those ships were put to sea, the aircraft carrier had replaced battleships like the Missouri and Wisconsin as the most formidable naval weapons system.

The B-52 Stratofortress, which is being used to pound Iraq daily, was originally produced in the mid-1950s as a strategic bomber to drop nuclear weapons on the Soviet Union. But with improvements, the B-52 is being used at the same time that its replacement, the B-1, is having trouble proving reliable.

Then again there is the Stealth Fighter. The F-117 uses advanced materials and a unique design to be virtually invisible to enemy radar as it drops bombs on its targets.

This is also true in the ground war that started Saturday. On one end of the spectrum there is the M-1 Abrams tank, which has a reactive armor that explodes when a shell strikes it deflecting the blast from the inside of the tank.

The M-1, as originally designed, has an average speed of 48 kilometers per hour and weighs 54,432 kilograms with a crew of four, according to "Jane's Main Battle Tanks."

Operating in conjunction with the M-1 is the Bradley Fighting Vehicle. In its design as a cavalry fighting vehicle, the Bradley provides screening and reconnaissance. For infantry units, the Bradley is an armored fighting vehicle. Prior to the attachment of reactive armor, the Bradley weighs 60,000 pounds, according to information provided by headquarters at the Department of the Army. The Bradley first came into service in the 1980s and has a crew of three.

Engaging enemy armor will also be the job of the AH-64 Apache helicopter. Able to fly at 235 miles per hour, the Apache has a two-man crew and carries a 30-millimeter cannon as well as 16 Hellfire missiles, according to "World Military Helicopters" by Elfan ap Rees.

The soldiers going into battle will carry as their primary combat rifle the M-16A2. An upgraded version of the M-16 used by soldiers in the Vietnam War, the M-16A2, is an air-cooled, gas-operated rifle with three-round burst control. The M-16A2 uses 5.56 millimeter ammunition and has a range of 550 meters, according to information provided by the Army.

Providing air support for the ground troops will be the A-10 Thunderbolt II. Distinctive in design because its wings are not swept back like other jets and its two engines are mounted on the sides of the fuselage, the A-10 has titanium armor surrounding the pilot's cockpit and is able to survive direct hits from armor-piercing and high-explosive projectiles up to 23 millimeters in size, according to the Public Affairs Office of the Secretary of the Air Force. The A-10 is able to loiter over a battlefield for 1.8 hours.

Also able to attack ground targets is the F-16 Fighting Falcon. The F-16 is also able to engage opposing aircraft in air-to-air combat. The Falcon can operate at speeds above Mach 2 and has a 20-millimeter, multi-barrel cannon, air-to-air missiles, bombs and electronic countermeasures pods, according to Air Force information.

Primarily designed for air-to-air combat, the F-15 Eagle has engines, which generate enough thrust for it to accelerate even in a vertical climb. The F-15 has a 20-millimeter, multi-barrel gun and carries air-to-air missiles. The Eagle operates at speeds above Mach 2.5, according to Air Force information. The F-15 came into use in the 1970s.

Also designed for air-to-air combat is the Navy aircraft, the F-14 Tomcat. The F-14 has the ability to track 24 targets at the same time through its weapons control system. The Tomcat's weapons include a 20-millimeter cannon and air-to-air missiles. The F-14 can also carry bombs. It operates at speeds above Mach 2, according to information provided by the Public Affairs Office of the Naval Air Systems Command.

Providing ground attack support for the troops will be the mission of the A-6E Intruder aircraft of the Navy. The A-6 flies at 563 nautical miles per hour, less than Mach 1.

Bush approves invasion; ground phase under way

LAJEAN RAU
Staff Reporter

A massive ground assault by coalition forces was announced by President Bush in a brief address late Saturday night.

The president expressed his confidence in the decision to begin the ground attack and in the ability of the coalition forces to meet their objectives.

Bush said he had again given Saddam Hussein an ultimatum — a deadline to begin withdrawal or face a ground attack.

The deadline, set for noon Saturday, demanded Saddam do what he should have done more than six months ago — withdraw his troops without condition or further delay from Kuwait and to comply with all United Nations Security Council resolutions, Bush said.

"To the contrary, what we have seen is a redoubling of Saddam Hussein's efforts to destroy completely Kuwait and its people," he said.

Saddam ignored the deadline, and the long-expected, massive ground assault is underway.

Bush said he gave the go-ahead to commander Gen. H. Norman Schwarzkopf in conjunction with coalition forces, to use all forces available, including ground forces, to eject the Iraqi army from Kuwait.

The president assured the American people that the decision to begin the ground war came only after extensive consultation within the coalition.

"The liberation of Kuwait has now entered a final phase," Bush said. "I have complete confidence in the ability of the coalition forces to swiftly and decisively accomplish their mission."

"May God bless and protect each and every one of them and may God bless the United States of America," Bush said.

The Palestinian question behind these fears is the real cause of instability in the Middle East, Durar said.

"To cure the disease of instability in the Middle East, the Palestinian question must be addressed," he said.

Durar said the American people were not told the truth about American objectives in the gulf war. Partially because of the strong Jewish lobby in Washington, the destruction of Saddam's military power, and not the withdrawal of Iraqi troops from Kuwait, is President Bush's real objective in the war.

"The failure of last week's negotiations showed anybody with any doubts the hidden agenda behind this war," he said. "The liberation of Kuwait was just a pretext."

"People say we have to go to war because we had no alternative, but diplomacy was never given a chance."

As an American, Durar said he believes in the opportunities the system allows for citizens to voice their opinions and work for what they believe. He has written Kansas senators and congressmen about his opposition to the use-of-force resolution Congress authorized in January.

His involvement with the Manhattan Alliance for Peace in the Middle East allowed him to work through the depression he felt at the beginning of the war, Durar said.

Still, he said he is sad and depressed by the waste of lives and resources in the war, and it affects his work as a student.

"I have the defense of my doctorate in March," he said. "My concentration is not what I would like it to be."

"I'm a sensitive person," he said. "It affects me. I want to close my eyes and see the killing stopped. A quick victory. A cease-fire. I just want it to stop."

Ali said the war doesn't bother him to that extent.

"I'm concerned, but I have also to work," he said. "I manage to keep on going."

COLUMBIA, Mo. — Eight K-State athletes were crowned 1991 Big Eight Indoor Track and Field Champions in Columbia, Mo., Friday and Saturday.

All-Americans Connie Teaberry and Angie Miller led the way for the women's team by capturing the top spots in the high jump and shot put, respectively.

Teaberry, who has previously qualified for nationals with a leap of 6-0½, cleared a height of 6-0 to earn top honors in that event.

competition with a heave of 48-11½, nearly three feet farther than her nearest competitor.

The third K-State women's championship was won by the 4x400-meter relay team in a race with Nebraska down to the wire. Team members Latricia Joyner, Nikki Green, Ellarie Pesmark and Markeya Jones combined to run a time of 3:49.59.

These performances were instrumental in helping the women take second in the meet and score 135 points against the favored Nebraska team's 151½ points.

Coach John Capriotti said he was pleasantly surprised by K-State's point total at the end of the meet.

"If someone would have told me we'd score 135 points, I'd have said, 'I don't know, that's a lot of points,'" he said. "We scored 25 more points than we've ever scored indoors."

K-State raked in 21 of those points were raked because of four shot-putters. In addition to Miller, Shanelle Stires, Dione Singleton and Shannon Flanagan placed in the event. Stires was second with a heave of 46-1¼, Singleton fifth with a heave of 45-4 and Flanagan's heave of 45-2½ placed sixth.

The triple jumpers also performed well for the Wildcats. Lisa Fager placed second with a leap of 39-3 and freshman Dee Dee Tribue placed fourth with a leap of 39-1¼.

Tribue also placed fourth in the long jump with a leap of 18-6.

The sprinters garnered many honors during the meet.

In addition to their victory in the 4x400-meter relay, Joyner, Jones and Green placed in individual endeavors. Joyner placed second in the 55-meter dash at 6.94 and also picked up a fourth-place finish in the 200-meter dash with a time of 24.32 just behind Jones who placed third at 24.05.

Green ran a time of 54.97 to capture second place in the 400-meters, and Debra Malone finished second in the 600-yard run with a time of 1:22.46.

Hurdler Verida Walter brought home a third-place medal in the 55-meter hurdles with a time of 7.99.

The women opened Saturday's events with a second-place finish in the distance medley relay. The team of Laura Ostmeier, Chris Williams, Jennifer Hillier and Janet Treiber crossed the line in 11:56.35.

Ostmeier also collected second-place honors in the 1,000-meters with a time of 2:56.61.

The women's distance corps put in the miles during the two-day meet.

Paulette Staats lead the way for the Wildcat women in the 3,000-meters by finishing fifth in 9:59.83.

She also took fourth-place honors in the mile with a time of 4:52.92.

In Friday evening's 5,000-meters, Treiber finished third (16:57.93) and Hillier fourth (16:58.68).

K-State's Shannon Flanagan heaves the shot put in the Big Eight meet Saturday in Columbia, Mo. Flanagan finished sixth in the event.

Also Friday, freshman Gwen Wentland captured third place in the pentathlon with 3,707 points and went on to tie for seventh place in the high jump on Saturday with a leap of 5-8.

On the men's side, outstanding performances from Marcus Wright and All-American Clifton Etheridge highlighted the meet for the Wildcats, who finished fourth with 61½ points.

Meet favorite Iowa State finished with a Big Eight Indoor meet record of 168 points to win the championship.

Wright captured his victory in the 800-meters with a time 1:53.08.

LINCOLN, Neb. — One team was playing for a school record in victories and survival in a league title chase.

The other was playing for the only thing it had left — its pride.

K-State, the team attempting to save face, took No. 14 Nebraska to the brink Saturday, only to suffer a familiar fate.

The Cornhuskers beat the Wildcats 85-78 at Bob Devaney Sports Center, assuring K-State of no better than a tie for last place in the Big Eight Conference.

"It's getting hard to take," K-State coach Dana Altman said. "We don't play to play close."

"We're out to win, and if we don't accomplish that, we're not happy."

The jubilation was reserved for the 'Huskers, who won for the 23rd time this season. It was a sweet moment for Nebraska coach Danny Nee, whose team was picked eighth in many preseason league polls.

"To me, it shows that we're blazing new trails," Nee said. "They've been playing basketball for 90 years here, and we're doing it at a time when I think Big Eight basketball is at its peak."

Nebraska, which was hoping for a blowout in front of a sellout crowd of 14,557, settled for a conventional thriller. The Cornhuskers led most of the way, but the 'Cats clawed back after Nebraska opened leads of eight, nine and 12 points, with K-State's final rally providing the most excitement.

The 'Cats sliced a 70-58 deficit to 75-72 on a dunk by Maurice Brittian with 3:23 remaining. After a Nebraska foul, Keith Amerson missed the front end of a one-and-one, and the 'Huskers scored eight of their final 10 points on free throws.

NU 85, 'Cats 78

"A lot of times, it comes down to a big basket or a missed shot," Altman said. "Not that it's Keith's fault. Everybody missed free throws."

Indeed, the 'Cats continued a season-long nasty habit, hitting only 15-of-26 from the line. Eight of the 11 misses came when K-State was within five points of the lead.

"We just can't seem to finish these games off," junior center John Rettiger said. "We always seem to put ourselves in this position."

K-State, playing without suspended forward Wylie Howard, was pleased to have a chance late in the game. The 'Cats got help from a depleted bench, as Marcus Zeigler had 15 points, all on 3-pointers, and Darryl King added 12.

'Cat reserves outscored Nebraska's substitutes 31-27.

"We're asking those players to do an awful lot of things," Altman said.

The Fort Hays State Tigers might have wanted to escape from Manhattan as fast as they could after the shelling they received from K-State Saturday at Frank Myers Field.

K-State improved its record to 3-2 on the year by outscoring the Tigers 39-1 in a doubleheader that saw K-State fans heading to the ballpark for the first time in 1991.

Last week, K-State Coach Mike Clark said he was excited about the weekend series. His team's play Saturday gave him reason for further excitement.

"It got a little out of control, but the reason it got out of control was because we executed real well," Clark said. "I was real happy to see us, after an undisciplined first inning, come back and settle back and wait for our pitch a little better. From that point on I thought we did a real good job."

K-State retired Fort Hays with a 22-1 blowout in the second of the two games Saturday. Sean Pedersen was on the mound for the 'Cats for the first four innings, yielding only five hits while blanking the Tigers in the scoring category.

It was a day that also sent K-State's batting averages soaring. Five Wildcats had homers on the day. In the second game, the Wildcats' most damaging inning came in the third.

K-State scattered five hits, including a two-run round-tripper by Larry Peddy. K-State's lead swelled to a 13-0 margin by the time Fort Hays got itself out of the inning.

K-State almost recorded a double shutout on the day. In the fifth inning of the second game, Matt Smith recorded his third strikeout, but a passed ball allowed the batter to reach first base. Randy Beck followed that with a double to the fence, getting the Tigers' lone RBI on the afternoon.

In the first game, Kent Hipp got the win for K-State. Hipp, now 2-0 on the season, allowed only two Fort Hays hits in four innings of work in the 17-0, five-inning shutout.

K-State got five runs in the second, three in the third and nine in the fourth to round out their scoring. Scott Stroth, Chris Hmielewski, Jeff Ryan and Craig Wilson all had homers in the first game, which had Clark more pleased about K-State's hitting on the day than in Arkansas.

"We made good adjustments. The pitchers weren't as talented as in Arkansas, but they showed us some things we haven't seen in practice," Clark said.

The pitching on the day also made Clark happy. Wildcat pitchers walked only two batters the entire day, and both of those came late in the second game.

"Pitching on the most part was good. We threw strikes," Clark said. "It was a good Saturday of ball. The people we wanted to have at-bats got some at-bats, and we got some people who hadn't played some quality time."

K-State was scheduled to play a doubleheader against Friends University from Wichita on Sunday, but it was called off due to cold weather. The game will probably be rescheduled for early this week.

Cowboys knock off Buffs

STILLWATER, Okla. (AP) — Byron Houston scored 31 points Sunday, including 10 straight in the second half when No. 16 Oklahoma State pulled away to beat Colorado 79-67 and move into a tie for first in the Big Eight Conference.

With the victory, Eddie Sutton joined Bill Foster as the only coach to win 20 games with four schools. Sutton also did it at Creighton, Arkansas and Kentucky.

The victory gave Oklahoma State (20-5 overall, 9-3 in the conference) its first 20-victory season since 1982-83 and only its second in the past 26 years. The Cowboys are tied with Kansas for the conference lead.

Lady Cats send seniors out with 2nd win over KU in '91

TODD FERTIG
Sports Reporter

Though they led by as many as 20 points in the second half against the University of Kansas Saturday, the Lady Cats found themselves looking up at the scoreboard with 2:46 left, wondering where it had all gone.

With their lead reduced to nine at 3:45, the Lady Cats seemed destined to fall once again to the self-defeating tendencies, which cost them four of their last five games. In one minute of play, the Jayhawks ran off seven straight points to cut the Lady Cat lead to 66-64.

First, Terrilyn Johnson, who slithered through the K-State defense to grab 11 offensive rebounds, scored off a Jayhawk miss to chip the lead down to seven.

Shaken by the disappearance of their comfortable advantage, the Lady Cats suddenly stalled. Tanya Bonham intercepted the ensuing inbounds pass for KU and was fouled as she knocked down a jumper from the baseline.

Following Bonham's free-throw, the Jayhawks resumed the full-court pressure. The defense forced Mary Jo Miller to turn the ball over at mid-court, and Johnson converted a layup to cut the lead to two.

The recurring nightmare appeared to be becoming a reality. Desperately in need of a win for seeding purposes in the Big Eight tournament, the Lady Cats seemed to be in the same rut that cost them a shot at the regular-season conference crown.

Playing in their final game in Bramlage Coliseum, however, seniors Diana Miller and Nadira Hazim weren't about to let the contest slip away. Handling the swarming defense, the two combined for 7-of-8 from the line while the Lady Cats held KU scoreless over the final 2½ minutes.

"It's happened so many times this year that we've let it slip away from us, and we just took it into our own hands this time and said 'it's not going to happen tonight,'" Miller said.

Though displeased with the late comeback of the Jayhawks, Yow called the victory crucial to the team's tournament hopes and praised the effort supplied down the stretch.

"When the chips got down, when they cut it to two, I thought we did a real nice job of getting a surge, of coming back and getting refocused," Yow said. "I don't think that you could ever be pleased by the fact that you have a 20-point lead with seven minutes to go and lose the lead."

"I thought that when we went up by 20, we were almost celebrating on the free-throw line. We had a lot of time to go, and I thought we lost our focus offensively. We got very stagnant. But we did regroup, and we did come back and win and that's the bottom line."

The Lady Cats led the entire game and several times extended that lead to double digits. The Jayhawks shot just 32 percent from the field and depended upon offensive rebounds and small spurts to keep from being eliminated.

KU managed 23 offensive rebounds, resulting in several easy baskets. But while the Jayhawks' board-pounding kept them close, Yow called the Lady Cats' effort an improvement over the previous meeting of the two teams. At Lawrence, the KU team outrebounded the Lady Cats 66-36.

Miller finished the contest with 28 points to lead all scorers and tie the K-State all-time scoring mark. A free-throw by Miller at 1:26 left the record tied, but the senior was unable to score again, forcing her to break the mark at the tournament in Salina.

Tennis squad struggles in trio of road matches

TODD FERTIG
Sports Reporter

Playing what Coach Steve Bietau called the toughest road trip in K-State history, the tennis team managed only two wins in the first three days of play through Saturday.

Four days of duals in Utah promised to be difficult for the team, and through the first three days, the team was able to claim just one singles and one doubles match. The team wrapped up the trip against U.C. Santa Barbara in Salt Lake City Sunday. Results from the final day of play were unavailable at press time.

The toughest test of the trip came Thursday in the meeting with BYU in Provo, Utah. One of the nation's top ranked teams, BYU improved to 7-2 on the season by sweeping all nine matches with K-State.

K-State managed to take just one set during the first day. Michele Riniker and Angie Gover won the second set of their match with BYU's No. 1 doubles team, but lost 6-2, 3-6, 6-1.

Riniker fought Evi Koljanin, the top singles player from BYU, to a 7-6 (8-6) loss in the first set of the match before dropping the second 6-3.

The first victory of the weekend came Friday when Rosemary Hunter and Tracy Parker defeated the No. 3 doubles team of UNLV in three sets.

Riniker continued to play well Saturday, claiming her first singles victory of the trip against Utah. Riniker defeated the No. 1 singles player from Utah 6-2, 7-6 (7-2) in what Bietau called the highlight of the season for the team.

Another Top 20 team, Utah got by K-State 8-1.

Win helps to ease tensions

Senior duo takes charge down stretch

BILL LANG
Sports Reporter

If ever there was a must-win game, this surely had to be it.

In a week that saw animosity running rampant through the women's team, K-State used senior leadership and determination to help put an end to a three-game skid by defeating the University of Kansas, 73-64, Saturday night at Bramlage Coliseum.

On Thursday, Lady Cat coach Susan Yow told the media the team's attitude was bad, and a search to solve the problems had ended to no avail. The win against KU, however, may have changed some feelings.

"Maybe this will open some doors," Yow said after the game. "It's been a hard week, but I hope that this will open some doors."

For the game, though, the Lady Cats showed the type of savvy and senior leadership that will be needed in the upcoming Big Eight Tournament.

Several times K-State had a double-digit lead, only to see it evaporate.

"You're never pleased to see a 20-point lead disappear," Yow said. "They just got into a hot streak, hitting a few three-pointers, and we sent them to the line a few times and they got close. But our players regrouped and played tough."

In two of those droughts it was the play of Diana Miller and Nadira Hazim, both making a final home appearance with Kristie Bahner and Sheila Cherry, that lifted the lead to safer margins.

In the first half, Miller scored eight of the Lady Cats' final 12 points to keep K-State in front. In the second half, it was Hazim who took charge.

At the end of the first half, Hazim had only six points. When the final buzzer sounded, she had 25. Hazim connected on four of seven shots and hit 10 of 11 free throws in the second 20 minutes.

"This feels good. It feels so good to finally get a win under our belts," Hazim said of the victory. "It feels good that we could pull together and get a win like this."

Bahner said the thought of losing the game was enough to make sure it didn't happen.

"It's happened quite a few times," she said. "We decided to take it into our own hands, just not let it happen again."

Palmer, Clemens both open training

By the Associated Press

Jim Palmer took his number out of retirement and began his improbable comeback, Roger Clemens shifted numbers for his first spring workout and Dwight Gooden softened his stance Saturday on leaving the New York Mets.

Maury Wills, meanwhile, started his school for speed in the Los Angeles Dodgers' camp. But Cleveland's Keith Hernandez will be out two weeks with a back problem, Cincinnati's Rob Dibble cut short his practice because of a severe sore throat and Floyd Youmans, trying to bounce back with the Chicago White Sox, shut down because of a stiff arm.

Palmer, hoping to revive his Hall of Fame career at age 45, threw for 10 minutes in front of pitching coach Al Jackson in Baltimore's camp at Sarasota, Fla. Palmer wore his familiar No. 22, which the Orioles retired in 1984.

"I'm here to make the ballclub if I can," Palmer said. "If I can't, I hope I have a good influence on the young players. At the very least, as a broadcaster, I'll know the players a lot better."

Manager Frank Robinson, who played with Palmer on the Orioles' World Series winning teams in 1966 and 1970, didn't see the former ace throw.

"There was no sense in watching," Robinson said. "You're not going to judge him on what he did today. The important thing is for the pitching coach to see him and get familiar with him. It was just nice to see him in uniform."

Clemens, in his first workout since signing a $21.5-million contract that made him the highest-paid player in baseball, threw for 10 minutes in Boston's camp at Winter Haven, Fla.

"I almost feel embarrassed to talk about my contract," Clemens said. "I'm happy with it, I'm in the position I want to be and I'm thankful, but I don't think it proper to talk about it with the war going on."

Saying he is not into a "rah, rah situation," Clemens plans to lead by example.

He set that example early, by arriving for his first workout shortly after 7 a.m. Saturday, getting into uniform and running hours before other players had checked into the clubhouse.

"In some cases, maybe we're asking them to do things that they're not capable of doing."

One thing K-State couldn't do was stop Nebraska's Beau Reid. The 'Husker guard had 21 points, seven assists and hit 11-of-13 free throws. He helped Nebraska build a 45-37 lead at intermission with 12 first-half points and hit four free throws in the final two minutes before fouling out.

Reid said the 'Huskers had been paying too much attention to press clippings in recent weeks.

"We've been enjoying it a little too much," Reid said. "I think that's the reason we're not knocking people out any more. It's time to forget what happened and go for the throat."

Nebraska, currently a game back in third place in the Big Eight race, will need some help in the season's final week in its hope for a league crown. The 'Huskers face league-leaders Oklahoma State and Kansas in their final two games.

"The way we look at it is that it's a three-team race and we're in last place," Reid said. "I hope no one thinks we'll win. That just makes our team hungry and we need to be hungry."

K-State will need a near-miracle to avoid sole possession of last place in the conference. The 'Cats must win their remaining games with Missouri and Oklahoma and have the Sooners lose to Colorado on Wednesday.

If that happens, the 'Cats would be seeded seventh in the Big Eight Tournament because of a series sweep of Oklahoma.

"There's still a lot of pride at stake here," Rettiger said. "We've got to believe in something."

the scheduled 800-meter runner on the men's distance medley relay team and helped other team members Adrian Johnson, Todd Trask and David Warders bring home a second-place finish at 10:02.44.

Etheridge rebounded from a failed attempt to capture his second Big Eight Indoor long jump title on Friday to uncork a personal best leap of 52-1¼ in the finals of the triple jump to win the event for the second-straight year.

He did place third in the long jump with a leap of 24-4¼.

The men qualified 10 athletes in seven of Saturday's final running events.

Capriotti said he was a little surprised by the number of qualifiers his team had going into Saturday's finals.

"The men qualified more than I thought they would," he said. Several Wildcat sprinters scored points in their respective events during the weekend.

Among them were All-American Tyrone Watkins (second) in the 600-yard run with a time of 1:10.33 and All-American Corey King (fifth) in the 400-meters with a time of 48.27.

King, Wright, Johnson and Watkins combined to run a time of 3:16.79 to capture fourth place in the 4x400-meter relay.

Thomas Randolph set a new Hearnes Center record in Friday's preliminaries for the 55-meter dash at 6.20. The record was later broken in the finals by Missouri's Yemi Alade'fa.

Randolph finished third in the finals at 6.21 with teammate John Dedrick coming in sixth at 6.35.

The men's distance runners contributed to the point total with a fourth-place finish from Warders in the 5,000-meters (14:18.64) and sixth-place finishes from Jason Goertzen in the mile (4:15.25) and Phil Byrne in the 3,000-meters (8:22.69).

High jumper R.D. Cogswell tied for sixth-place honors by jumping 6-8¼ in that event.

At the completion of the meet Capriotti said although the men had some good performances, he was disappointed in the final outcome.

He said a few people can play a major role in helping the team score points.

"We had a couple of letdowns that cost us second or third in the meet," he said.

MARGARET CLARKIN/Staff

Sophomore R.D. Cogswell jumps to 6-8¼ to tie for sixth place in high jump competition at the Big Eight Indoor Track Meet in the Hearnes Complex Saturday in Columbia, Mo. The K-State men's team placed fourth and the women's squad second in the two-day event.

Group concentrates on human rights

BETSY HIDALGO
Collegian Reporter

The Amnesty International group at K-State informs students about human rights around the world.

Amnesty International is a worldwide organization founded under the United Nations universal declaration of human rights.

"The declaration has 50 clauses, which list fundamental human rights, regardless of the ruling government," said Dave Schmidt, group adviser and associate professor in computer science.

The declaration went into effect in 1948 as a result of the atrocities from World War II, he said.

The declaration's provisions include freedom of worship and speech, and the ability to marry and to own property, Schmidt said.

"Many rock stars are members, such as Bono of U2, Sting and Peter Gabriel," he said. "Also, Bruce Springsteen has participated in many promotional concerts and fund-raisers."

There are international and campus fund-raisers and promotional concerts. The funds are raised by collection of private donations, but Amnesty is not too organized about making money because it is not its main job, Schmidt said.

A promotional concert put on by the campus group last year was so successful there will be another one this year with four or five bands performing somewhere in Aggieville in April.

Most of the money from the fund-raisers funds the Amnesty legal research staff in London. It sends people to monitor world newspapers and other reports of human problems, he said.

"There needs to be outside checking up on other governments other than those politically involved," said Clay Walter, junior in radio/television.

They also write letters to government officials who have violated the U.N. Declaration of Human Rights Act after signing it.

"We write letters to officials and if the case is extreme to the Prisoners of Conscience," said Kristin Vorhies, group coordinator and sophomore in anthropology and sociology.

According to the United Nations, POCs are a people who have been imprisoned unfairly for their beliefs — religious or otherwise. They might be part of a minority that is considered dangerous in a country and put in jail for non-violent crimes, Schmidt said.

"Last winter, Eddie Sulat was arrested along with 25 other farmers in the Philippines for allegedly plotting a conspiracy against the government," Vorhies said. "It was amazing that after about six months of writing to the officials, he was released. Most cases take longer, even 12 years."

Sulat was considered to be an Urgent Action case because the Amnesty researchers did not have enough time to thoroughly research him in order to call him a POC, Vorhies said.

The Amnesty group on campus has released eight POCs during that time, Schmidt said.

"We have received letters back from the prisoners that said our letters have made a difference in gaining their freedom," he said.

Amnesty members are currently writing to officials who have imprisoned ethnic minorities arrested for participating in a public demonstration in Turkey.

"Amnesty International was awarded the Nobel Peace Prize in 1977, so we must be doing something right," Vorhies said.

Workshop discusses solutions for problems of environment

Possibility of ecological utopia discussed by participants

JENNIFER HOFFMAN
Collegian Reporter

The development of an ecological utopia, an ecotopia, was the topic of an environmental workshop Saturday at St. Isadore's Church.

The workshop began with slides of beautiful natural things such as a sunset, a rainbow, children playing in water and a bird protecting its eggs.

The next set of slides were of tires piled high, trash and oil in the water, smog in the cities, men in suits testing the ground for toxic waste and traffic jams.

"You can choose any world you want, but you have to have a heavy trade-off," said Twyla Dell, president of the Foresight Institute and speaker at the workshop. "Right now we have both of these worlds, but the bad world is getting bigger."

The group envisioned an ecotopia for the year 2020. The dreams included the development of a solar-powered mass-transit system to replace individual automobiles, addressing the problems of homelessness and poverty, establishing strong community values and having an environmental awareness in all curricula.

Twelve major environmental issues the workshop focused on were solid waste, hazardous waste, the Greenhouse Effect, species loss, water quality, wetlands loss, acid rain, pesticides, unsustainable food supply, deforestation, energy and the ozone hole.

"Out of these 12 issues, the ozone hole and energy are the top problems," Dell said. "Once these problems are solved, then the others will also be solved."

An overriding issue not discussed is the increasing population, she said. At the present rate, the Earth's population will double from five billion to 10 billion in a decade, she said.

"We need to look toward the highest standard of environmental problems," Dell said. "In order to do this, we need to follow the principles of foresight by restoring, protecting, conserving and enhancing the quality of all life with whom we share this globe."

The workshop then broke into two groups to discuss ideas for bringing the community together and strengthening environmental education.

We need to go beyond Earth Day and bring education into our lives for more than one day.

—Twyla Dell
Foresight Institute president and workshop president

The community togetherness suggestions included starting an alternative transportation day, a hunger awareness day and a tree-planting campaign.

The environment education committee suggested incorporating environmental education into all curricula, developing a core curriculum environmental class and increasing access to books about the environment.

Dell said environmental people need to do more than talk about the environment.

"We need to go beyond Earth Day and bring education into our lives for more than one day," Dell said.

Jonathan Morris, junior in mathematics and president of S.A.V.E., said environmentally aware people should act as a resource in educating the public.

"It's very important to take advantage of what you know as an individual and share this information with your friends," he said.

Dell is a professional speaker and author on environmental issues. She conducts more than 100 seminars a year throughout the nation. She founded the Foresight Institute in 1989, and is dedicated to healing our Earth.

"When you show people what to do, they will do it, and that's why I conduct these seminars," Dell said.

Campus police interrupt chalking

ERWIN SEBA
Staff Reporter

K-State police officers stopped a group of protesters as they were writing an anti-war message in chalk Monday night on the sidewalk west of Farrell Library.

Sgt. Jim Lehne, 3 p.m.-midnight shift supervisor for the campus police, said the protesters failed to comply with University regulations requiring them to fill out a request for space permit before writing in chalk on the sidewalk.

Wendy Herdman, senior in theater and group member, said the police were suppressing free expression.

"I believe the University is trying to crack down on any student activism on any issue," Herdman said.

Herdman also said she did not think University regulations required groups to obtain permits because she had contacted University Division of Facilities before writing chalk messages for BrotherPeace Week.

At that time, Herdman said, a woman, whose name she could not remember, at Facilities told her the office would like a permit to be filled out before a group writes in chalk on a sidewalk, but it is not required.

After writing in chalk on a sidewalk for the BrotherPeace Week, Herdman was then told she needed to fill out a permit by a University official.

Lehne said the police were not suppressing the group's right to free expression but were just enforcing University regulations.

"No, we don't care (what groups write)," he said. "Have you ever dealt with Facilities? Have you ever seen their bills?"

Lehne said names were taken from the group members in case they are required to clean up the sidewalks or pay for clean-up.

Suzie Wilson, secretary for Student Governing Services, said all groups, like candidates for Student Senate, are required to fill out request for space permits with Facilities. The permits assure the sidewalk messages will be respected and not cleaned up as graffiti by facilities crews.

Herdman also said she had not filled out a permit because it would involve going to Dykstra Hall as well as finding a faculty sponsor for the group.

Scud missile hits U.S. barracks

By the Associated Press

DHAHRAN, Saudi Arabia—The American war machine, pushing deeper into Iraq and Kuwait, clashed Monday with the elite Iraqi Republican Guard. Hours later, Baghdad surprised the world by announcing it had ordered its troops to withdraw from occupied Kuwait.

The Iraqis, reeling before the advance of the U.S.-led alliance, struck back with a Scud missile attack on a U.S. barracks. Twelve servicemen were killed, 25 were wounded and 40 were unaccounted for, the U.S. military said.

The Baghdad radio announcement of a Kuwait pullout did not specify a timetable, and it threw the diplomatic-military picture into confusion.

But it appeared the Iraqis would be attempting a retreat under American fire.

"Our armed forces have completed their duty of jihad," or holy war, the radio said.

The radio said Saddam Hussein ordered the withdrawal in line with a Soviet peace plan. A Soviet plan was rejected last week by Washington, but the Soviets presented undisclosed new proposals Monday at a closed meeting of the United Nations in New York.

In Washington, White House officials responded icily to the Baghdad announcement.

White House spokesman Marlin Fitzwater told reporters Monday night that allied forces "will not attack unarmed soldiers in retreat but we will consider retreating combat units as a movement of war."

Fitzwater said there was no evidence to suggest the Baghdad radio report was a genuine peace offer.

The war went well for Desert Storm forces Monday, as they smashed scores of Iraqi tanks and captured thousands more prisoners, the U.S. command reported. Military officials said American units were having tremendous success in their first battle with the Republican Guard.

Before the Scud attack, the command reported U.S. losses so far as light. It also reported the loss of four U.S. aircraft, three of whose pilots were rescued.

The command said 18,000 Iraqi troops were taken prisoner in the first two days of the all-out ground offensive.

Marines and U.S. paratroopers tightened their position around Kuwait City. One U.S. official said "it's going to be a while" before the Americans or allied Arab troops fight house to house to retake the capital.

Saudi commander Lt. Gen. Khalid bin Sultan said the Iraqis continued a reported terror campaign of rape, murder and torture in the city, and warned they would be held responsible before an international court.

In Washington, President Bush, continuously updated by his generals on the progress of the war, told a White House audience the campaign is on schedule.

In Baghdad, military communiques claimed triumphs for Iraq's troops.

The ruling party's newspaper urged Iraqi soldiers to "strike with all your force to salvage the nation from the abyss of slavery."

Marine Brig. Gen. Richard Neal, a U.S. command spokesman, characterized Iraqi resistance Monday as light to moderate.

Neal said 270 Iraqi tanks had been destroyed in the operation's first two days, including 35 of the top-line T-72s, the Republican Guard's main battle weapon.

The Marines engaged an Iraqi armored and mechanized infantry force in Kuwait late Monday morning and destroyed 50 to 60 tanks, Neal said.

Foreign-speaking teachers grow in numbers

SAC proposes higher English competency standards for GTAs

CHRISSY VENDEL
Collegian Reporter

The English competency of foreign-speaking graduate teaching assistants determines their ability to advise students and answer questions.

The Student Advisory Committee, which is made up of the student body presidents of Kansas Board of Regents' schools, proposed higher standards of English competency for all GTAs at the regents' February meeting.

The SAC suggested raising the minimum score on the test of spoken English for instructors from 220 to 240, and shortening the probation period for those who do not receive the minimum score from one year to one semester. Including students in instructor evaluations and interviews was also suggested.

Todd Heitschmidt, K-State student body president, said SAC is trying to give helpful suggestions.

"This is not the final answer, and we realize that," he said. "We want the problem to be recognized so we can work with everyone involved to find the best match for a solution."

Mike Schreiner, University of Kansas student body president, agreed.

"If we don't use the SAC-proposed solution, fine," he said. "This is a step in the right direction though, and eventually, we'll come up with an all-encompassing solution."

The implementation of a solution would require funding, which could pose a problem. SAC has not dealt with the funding issue yet, Schreiner said.

"I do not participate in the allocation of budgets," he said. "That is up to the paid administration and the regents."

Schreiner said there was another reason for the proposals — consistency. KU has different standards for non-native instructors, and the SAC's proposals are modeled after them.

"We'd like to upgrade all the regent institutions to KU's standards," he said. "The main difference is KU has a higher standard for the spoken English test and more mechanisms in place for administration to handle problems with language competency."

One of the mechanisms is a questionnaire students must fill out when dropping a course, he said. One of the questions asks if the withdrawal is because of the inability to understand the instructor.

Although no results have been turned in yet, Schreiner said he believes this is a better way to ascertain the magnitude of the problem.

K-State President Jon Wefald said he is keeping an open mind on the issue.

"First, the proposals need to be reviewed by the Committee of Chief Academic Officers," he said. "I can't give an opinion until I see its recommendation, because I don't know exactly what the proposals are."

As the proposals are being studied, Heitschmidt said there is a barrier in knowing how prevalent the problem is. It may be difficult for students to complain about an instructor's performance, because they may feel their problems are their own fault.

"In high school you had to put up with what you got as far as teachers were concerned," he said. "After 12 years of that, the freshmen and sophomores come up here and don't realize we do have grievance procedures."

The problem may be more prevalent for freshmen and sophomores, since the majority of foreign-speaking instructors are GTAs who teach entry-level math and science courses, Heitschmidt said.

"We want student retention, and a solution to this problem is our best shot because students can get very discouraged," he said.

SAC's proposal also concerns how department heads handle complaints regarding the language skills of GTAs.

"Student evaluations aren't given enough weight regarding an instructor's tenure and promotion, and we also want to change the way they are administered," Heitschmidt said.

There should be a standard paragraph in the evaluation, and some standard questions on every evaluation across campus so comparisons can be made, he said.

Domestic students shun assistant positions in math departments for better rewards

CHRISSY VENDEL
Collegian Reporter

Only about 5 percent of the applicants for graduate teaching assistant positions in the math department are English-speaking students.

David Surowski, professor of mathematics and adviser to Chinese students, said fewer than 50 percent of the math department's GTAs were foreign students in the 1980s. Today, more than 60 percent are foreign students.

"Good domestic students would rather pursue a career in industry to make more money, or be on the ground floor of what they consider a fundamental project," he said.

One explanation for the trend of increasing foreign GTA applications and decreasing domestic applications is too few domestic students feel hard sciences are sufficiently rewarding financially or intellectually, Surowski said.

"They don't feel they can contribute anything," he said. "That's an unfortunate attitude and is a function of living in a developed country."

Students from underdeveloped countries see big opportunities in the hard sciences and feel they can make a real contribution, Surowski said.

A problem arises when students complain they do not understand foreign instructors. The Students Advisory Committee, a committee comprised of the student body presidents of Kansas Board of Regents' schools, complained about the problem to the regents this month.

The committee is making some proposals to raise the English-competency criteria for foreign students to be accepted as GTAs at regents institutions.

I don't want the regents to say, 'Let's solve the problem. We'll raise the score of the test from 220 to 240' and consider the problem solved. Simply raising the standard would have immediate and adverse effects on staffing basic service courses in mathematics, as well as all other hard sciences.

—David Surowski
Professor of mathematics

"I don't want the regents to say, 'Let's solve the problem. We'll raise the score of the test from 220 to 240' and consider the problem solved," Surowski said.

"Simply raising the standard would have immediate and adverse effects on staffing basic service courses in mathematics, as well as all other hard sciences," he said.

"The whole issue here is funding," he said. "If they are going to address the problem seriously, they are going to have to pay for it."

Penn State University is a model for GTA training programs, Surowski said.

"They don't let foreign GTAs teach their first year no matter what their skills are," he said. "This gives the students a chance to assimilate some knowledge of the American educational system."

This is not a viable solution for K-State, because the resources appear to be lacking, Surowski said.

Larry Davis, professor of biochemistry, said the problem is also the nativist attitude of Kansans.

"There are a lot of instructors from different areas of the United States that may speak with strange accents, yet they are not tested with an English skills test," Davis said. "It worries me that we apply some standard to international accents when national accents may not be that different."

There may be some difficulties in understanding, but we must consider the alternatives, Davis said.

In a university with a large number of students in introductory chemistry and biology courses, finding competent Americans to work for what they will be paid is difficult, Davis said.

"Either we depend on foreign students, or we don't offer the classes and labs. It's that simple," he said.

Birmingham Six falsely convicted

LONDON (AP) — For a third time in less than two years, British prosecutors have admitted that people who served long prison sentences for Irish Republican Army crimes were convicted on insufficient evidence.

A prosecutor told the Court of Appeal Feb. 25 he no longer could support the convictions of six men in the bombings of two Birmingham pubs Nov. 21, 1974, which killed 21 people and wounded 162.

Although a decision on the case will be left until a Court of Appeal hearing March 4, jubilant supporters of the Birmingham Six said they believe they will be free soon.

Johnny Walker, Patrick Hill, Richard McIlkenny, Gerry Hunter, Billy Power and Callaghan were convicted in 1975 and sentenced to life in prison.

Prime Minister Charles Haughey of Ireland said in Dublin: "We are now witnessing the end of an injustice."

Astronauts prepare for long shift

SPACE CENTER, Houston (AP) — Astronauts slated for the overnight shift on the next space shuttle flight will spend the week before launch staying up all night and squinting under bright lights in an all-white room.

Doctors believe the treatment will help the men adjust to the irregular sleep cycles demanded by Discovery's round-the-clock, military mission.

The new technique, aimed at tricking the body into resetting its internal clock, worked wonders for the last space shuttle crew. The four Columbia astronauts reported feeling rested and alert throughout the taxing mission in December in spite of their odd hours.

Finney administration defends plan

TOPEKA (AP) — Some legislators were skeptical Monday, and special interest groups appeared ready to unleash a barrage of criticism, as Gov. Joan Finney's administration attempted to defend her tax plan.

Revenue Secretary Mark Beshears outlined Finney's plan to raise $786.1 million, most of it for property tax relief, by increasing the number of items subject to the state's 4.25 percent sales tax. He spoke during the first of three days of hearings scheduled before the House Taxation Committee.

A House subcommittee already has rejected large parts of the plan, but Beshears defended the philosophy behind it. He said Finney wants to make the sales tax a fairer tax and to provide significant property tax relief.

"These are tough times, and they call for tough decisions," Beshears told the committee.

Finney has said she will be flexible in considering financing sources for tax relief.

3 teenagers flee from Youth Center

TOPEKA (AP) — Three teenagers, including one detained for aggravated battery, escaped from the Youth Center, apparently by scaling an 18-foot fence touted as unclimbable, officials said.

The three escaped from a high-security cottage Sunday evening by kicking out windows in their private rooms and scaling the fence, Harry Allen, superintendent of the youth center, said Monday.

The breakout was the first since the center installed the new fence a year ago, Allen said. Former Gov. Mike Hayden had ordered the fence installed after four escapees raped and robbed a Topeka woman.

"The fence does a good job," he said. "But these kids are very strong and determined. Where there's a will there's a way."

A search of the center's grounds Monday failed to find the teens, Allen said.

Two of the escapees had been convicted of theft or burglary offenses, he said.

Task force to report on evaluations

The K-State chapter of the American Association of University Professors is scheduled to hear a report on faculty evaluation at 11:55 a.m. today in the K-State Union 212, said Leo Schell, professor of elementary education and president of the AAUP chapter.

The report to AAUP will be made by members of a task force that studied the faculty evaluation system for a year and reported their findings to Faculty Senate in December, Schell said.

Faculty Senate adopted the report, but it has not become University policy, he said. The report calls for systematizing the process for merit evaluations, tenure and promotion of faculty.

Discussion to feature Conoco adviser

William Metzger, senior adviser of exploration and production for Conoco-North American, based in Casper, Wyo., will give a presentation to K-State faculty and students at 4:00 p.m. this afternoon in Thompson 213.

James Underwood, professor of geology, said the topic of discussion is "The Petroleum Industry: Past, Present and Future."

The presentation will last about 40 minutes and will be followed with a question-and-answer period.

Candidates face today's primary

A slate of seven candidates running for Manhattan City Commission will be narrowed to six in today's primary election.

The 26 poll locations in Manhattan will open at 7 a.m. and close at 7 p.m., said Ilene Colbert, Riley County clerk.

To vote, she said, a person must have registered 15 days prior to the election and be a Manhattan resident.

Only students living off campus are eligible to vote because the University is not part of the city, Colbert said.

Martha Scott, Manhattan city clerk, said there are three commission seats available.

Scott said the candidates in the election are Roger Maughmer, Helen Cooper, James DuBois, Linda Ferguson, Stanley Crowder, Edith Stunkel and Craig Raborn, junior in geography.

Spouses continue daily routine, listen to updates on ground war

DAVID FRESE
Staff Reporter

Spouses of Fort Riley soldiers are holding hands a little tighter now that the ground war has begun.

Pearl Speer, family support group coordinator for the Fort Riley family assistance center, said spouses at the center are going on with their lives, but are also keeping an ear to the news.

"Things haven't changed that much," Speer said. "As far as the family assistance center goes we have had a few more phone calls, but not that many more. Over the weekend we had a few more people come to visit the center, but for the most part people seem to be going on."

The family assistance center has set up a multi-layered chain of support that begins with one-on-one phone contacts between spouses and leads all the way up to entire brigade meetings of spouses.

Speer said it is a chance for spouses to get to know each other and have someone, and in some cases several someones, to talk with.

For the most part, people are feeling a sense of relief, Speer said, that something is finally happening. But the waiting game has only begun. Speer said it was too early in the game for people to get too worried.

"We're only a few hours into this conflict and it's going to take a while for any information to come out at all," she said. "We all need patience."

While the U.S. news blackout, which is reminiscent of censorship imposed by China during the Tiananmen Square incident and the Soviet Union during the Chernobyl nuclear reactor accident, has slowed the information coming out of the gulf, spouses are not angered by it.

See related story/Page 7

"I don't think people really feel a lack of information," she said. "There are probably a few people that are frustrated by the blackout, but I think you'll probably find more people who are relieved that they have cut down on the amount of information coming out because their spouses' lives are at stake."

Speer said many of the spouses think the amount of information broadcast to the world was getting into the hands of the enemy. And the time for that open flow of information is over.

"It's now time for the military to get in there and do it without the mission being broadcast to everybody," Speer said. "I perceive that a majority of wives feel that way. If our knowing where the division is would lead the enemy to knowing where it is then it would be better off not knowing."

Speer said many spouses feel what information coming out of the operation is accurate, including reports that the operation is going extremely well and reports that the amount of casualties is lower than expected.

"They have no reason not to believe them," she said. "Besides that's what they want to hear."

Student studies for semester in Canada

ANNE TATUM
Collegian Reporter

Canada's flag hangs neatly over her bed. She said the big, bright red and white cloth brings memories back every time she glances up at it.

Last semester Beth Karpowich, senior in marketing, spent Sept. 3 to Dec. 21 in Calgary, Alberta, Canada, at the University of Calgary.

Many thoughts entered her mind before departing for her trip. She was excited, scared and a bit apprehensive.

"I was worried about the people," she said. "Worried we wouldn't get along and really scared that I wouldn't be able to adapt."

Karpowich found the people to be very open and more ready to talk — friendlier than in the United States. She adjusted to her new surroundings in two days.

The trip was sponsored by the International Student Exchange Program, a national organization based in Washington, D.C., with a program at K-State run by Walter Kolonosky, associate professor of modern languages and director of Study Abroad.

Kolonosky helped organize the program in 1982. Since then, the program has become No. 3 out of 100 schools that participate in the United States for the number of students accepted each year. Every student at K-State who applied to go on the exchange for the 1990-91 school year was accepted.

When students go on the exchange, they pay their home institutions room and board and tuition. So, although Karpowich stayed in an apartment-like dorm in Calgary, she still paid K-State tuition and her sorority housebill.

Karpowich was the only student this year who went in the fall. Kolonosky said it is generally easier to get accepted for a full year.

She said she applied in December of 1989 and was accepted in March. Students must first fill out an application and get two letters of recommendation. Those are reviewed by Kolonosky first, and then they are sent to Washington, D.C., for final approval.

Kolonosky said he stresses to students that a competitive grade point average is critical and a working knowledge of the country's native language, if it's not English, is a must.

"Many students who go on the exchange know the country's language and find that it is easier to get along. However, I have had students who go and don't know any of the language and do all right also. But, I think it is easier to have a working knowledge of the language," he said. "I encourage four semesters of a foreign language before going to a country where English is not spoken everywhere."

Karpowich did not have to worry about learning another language, since English is spoken in Calgary.

About 100 universities and colleges participate in Africa, Asia, Canada, Latin America and Europe.

Students make three site choices on their applications. Kolonosky said the first or second choice is usually given. Karpowich got her first choice.

She said she chose the University of Calgary because she likes Canada and because its marketing department fit her needs. She took 15 hours of classes, all of which were upper level marketing classes.

"Students look at where their academic interests are when choosing a site. All the universities and colleges that participate are on microfiche in the library. Background about the school and all of its majors are included," Kolonosky said.

Karpowich said her friends in Calgary seemed more interested in studying first and playing second.

"My group of friends there had a different outlook. Studying came first and recreation came after that," she said. "We'd go out either Friday or Saturday night and study the other nights."

Some of the activities that Karpowich said she misses is skating on the Olympic Oval and Plaza and walking down to one of the three campus bars in her slippers to grab a beer.

Kolonosky said with 100 schools to choose from, there is one for everyone.

"It's a marvelous experience," he said. "I enjoy doing it."

Building repairs require time, effort

Division of Facilities maintains campus despite understaffing problem

ERIN BURKE
Collegian Reporter

Buildings on campus are used year-round, but few people stop to consider the time and effort put into maintenance.

An average of 10 minor repairs are reported to K-State Division of Facilities every day, said Joel McGill, requirements analyst.

Facilities handles everything from minor repair requests to major operations such as the steam tunnel renovation recently completed, said Ed Rice, assistant vice president of Facilities.

The Anderson Administration allocates $13.8 million to Facilities yearly. That covers items such as utilities, salaries and cost of needed materials for repairs, Rice said.

The Kansas Board of Regents gives Facilities additional money when building space is increased, he said.

Building inspections are given by the fire marshal and the department of safety once a year. Facilities performs regular inventories to ensure items such as fire alarms and extinguishers are in working order, Rice said.

For new buildings, an inspector is hired during construction to ensure proper building codes, he said.

"We have a very good staff and excellent workers," Rice said.

About 300 people are employed by Facilities, but more workers are needed to keep up with the work on campus, Rice said.

Understaffing is especially a problem when a major operation is underway. There aren't enough people to do routine maintenance, he said.

One project is the additional lighting in the Union parking lot, which will be partially funded by collected parking fees. The bases have been set, but the project is at a standstill until the light poles arrive, Rice said.

Difficult areas to maintain include the high-technology buildings, such as the Chemistry/Biochemistry Building.

"People aren't always trained for this," said Rice.

Rice said that even though it is expensive, employees must receive specialized training in order to make the needed repairs.

"I try to get our people as up-to-date as possible on what they're working on," Rice said.

Legislators debate pension

Representatives look at plan, begin adjustment proposals

RYAN HAYTER
Collegian reporter

A controversial pension plan for Kansas legislators passed in 1988 is being debated again this session.

The Senate and both parties of the House of Representatives are starting proposals for adjustments in the pension.

Currently, the plan gives legislators extra benefits by placing them in a special class in the Kansas Public Employee Retirement System at the cost of $400,000 per year.

Rep. Sheila Hochhauser, D-Manhattan, testified in favor of the repeal during the Pensions and Benefits Sub-committee hearings on Feb. 20.

In 1989, Hochhauser introduced constitutional legislation to repeal the special classifications of the pension plan. The proposal failed to pass in the House that year.

"There was not enough interest then," she said. "More members of the House are under fire now to vote in favor of the repeal."

She said most people in favor of keeping the special benefits are close to retirement.

"If the repeal of special classifications passes, it will not be effective until the next term," Hochhauser said. "But legislators will have the option to revoke their special classifications now."

Rep. Kent Glasscock, R-Manhattan, agreed the plan should be repealed.

"The current plan makes a distinction by setting up an enriched plan of benefits for legislators, which is better than the plan for other state employees," he said.

"We are going to try and force a roll call vote," he said. "This will force legislators to fess up and vote the right way."

Teaching role works both ways for coach

When, as they often do, people ask me why I am the way I am, I usually tell them it's because of my junior high football coach. Once, I was late to practice because of some minor misbehavior (I think I had started a fire in a trash can), and he made me run laps. Twenty-three laps later, oxygen deprivation set in, and brain damage resulted.

However, before I lost most of my gray matter, I made myself a promise. I swore that one day I would coach and be the best, most understanding coach the world had ever known. The type of coach that would not only win state and national titles, but would also be very sympathetic if, by some uncontrollable urge, one of his athletes started a small, harmless fire in a school hallway.

So, to make a long story short, I found myself with a job as assistant wrestling coach in a local high school. I was ready. I had the wisdom to propel these youths who had hope for the future headfirst into this great big world. If I found any matches on them, I had a lecture ready. Coach Bruce had all the answers.

At least I did for the first five minutes of practice. Then one of the wrestlers decided he had gas and just had to share it with the rest of us. Not to be outdone by a sophomore, a junior decided to do the same thing. Then the seniors on the team decided to show everyone who the bosses were. I stood there like an idiot, whistle in hand, wondering what the hell to do. The wrestlers were too busy giggling to hear anything I would have said anyway.

Luckily, despite the gas problem, a doctor's examination of the team turned up no serious medical problems. The team's psychological workup suggested committing about half the team and sending the rest in for weekly outpatient sessions. We couldn't do it though. We had tournaments coming up.

So practice continued. It was still a challenge. Most of my attempts to teach wrestling skills were met by jokes about my being overweight. For instance, I would say, "Today I'm going to teach you the drag series." The wrestlers would respond with something like, "Did you learn it in a doughnut shop Coach Bruce?" Then they would start giggling again.

So, needless to say, it came as a surprise, when miracle of miracles, our season turned out to be pretty successful. I guess all the years in doughnut shops paid off. We completed the season with an 11-1 record in dual action and claimed a regional title. Although our performance at the state tournament last weekend was a little disappointing, we did have one wrestler take second place.

So now that it's over I find myself looking back on where I succeeded and where I failed. Somehow my hope of these wrestlers finding a solution to the problem of world hunger was replaced by the hope that they would remember to bring their wrestling shoes when we had "away" matches. Sometimes, my hopes were dashed.

Any attempt to expose them to the finer aspects of culture also met with failure. Basically, they saw Andrew Dice Clay as "the coolest dude ever." 2 Live Crew was the music of choice, although there was a large country music contingent that saw Garth Brooks on the same level as the "Diceman." Needless to say, I sometimes worry about the future of this country.

Shawn Bruce

I was once listening to Nanci Griffith on a trip and had one of the kids ask (in that subtle way only high school kids have), "What is that crap?" After telling them the whole story about Griffith and her songs, they responded by saying "Did you get the tape at the doughnut shop?" Then, you guessed it, they giggled.

But, in between all the doughnut jokes, there actually were moments that made me realize why I was there. It wasn't just the glory which goes along with winning (although I enjoyed that very much), but a feeling that sometimes I was actually getting through to these kids. They would listen to my stories about college life and ask me questions. They would usually listen to my long-winded stories (storytelling being a necessary skill) about this and that with, if not politeness, then at least feigned interest. In other words, the same exact thing I used to do to my coaches.

The bottom line is, I recognized something in these kids I also see in myself. Mixed in with all the wisecracks and the bravado was a fear that maybe they weren't good enough. The most obvious manifestation occurred when they would lose an actual wrestling match, but the fear trickled down into their everyday lives, too. They feared trying new techniques. Sometimes, the words used the most at practice were "I can't."

I sympathized with them, so much in fact, I was sometimes more of a cheerleader than a coach. I tried to convince them they were good wrestlers, good students and good kids. I didn't always succeed. We lost some kids over the course of the year, and I always wish I would have said one more kind word to them. Maybe that would have made the difference.

Last weekend at state, one of our kids wrestled a poor match — very poor. So poor in fact, I thought seriously about disowning him and making him find his own ride back home.

But thirty minutes later, I cooled down and went looking for the kid. When I saw him, I immediately felt bad for ever being angry at him. Written all over the kid's face was a look that said, "I'm worthless."

I took him outside for a walk. I tried to make him realize that, in the end, the only thing that matters is whether or not you believe in yourself.

He gave me a little bit of an act by saying, "I could have won this tournament, but I'm just tired of it and want it to be over." I let him talk. Maybe I learned something this season also.

He won one more match and then lost to finish out his season and high school wrestling career. I felt kind of bad. He was laughing and joking like it was no big deal, but I knew, in his heart, he knew it was over. Sometimes that's a tough thing to deal with.

And I felt as bad as he did. Somewhere, I should have taught him and all the others about the end. The only problem is I haven't figured it out myself. I sat there in my chair at the coliseum feeling like a fraud. I had taught reverses and takedowns, but in reality, I hadn't taught them a damn thing they could really use.

But, I was wrong. On his way out of the arena, the kid came up to me and stuck out his hand for the super-secret wrestling handshake. I took his hand and he said, "Thanks, Coach. For everything."

So maybe that's what it's all about. Somewhere he had realized that despite the coaching shorts and the whistle, I didn't have all the answers to his questions. He had to search them out for himself.

I think he'll find them. He's already taught me the answers to some of mine.

Kansas needs budget plan now

Legislators met Wednesday in response to Gov. Joan Finney's plan to raise $786.1 million in tax revenue for property tax relief and additional state spending. Both Democrats and Republicans agreed they didn't like it, but they didn't offer an alternative solution.

Legislators also got a look at the possible ramifications of a budget without a tax boost. In short, it won't work.

If taxes are not increased, next year's budget would decrease by at least $10 million and possibly $2.5 billion, and social and educational programs considered vital would face devastating cuts.

The "budget reality," so termed by House Speaker Marvin Barkis, is that 3,500 elderly Kansans could be forced out of nursing homes, 6,000 poor Kansans could be dropped from welfare rolls and school aid would be left at a standstill.

Failure to increase educational spending would result in property tax increases in some districts in order to cover the costs of increased enrollment and teacher contracts.

In some areas, spending increases are required by law and would cause the state balances to fall below $100 million, which is $24 million less than required to comply with ending balance provisions of the budget law enacted last session.

Cutting back on social and educational programs only increases the number of people the state will have to support in the future. It makes it more difficult to offer them the education and assistance necessary to escape poverty.

Legislators need to make the tough decisions. Finney has admitted her tax proposal may not be the best one, but she has also promised to work with the legislators to come up with the best plan.

Any alternative legislators proposed would be a step in the right direction. It would force legislators to do something besides shun Finney's own proposal.

A budget without a tax increase won't work, and it is the Legislature's job to find out what will. More importantly, the legislators must offer a budget that will work now.

Another perspective

President Bush has encountered few obstacles in his escalating game with Saddam Hussein.

Iraq invades Kuwait? No problem. Make it look like Saddam wants Saudi Arabia, too. Send American troops to the desert. Draw a line in the sand.

A U.S. attack looks like naked aggression unless it has worldwide support? No problem. Woo the international community, including former outcasts such as China, into giving the United States and its allies a blank check, a United Nations' resolution.

The U.S. economy, heading into a recession, can't support an indefinite commitment of troops? No problem. Assign an arbitrary deadline, Jan. 15, to the resolution.

But now there's another, more subtle stumbling block to the realization of Bush's war aims. A preemptive peace agreement threatens the future stability of the Middle East.

That's unfortunate, but necessary. Wars that trudge to an indefinite standstill only cause more wars. Bush is right in rejecting a conditional armistice now.

Senioritis natural to all students

I can't lie to you here. I'm bored. B-O-R-E-D. Bored. It's tragic, but it's true. Oh, it isn't that I have nothing to do. No, it certainly isn't that.

If nothing else, I have a test tomorrow I certainly should be studying for. My apartment is a pit, and I'm sure none of my roommates would mind if I was suddenly inspired to empty the dishwasher. I could also lean over and pick up some of the clothes on the floor surrounding my chair, or with even less effort, I could shove all the papers on my desk into a semi-ordered pile. The trouble is, I haven't got anything to do that I want to do.

I guess it's time to face up to it. I've got a bad case of "senioritis." Everything points to it, and why fight it? It's not fatal, and it makes a great catch-all excuse.

How do I know if "senioritis" is my problem? How can I tell it's not a massive brain tumor or a mundane case of simple laziness? How can you tell if you yourself might also be suffering from this horrible disease that attacks persons of all ages? To find out if you're at risk or perhaps already showing symptoms, just take this simple self-test:

1.) Do you find you know the entire afternoon TV schedule by heart, especially regarding when and where you can watch "Tiny Toons" and "Teenage Mutant Ninja Turtles?" (4 p.m. and 4:30 p.m. respectively on channel 29)

2.) Are you starting to wonder if it might be time to buy books?

3.) Do you find yourself, before certain classes, trying to remember exactly which classroom you're going to?

4.) Can you discuss in detail the lives of the characters on any of the following TV programs: "The Simpsons," "thirtysomething," "Knots Landing," "L.A. Law," "Doogie Howser, M.D." or "Teenage Mutant Ninja Turtles?"

5.) Can your roommates distract you from studying or going to class by proposing such activities as going for a walk, guessing the weight of the guys upstairs by listening to their footsteps or seeing who has the most bellybutton lint?

6.) Do bouncers and bartenders in Aggieville call you by name?

7.) Have you forgotten what it's like to

Karin Dell'Antonia
Collegian Columnist

spend an entire day on campus without a Collegian crossword?

8.) Would it come as a surprise to you to discover that your classes meet more than once a week?

9.) While in class, do you find yourself trying to use the remote control on the lecturer?

10.) Do you find yourself spending a lot of time just sitting and thinking, you know, sitting and thinking about nothing, and then suddenly you wake up?

11.) Do Wednesdays feel like Fridays?

12.) Do you know exactly how many hours and minutes are left until spring break? (318 hours as of noon today) 13.) Do you frequently head to campus with every intention of going to class, but somehow sort of find yourself doing a Union lab instead?

14.) Does it seem somehow better to you to skip a class because you're in the Union than because you're at home, because you're at least on campus?

15.) Do you own so many K-State sports/clubs/fraternity sweatshirts you'll never have to buy anything to mow the lawn in as long as you live?

16.) Do you know exactly how many pair of underwear you have — in other words, how many weeks and days you can go without doing laundry?

17.) Does your notebook spend the entire weekend in your backpack?

18.) Do you sleep better in a classroom than in your bedroom?

19.) Do you find yourself saying "D for Diploma" and meaning it?

20.) Is it always either too gorgeous or too cold to go to class?

Now score yourself! It's easy and fun. Just add up all the times you answered yes to the above questions, then see where you fit into the categories below.

1-5 "yes" answers: Not only don't you have senioritis, but you may be immune. Buddy, either you're a freshman or you're taking it all way too seriously. As the ideal student, you could probably locate each and every one of the syllabi your teachers gave you on the first day of class — and not because they never left your backpack. You may be the perfect person, but only your mother will like you better for that. You're young! Life's sweet; start eatin' it up. (Yes, I watch way too much television.)

6-10 "yes" answers: Showing early symptoms at about the sophomore level. You are well on your way to getting a life. You should watch yourself closely to see if these symptoms develop, because people in this category are particularly susceptible to "Tuttle senioritis," a strain of the disease that becomes rampant in warmer weather. The only cure is a bad sunburn obtained at the rocks.

11-15 "yes" answers: You have a very healthy level of senioritis. Blessed with the ability not to take life too seriously, you will never be prone to stress-related diseases. Take care, however, that the disease does not progress. The two biggest causes of people getting fired are absenteeism and tardiness. Fortunately, (?) K-State isn't paying you anything.

16-20 "yes" responses: Get your schedule. Locate your classes. It may not be too late. Set reasonable goals for yourself. Attend all your classes at least once a week. Try to at least be aware of the possibility of tests. Remember, you may be in college, but that isn't a guarantee you won't end up in a broken-down trailer home with a black-and-white television and (if you're lucky) a job at the local McDonald's.

Senioritis is not incurable. Victims can be pulled out either by graduation or receiving a few unexpected Fs. (Fs does not stand for diploma. It stands for Fat Fleas Fanoother Fsemester). Sufferers, take heart; you are not alone. You're probably not exactly suffering, either.

Fighting couples explored in 2 films

ERIC MELIN
Collegian Reviewer

Two movies that explore both sides of a relationship opened last weekend. "Scenes From a Marriage" has good intentions, but "He Said, She Said" is the one that really works.

In both films, the two main characters are totally in love with each other. "Scenes From a Marriage" pairs Woody Allen and Bette Midler, an odd couple to say the least. Allen takes a break from the severely neurotic character he usually plays in his own movies to be an only slightly neurotic character.

Nick Fifer is a classic Beverly Hills lawyer stereotype. He drives a convertible, has a car phone and a huge house. He is also a loving father and a good husband, yet he cheated on his wife.

Deborah Feingold-Fifer is his liberated and confident wife. She's just written a book about staying together in a world of divorce titled "I Do! I Do! I Do!" yet she cheated on her husband.

The bulk of the movie takes place in a ridiculously giant mall filled with Christmas carolers and pesty mimes. It's the Fifers' 16th anniversary and they decide to come clean with the truth. Ironically, Nick and Deborah couldn't be more in love.

"He Said, She Said" stars Kevin Bacon and Elizabeth Perkins as Dan Hanson and Lori Bryer, two TV commentators who constantly disagree onscreen and off. It takes a while for Dan to realize it, but he finally admits to himself that he is as in love with her as she is with him.

Directors Ken Kwapis and Marisa Silver further explore the two sides by showing the same scenes from his and her point-of-view. This works very well without getting boring or confusing. Rather than going on with reality, they show extreme exaggerations of the characters' impressions.

All of these scenes are funny, especially a takeoff on the famous diner scene from "Five Easy Pieces" with Jack Nicholson. Dan looks at his menu to find that it doesn't have any food on it at all. He looks at Lori across the table and eventually decides to hold the monogamy and "have a side order of sex."

K-State, zoo take care of exotic animals

ARLOAH FAIRCHILD
Collegian Reporter

The care of exotic animals is being shared by K-State and the Sunset Zoo in Manhattan.

The program has evolved over several years, said James Carpenter, associate professor in clinical sciences, who has a degree in veterinary medicine and a master's in wildlife. He is the first person to be hired by the University to work specifically with the exotic animal program.

Carpenter, before being hired by K-State, worked with wildlife and did consultation on exotic animals.

"My predecessor, Professor Terry Campbell, started the program and developed it to a certain stage," Carpenter said. "After Campbell left, the faculty decided they liked the program and wanted to develop it even further."

"I was hired to work specifically with the zoo and exotic animal program at K-State," he said.

The program is designed for the involvement of two different students every three weeks. This enables about two-thirds of the class to participate. The three weeks are programmed around the students' interests.

The students are taught how to treat exotic animals because a large amount of people are taking exotic animals as pets, Carpenter said.

Companion birds are becoming increasingly popular as pets, Carpenter said. They have even surpassed dogs in popularity.

I think it will be good for students simply because of the competitiveness of the field of veterinary medicine.

—James Carpenter

Associate professor of clinical sciences

Working with exotic animals is difficult for several reasons, Carpenter said.

The first reason is there are from 2,000 to 5,000 different species that can be encountered by a veterinarian, he said. Secondly, we are knowledgeable about nutritional requirements, husbandry and diseases of domestic animals, but exotic animals are different.

It is important to have a zoology background because some animal diseases and treatments used with domestic dogs, cats, pigs and horses can not be used on bears and parrots, said Don Wixom, director of the Sunset Zoo.

Carpenter said exotic animals are wild and can be very dangerous. It depends on the type of animal as to which kind of technique is used when treating the animal.

Wixom said sickness symptoms are often hidden by wild animals and are difficult to detect.

It is a natural born instinct to hide symptoms because in the wild, sick animals are the prey of enemies, Wixom said.

"We deal mostly with preventive medicine when working with the animals at the zoo," Carpenter said.

Four aspects make up the exotic animal program. Besides preventive medicine procedures, an annual examination is given to most of the species in the zoo. These include a complete check of the animal — blood tests, urine test, listening to the heart and checking of the teeth.

Checking the teeth of the animals is becoming an important part of the exam, Carpenter said.

He said that with the good care the animals are receiving, they are living longer and their teeth need less work than those of wild animals.

Routine treatment of sick and injured animals or inspection of new arrivals is also done at least once a week, Carpenter said.

The final part of the program is the treatment of emergencies.

Carpenter said this program is great for students who are interested in exclusively treating exotic animals.

"The program has worked very well for us because we have had trouble finding veterinarians that had worked with exotic animals before or that even wanted to work with exotic animals."

"We are very appreciative of all the hard work the college has put into the program," Wixom said.

"I think it will be good for students simply because of the competitiveness of the field of veterinary medicine," Carpenter said.

The program has recently been expanded to include a resident student at the Topeka Zoo.

"The Sunset Zoo is also going to be adding more selections, so we will be hiring an intern and increasing our visits from once a week to three times a week," Carpenter said.

Lack of leadership continues to hurt men's hoop squad

4-year players would be plus at crunch time

Scott Paske

Sports Reporter

Jean Derouillere tried to be the leader. Inconsistency lowered his effectiveness.

Jeff Wires tried to be the leader. A laid-back personality and little experience in the role kept him from being top notch at it.

Keith Amerson tried to be the leader. Offensive limitations prevented him from taking charge of games.

These are the sad truths of K-State's frustrating basketball season.

Even Wildcat coach Dana Altman acknowledged his team's most glaring weakness at his weekly press conference Monday. Despite two remaining regular-season games, Altman's evaluation carried a conclusive tone.

"Most of our guys were just worried about getting themselves ready to play," Altman said. "No one had that much experience or had that much success that they could just say, 'Okay, I'm going to be ready. I just need to get my teammates ready.'"

Altman said the absence of a floor leader hasn't been limited to game situations. Daily workouts have provided some of the most telling signs.

"This team is not as competitive as some of the previous teams I've been associated with," Altman said. "That's not a knock on the team. I'm just comparing."

Still, K-State's lack of a take-charge player hasn't been overcome. The results are a 12-13 record and the guarantee of a last-place finish for the first time since the Big Eight Conference established its present membership in 1957.

Compare the 'Cats' situation to Kansas with Mark Randall and Oklahoma State with Byron Houston, and it's easy to see why those teams are on the other side of the league's spectrum.

Nebraska's Rich King and Missouri's Doug Smith complete the list of team leaders from the Big Eight's top four teams. All joined their respective programs out of high school.

K-State's four seniors are junior-college transfers.

"I look at those ball clubs that have pretty solid leadership, and they have players who have been in their programs for a long time," Altman said. "The high school players that we have are going to have to provide some of that stability."

Long-term leadership was an abundant commodity for the 'Cats last year with Steve Henson and Lance Simmons. But the cupboard was bare after that. Of K-State's seven returning lettermen, John Rettiger was the only one with more than one year in a 'Cat uniform.

It has shown this year. Watch tapes of K-State's games at Iowa State, and both games with Nebraska, and it's obvious the 'Cats didn't really know who to turn to in the clutch.

There was no doubt last year.

Most people figured Derouillere, who averaged 15.9 points per game last season, would be a logical choice in this year's tight situations.

Peaks and valleys in the senior guard's play has kept it from being that way.

"Jean is not very vocal," Altman said. "He's tried to establish a work ethic for himself, let alone everybody else. With his inconsistency, it's been hard for him to take a real leadership role."

Wires, who has emerged as one of the league's surprises this year, had to overcome the obstacle of limited playing time last season as a backup to Henson.

Because of Jones' injury, Altman was forced to use Amerson in a different role than he had originally planned.

"Ideally, Keith is a great sixth man," Altman said. "He's a great team man. He's a capable starter, but I think he would have been better coming off the bench."

There have been flashing moments of leadership this season. Wires took matters into his own hands at Wichita State with a game-winning shot. Derouillere came on strong in a second-half win over Akron.

It's possible that somebody will step forward and point the way for the 'Cats in their remaining games.

It will be better when it's a sure thing.

Diana Miller, Hazim All-Big 8

From Staff and Wire Reports

KANSAS CITY, Mo. — Liz Brown of Oklahoma State has been named Big Eight Conference women's basketball player of the year by league coaches.

Brown, a senior point guard from Roff, Okla., and K-State's Diana Miller, a senior forward from Hutchinson, also are repeat first-team selections this year.

Oklahoma State's Dick Halterman was named coach of the year. His team is top-seeded going into the conference tournament starting Saturday in Salina. The Cowgirls, who have made the NCAA tournament the past two seasons, have a 22-5 record and won their first regular season conference title.

Joining Brown and Miller on the first team are forward Karen Jennings, a Nebraska sophomore from Persia, Iowa; center Debbie Johnson, a Colorado senior from Lorraine; and guard Nadira Hazim, a K-State senior from Topeka.

K-State coach Susan Yow said the team's tailspin late in the season probably cost Hazim a shot at being Big Eight Player of the Year.

For Hazim, being tabbed to the first team was a good enough honor.

"When I was tabbed for second team last year it was the second time I received that recognition," Hazim said. "I said to myself that I didn't improve that much. So I came in this year just working harder to improve on last season."

For Miller, it was inconsistent play that might have kept her away from the top player honors.

"I wasn't as consistent as I was last year," she said. "Plus, we did so well last year as a team and that helped. Also, Liz Brown was tabbed in the pre-season as the player of the year. She had a lot of pressure on her to perform and there was none on me and that made it easier."

Yow said the coaches of the Big Eight had made a fairly accurate selection of the first team, but the second team left off one other Lady Cat standout.

"I've got a pretty good feel for how the coaches vote," she said. "Perhaps on the second team we could have slipped in Mary Jo Miller."

Named to the second team were forwards Lisa McGill of Oklahoma State, Terrilyn Johnson of Kansas and Ericka Fields of Missouri, center Lynne Lorenzen of Iowa State and guard Carin Stites of Oklahoma.

Meggan Yedsena, Nebraska's freshman point guard, was named Big Eight newcomer of the year and received an honorable mention.

Honorable mentions also went to Laurie Decker of Iowa State, Jodi Fisher of Oklahoma State, Missy Kraai of Colorado, Kay Kay Hart and Stacy Truitt of Kansas, Lisa Sanbothe and Carla Yancey of Missouri and Angie Alexander of Oklahoma.

Tennis team drops finale of weekend trip to Utah

TODD FERTIG
Sports Reporter

The tennis team added another match to its record for the four-day weekend, but by dropping a final dual in Utah finished with an 0-4 record during the trip.

The lone K-State victory in Sunday's dual with California-Santa Barbara came at No. 5 singles. After losing the first set 6-3, Neili Wilcox claimed her match with Trina Eggers by default due to injury.

The 1-8 record against U.C. Santa Barbara gave the team just three wins in four days of play. Coach Steve Bietau said the competition was everything he thought it might be with national powers BYU and Utah joining UNLV and UCSB.

"The competition was very good. It was the highest quality of play we have faced on any trip," Bietau said.

After claiming what Bietau called the biggest win for K-State this season against Utah on Saturday, Michele Riniker finished the weekend at No. 1 singles in defeat. Riniker fell to Santa Barbara's Tracie Johnstone 6-3, 6-3.

Riniker defeated Utah's top player, Julie Kempin 6-2, 7-6 (7-2) on Saturday.

While Suzanne Sim moved to No. 2 singles over the weekend, Angie Gover returned to the singles lineup Sunday at No. 3. Gover had been limited to doubles action while rehabilitating injuries. Both Sim and Gover dropped their matches to the count of 6-0, 6-3, but Bietau found reasons for optimism in the performance of both players.

The squad lost two close doubles matches on Sunday. Sim and Wilcox fell to Carla Quaresma and Laura Rutledge 6-4, 6-3 at No. 2 doubles. At the No. 3 spot, Bietau said.

NCAA to cut number of coaches

ERIC BROWN
Sports Reporter

Recently-passed legislation has created quite a stir on the collegiate sports scene.

In a move to clean up athletics by decreasing the value of winning and emphasizing a return to academic excellence, the National Collegiate Athletic Association made several changes during their winter convention in January.

Rules range from the elimination of athletic dorms and limited practice time to a reduction in recruiting visits. Scholarship limits were also cut by 10 percent in all sports.

One important rule change involves a reconstruction of the assistant coaching limits. In the past, football teams were allowed nine full-time coaches, one volunteer and five graduate assistants.

Under the new rule, which is effective on Aug. 1, 1992, programs are only allowed eight full-time coaches, no volunteers and a maximum of four "restricted earners."

A restricted earner will be allowed to perform coaching services and receive compensation up to $12,000 per year with the option to use that for graduate-level education. The coach has the option to collect $4,000 during the summer term.

The four restricted earner spots have the potential to be combined into two $24,000 spots or one person employed at $24,000 and two at $12,000.

The amounts will almost balance with the current figures paid to graduate assistants, but may exceed the status quo.

Jim Epps, associate athletic director, said this will benefit schools with higher tuition, but hurt schools like K-State, who have smaller fees.

This will benefit the restricted earner because he will receive more money, Epps said. It may also help the program because the individuals will have the opportunity to devote more time as a coach.

"The concern is that this will create a gypsy coach who will never use the position to pursue an advanced degree," Epps said.

Epps said that this will cause a reallocation of work load among the assistants.

"This might put more pressure on assistants to take on the pressures of the graduate assistants," Epps said.

Other sports will be limited to one restricted earner with the exception of basketball.

Sports Briefly

Baseball games today

The doubleheader between the K-State baseball team and Friends University that was postponed Sunday will be this afternoon at 1 p.m. in Frank Myers Field.

K-State, 3-2, will send Dave Christensen and Chris Hmielewski to the mound in the twinbill.

The Wildcats scored 39 runs in 12 innings in a pair of games against NAIA foe Fort Hays State Saturday.

Gubicza changes prediction

HAINES CITY, Fla. (AP) — Pitcher Mark Gubicza, coming back from shoulder surgery, has modified his prediction that he'll be ready for the Kansas City Royals' starting rotation by opening day.

"I'll be ready, but I don't know what for," he said after a weekend workout at the team's spring training camp. "If it's going north with the club, that's fine."

Bench press contestants participate for differing reasons

DAN WICKER
Sports Reporter

With the surge in exercise and pride in appearance, the number of K-State students you can find every day in the weightlifting room at the Chester E. Peters Recreation Complex comes as no surprise.

Those who have excelled in their dedication to working out had the chance to display their merits Feb. 20 in the intramural bench press meet at the rec complex.

The meet saw competitors press more than two times their body weight. Evan Simpson, nose tackle for K-State football, almost lifted 540 pounds.

The intramural meet is growing just as the sport has grown. According to Steve Martini, director of intramurals, the rec staff saw its largest field since the meet's debut three years ago. The field included 21 men and four women.

"We used to have a power lifting meet with squat, dead lift and bench, but the numbers were always low," Martini said. "We had great fans and spectators, and it was our biggest turnout. You have got to appreciate those guys that lift. It is not easy to perform in front of other people."

Probably the largest excitement from the meet hovered around Simpson. He set a meet record on his second press when he lifted 500 pounds. Instead of moving up only 15-20 pounds like most of the other lifters, Simpson elected to jump up to 540 pounds, which he almost successfully lifted.

"It has been my best lift in the last two years, but I'm not really happy because I have done better in the past," Simpson said. "I got into the meet because I did it last year, my wife wanted me to, and some of the football players wanted me to."

Simpson repeated as the winner of the 191-and-up weight class, and also as the overall strongest lifter.

But for Simpson, who weighs in at 315 pounds, his heaviest lift fell quite some distance from lifting better than two times his weight.

This category and highlight of the meet was dominated by Chuck Allen.

Allen, who also repeated as a divisional champion, won the 125-140 pound class. To look at his 143 pound frame, that covers about a frame about 5-feet-10, one would never think of the enormous strength hidden inside Allen's strong desire to win.

"I won last year, and I always liked to be stronger than the next guy," Allen said. "I guess it is a competitive thing. Everything I try to do, I try to be the best."

Allen was obviously the best at this meet, in which he lifted 300 pounds for a personal best, before failing at 315 pounds on his final lift. Finishing behind Allen by only two points in the scoring category, which is a formula based on body weight and amount lifted, was Roland Myers. Myers pressed 270 pounds.

The women's division also saw a repeat winner. Sandra Trentman, who was the smallest competitor in the meet, came away with first place, lifting 105 pounds.

Trentman was outweighed and outlifted by her opponents, but she got the victory since she was strongest compared to body weight and amount lifted. Trentman, who began lifting in high school for her own good, had pre-meet jitters when she saw the competition.

"I really thought I would get my butt kicked. The girls I was lifting against were he-women. I was really scared," Trentman said. "It makes me feel good about myself, and gives me relief about school and other things."

OPERATION DESERT STORM

Israel, Arabs, politics make strange brew

Ottoman Empire collapse signaled trouble

JIM STRUBER
Consumer Reporter

The creation of Israel, inter-Arab rivalry and politics has created an unstable situation in the Middle East. The instability has led to wars among the Arab nations, although the focus of most conflicts has centered on the creation of Israel.

Many problems leading to this instability occurred in the 20th century after the defeat and collapse of the Ottoman Empire.

Burton Kaufman, head of the history department at Virginia Tech, said the Central Middle East was under the control of the Ottoman Empire until its defeat during World War I in 1918. The 1917 Balfour Declaration divided the remnants of the Ottoman Empire into French and English spheres of influence.

The French were given Syria and Lebanon to control, while the English were given Palestine and control over the central area including Saudi Arabia, Iraq, Kuwait and the other gulf states.

Historically, there is also rivalry among Arabs and Muslims themselves, most politically related.

According to the manual "The Arab-Israeli Conflict in Maps," the creation of the state of Israel went through many steps.

At the Paris Peace Conference, where the Versailles Peace Treaty was signed in 1919, the name Palestine was applied to a clearly defined territory that today comprises Israel and Jordan. Palestine was to be administered by Great Britain. In 1922, the British separated Palestine into two administrative districts, Palestine and Transjordan.

The manual said Great Britain, in the Balfour Declaration of 1917, pledged the establishment of a national home for the Jewish people. For almost 30 years, however, Jews from many Arab and European nations were permitted to settle on the western partition of Palestine. After the conclusion of World War II and the Holocaust in Europe, the remaining European Jews tried to immigrate en masse to Palestine.

"They had no place to go," Yael Carmi, graduate student in theater and Hillel counselor, said. "It was the only homeland that they dreamed about for generations, since Biblical times."

The manual said that in 1946 the British granted Transjordan independence, and in 1947 the General Assembly of the United Nations voted by a two-thirds majority to partition western Palestine into a Jewish and an Arab state. The Arabs didn't want any Jewish entry into Palestine and rejected the U.N. partition plan.

Carmi said the Palestinians and Arabs made their first mistake rejecting the 1947 U.N. partition plan, which would have granted both Jewish and Palestinian autonomous nations.

In 1948, five Arab countries — Jordan, Lebanon, Syria, Iraq and Egypt — attacked Israel. The Israelis won the War of Independence and many of the Palestinians in the region relocated to refugee camps in Lebanon, Egypt, Syria and Jordan. The Palestinians' presence in those Arab countries has caused much concern and resentment in the Arab countries they now inhabit.

The Israelis fended off the first invasion, but have since had to fight Arab nations and terrorists repeatedly from the 1951-1956 Fedayeen Raids, the 1956 Sinai Campaign, the 1967 Six-day War, the 1973 Yom Kippur War and the 1982 Lebanon invasion to the present.

In the wars, Israel annexed or occupied the Sinai (which was later returned to Egypt), West Bank, Golan Heights and Gaza Strip. Israel continues to occupy the latter three.

The Israelis consider the Golan Heights a part of Israel as well as being necessary for the defense of the country.

The West Bank and Gaza Strip are being kept until a settlement can be made with the people living there, Carmi said.

"I believe the Arabs, Israelis and the Palestinians can find a proper solution to the Palestinian problem," Carmi said. "They deserve a state of their own just like anyone else."

Carmi said the Israeli government is willing to negotiate with the Palestinian people. The Israelis, however, will not negotiate if the Palestine Liberation Organization represent the Palestinians. The Israelis and the United States consider the PLO and many splinter groups associated with the PLO as terrorists who kill many women and children indiscriminately.

"The Palestinians will not get a homeland if they choose the PLO to represent them," Carmi said. "They should find moderate leadership who can take responsibility."

"We are a highly developed country. Israel is the only democracy in the Middle East," Carmi said.

Carmi said there should be no linkage between the withdrawal of Iraqi ground troops from Kuwait and the question of a Palestinian homeland, because they are separate problems.

"If we connect the two, we serve Saddam Hussein," Carmi said.

"I want to live in this region. I went through three wars, and I saw many family members and friends injured and even die," Carmi said. "When you are hated and persecuted, it is hard to be optimistic about a solution to this crisis. Saddam and Arafat aren't the solution. But, I do believe in peace and I believe very soon we will be able to negotiate and find common ground."

Andrew Chermak, associate professor of mathematics and former Israeli citizen, said the Arabs and Israelis are still in a state of war. The Arab nations also don't want another Arab country, but they would be happy to get rid of Israel entirely.

"The Israelis don't want to have to deal with the issue that the creation of Israel created a homeless people," Chermak said. "Certainly, the other Arabs could have absorbed the refugees."

Hisham Hidmi, Palestinian graduate student and former president of the Muslim Students' Association, said the fighting in the Middle East isn't predominantly religious in nature.

He said the problems in the region revolve mainly around political differences among the Arab nations and outside influences from the United States, Great Britain and the Soviet Union.

"However, there is fighting due to religious differences," Hidmi said.

"My wishes are for Palestine. My hope is that Palestinians will get a homeland," Hidmi said.

Cosima Dabbas, graduate student in journalism and Jordanian citizen, said the Balfour Declaration should have created a homeland for Jews and Palestinians.

"There is an area Israel claims as homeland and an area they occupy," Dabbas said. "A Palestinian homeland hasn't been established yet, though several U.N. resolutions have called for establishing one."

Allied troops facing stressful conditions

LORI STAUFFER
Staff Reporter

Many soldiers in the Persian Gulf War are facing stressful conditions they may not have planned on.

Cold nights, sand fleas and a lack of showers have been a bother to many of the soldiers who spend their days and nights in the sand.

Michelle Wickey, senior in apparel and textile marketing, has a brother in the gulf. Thomas Wickey, a Black Hawk helicopter pilot, is providing air support for troops moving into position for a ground attack. She said when she received his letter, which was written in early January, he complained of the weather.

"He said it gets really cold in the night," Wickey said.

Paula Vale, third-year student in veterinary medicine, said her friend, Brent York, probably has a life a little easier than the soldiers on the front line. As an officer, York does not face many of the hardships enlisted personnel endure.

"He said he gets to sleep on a cot in a tent. A lot of the guys are in sleeping bags on the front line; they can't carry a cot with them," Vale said.

Cleanliness is not next to godliness on the front lines. Jodi Cowan, senior in sociology, said her friend in the Marines, Chris McGrew, is allowed to take a bath every three days and a shower once every two weeks.

"Chris has even gone up to three weeks without a shower," Cowan said.

So far, Vale said, sleep deprivation hasn't been a factor for York. Wickey said keeping a routine helps, as well as using a little recreation to blow off steam.

"They play a lot of sand volleyball — a lot of sand volleyball," she said.

Another complaint the troops have is the MREs, or meals ready to eat, Cowan said.

"All of my friends that I have talked to that are over there tell me to send steaks. They hate the MREs," she said. "They want us to send them food. But, we can't send them a lot of things. No meat. No chocolate."

"The military doesn't want them to have a lot of sugar," Cowan said. "They can have peanuts. The boxes are all looked through to keep the men from getting things they don't want them to have."

Cowan said she often asks York how the soldiers get through days when they have to endure so much stress.

"He said, 'You just have to live one day at a time.' What can you do? The only thing that keeps them going is letters," she said. "They are afraid people will forget about them."

Biological weapons easier to produce

Nations with limited industrial bases able to launch chemical attacks

ERWIN SEBA
Staff Reporter

Chemical and biological weapons possess the destructive capability of nuclear bombs because of their ability to kill on a mass scale. Chemical and biological weapons are also attractive to those who might wish to use them because they are easier to produce and do not require the destruction of vast areas to kill the enemy.

Chemical weapons can be produced on a mass scale by nations with smaller industrial and scientific bases than the world's superpowers. To construct nuclear weapons, a nation needs a large, advanced industrial and scientific infrastructure, but chemical weapons can be produced by countries with only the capacity to make pesticides.

Biological attacks can also be launched by nations with limited industrial bases. Unleashing a biological attack may be as simple as placing clothing containing virulent bacteria in the hands of an enemy.

The development of biological weapons on a mass scale, however, requires a fairly high state of scientific and industrial development.

Modern biological weapons were first used on a mass scale by the Japanese in their occupation of Manchuria from the late 1930s, according to a 1990 book, "Preventing a Biological Arms Race."

Chemical weapons have a longer history of use in warfare. Beginning in World War I, chemical weapons, such as mustard gas, phosgene, chlorine gas and hydrogen cyanide, also known as prussic acid, were used in attempts to break the stalemate caused by trench warfare in that conflict.

World War I-era chemical weapons were also used by Italy during its invasion of Ethiopia in the 1930s and Japan during its occupation of Manchuria.

The chemical weapons first used in World War I were made possible because of the availability of large amounts of chlorine due to developments in the German chemical industry, according to the book.

Chlorine, and another gas used during World War I, phosgene, are classified as lung or choking agents. They cause "inflammation of the lungs, which fill with fluid, resulting in drowning," according to the book.

Blood or asphyxiating agents such as hydrogen cyanide were introduced later in the war. Like lung agents, blood agents take effect after inhalation. Blood agents first cause tearing and choking, "but, in the manner of carbon monoxide poisoning, they also cause rapid death by blocking the capacity of the blood to carry oxygen," according to the book.

One of the last gases to be introduced during World War I, mustard gas — also called sulphur mustard — is an example of a vesicant or blister agent. A vesicant affects interior and exterior surfaces of the body, resulting in blistering of the eyes, skin and lungs. Death is caused by the lungs constricting and filling with fluid.

Most of these types of chemical weapons can be defended against by the use of gas masks, which seal tightly around the face, and, in the case of vesicants, by also wearing protective clothing.

The most famous chemical weapons of the post-World War II era — nerve gases — were actually developed by Nazi Germany in the late 1930s. Both the Allies and the Axis powers refrained from using gases in the major theaters of conflict.

The first nerve gas was called tabun and was invented in 1936 as a by-product of insecticide research. This led to the development of another nerve gas, sarin, in 1938.

According to "Chemical Warfare and Chemical Disarmament," an article published in the April 1980 issue of Scientific American magazine, nerve agents, as nerve gases are called, are stored in liquid form. Depending on the strength of the nerve agent, "they can be released from munitions as a cloud of vapor or as spray of liquid droplets dispersed by explosive mechanical or thermal means."

Nerve agents attack the cholinergic nerves, said Thomas Roche, head of the department of biochemistry and professor of biochemistry.

"Those are the nerves that control a lot of your muscle action," Roche said. By interfering with the operation of the cholinergic nerves, nerve agents eventually stop the heart muscle and diaphragm from functioning.

"If you shut down the muscles, you die," Roche said.

Entering the body through inhalation or absorption through the skin, the nerve agent binds to the enzyme acetylcholinesterase in the nervous system and inactivates it, according to the article.

"Blocking the enzyme causes a rapid accumulation of the synaptic transmitter substance acetylcholine, which normally is decomposed by acetylcholinesterase within milliseconds of being dispersed at the nerve endings. The buildup of acetylcholine at autonomic ganglia and effectors, at skeletal neuromuscular junctions and at synapses in the central nervous system causes a wide array of symptoms: intense sweating, filling of bronchial passages with mucus, bronchial constriction, dimming of vision, uncontrollable vomiting and defecation, convulsions and finally paralysis and respiratory failure. Death from acute nerve-gas poisoning is caused by asphyxia, which generally will occur in a few minutes," according to the article.

Inhalation a dose just beyond the lethal limit or absorbing the dose through the skin may slow the effects of the nerve agent and death may not occur for several hours.

Nerve agents take a long time to

House approves banking bill

By the Collegian Staff

A bill that would allow interstate banking has passed the Kansas House of Representatives and will go before the Senate for approval this week.

The bill would allow outside holding companies to purchase banks in Kansas while allowing holding companies in Kansas to purchase banks in other states.

"The bill we're trying to pass is a regional one and would allow regional reciprocity with Iowa, Arkansas and states contiguous to Kansas," said Jim Maag, senior vice-president of the Kansas Banking Association.

Maag said interstate banking should not be confused with interstate branching. In order to engage in interstate banking, a holding company must purchase capital in another state and not just open up a branch office.

Kansas is one of the few states that does not allow interstate banking, said Robert Burton, associate professor of agricultural economics.

"That says to me that some of the other states have seen some advantage to it and have acted on it," Burton said.

Interstate banking would allow more competition and could allow greater services, Burton said.

"The concern is there may be an adverse effect on the small community bank that has served its community well, and larger banks may have different priorities and be unwilling to make small loans," Burton said. "It's hard to predict, but it might make it harder for small banks to compete with interest rates and services."

James Smallwood, vice president of FirstBank in Manhattan, said he feels interstate banking is inevitable.

"Like it or not, it's going to happen," he said. "Twenty years from now, you're going to see a large (interstate) bank in most big cities throughout the country."

Interstate banking is already taking place in Kansas through non-banking firms like Sears, Roebuck and Co. and J.C. Penney Co. Inc., and investment firms such as Merrill Lynch and Charles Schwab, Smallwood said.

"We are competing right now with Charles Schwab, Paine Webber, Merrill Lynch, Sears and J.C. Penney, so what's the difference whether or not they open up a building on 8th and Poyntz," he said.

Smallwood said he also feels interstate banking will provide additional competition for the banking industry.

"Competition is great for the consumer," he said. "From that perspective, it won't hurt us. Competition is also great for the competitor, because it forces us to do more things right in order to compete."

"We should be able to compete with interstate banks and do it very well. The only thing they can offer is a lower price on a service, lower interest rate on a loan, or a higher interest rate on certificate of deposit."

"They can't offer the kind of community involvement and personal attention community banks do and do very well."

Ted Haggart, president of Union National Bank & Trust Co. in Manhattan, said he does not think interstate banking will have an impact in the way Kansas does its banking.

"I think it's a matter of acceptance, because it's a part of the new banking system," he said. "There is already a healthy operation in the area, and I don't see it causing any problems."

Opponents of the bill have said interstate banking tends to concentrate too much capital in too few hands, Maag said.

"Kansas has always been made up of community banks because of the nature of our state. More than half of Kansas banks are located in cities of less than 5,000 people. I think most of the interstate banks will be in metropolitan areas like Kansas City and Wichita," he said.

Group uses fast beat for release

Dreams, pride shown in music performed with Spanish touch

REBECCA SACK
Collegian Reviewer

Rhythm Tribe combines contagious energy and a Spanish flair on the group's latest release, "Moderno."

The group uses deep and driving rhythm to provide a simple release from the pressures of life. They use their music to express their dreams, pride and determination.

Most of the songs on "Moderno" revolve and pulsate with a vigorous beat that seems to indicate we should try to feel the music rather than understand it, because in so doing we will understand it. It works. Rhythm Tribe really communicates.

The first song, "Gotta See Your Eyes," immediately tells us what the album is all about: Salsa, rhythm, energy, simplicity and musical depth without lyrical complication. The lyrics are innovative and distinctive enough to capture attention, and I've been singing these lines for days now: "Gotta see your eyes/ When you kiss me tonight/...Don't you close your eyes/ When you kiss me tonight."

It doesn't appear to be novel at first, and yet the subtle twist the group gives to these words is the same twist they put in their music. This song begins with maracas and a gentle guitar line, but before it can lull, it explodes with rhythm that commands dancing.

Rhythm Tribe sticks to the same theme of Spanish music soaked with eruptive beats except for a couple diversions into jazz and experiments with rap. "Losing You" is thick, deep jazz with the welcome addition of keyboards. It is also the only song with a melancholy tone, and it is perhaps the best song on the album, although it is not very indicative of the Rhythm Tribe's music.

The group's rap experiment is not so successful, however. The last song, "Family," seems to have great didactic possibilities but the hints of rap limit the song. Rather than improving the music with diversity, the song is reduced to a corny edition of a Vanilla Ice call to action. The chorus explains itself: "...Go, Go, Go Family, Go, Go, Go Family."

I was glad to be spared an encounter with this fiasco until the end of an otherwise excellent album. The song should definitely be scratched off — or maybe it was meant to be laughed at.

Rhythm Tribe obviously wanted to communicate some of their values, but they do so much more effectively in songs like, "You'll Be There" and "Forever Mine." The opening dialogue for these songs suggests the influence that Rafael Guzman-Sanchez has had on his sons, Thomas and Paul. Their combined talents create a brilliant vivacious sound on an album with never-ending energy.

Journalists discuss interviewing techniques, emphasize personal presentation, honesty

CHRISTINE SPLICAL
Collegian Reporter

A panel of professional journalists gave advice on interviewing for jobs at a meeting sponsored by the Society for Collegiate Journalists.

The panelists included Forrest Gossett, chief Statehouse correspondent for the Wichita Eagle; Greg Sharpe, WIBW sportscaster; and Cathy Doud, copy editor and page designer for the Muskogee Phoenix and Times Democrat.

Gossett said, "Anyone looking for a job must present themselves well and be confident. But getting the interview in journalism is 99 percent of the battle. You have to prepare yourself before the interview."

"Newspapers hire you for what you can do for them. Don't get hung up on what clothes to wear," he said. "Editors are looking for someone who is honest. Tell them what you believe in."

When asked what not to wear to an interview, Doud said, "I wouldn't wear anything neon. It's up to you, whatever you feel comfortable in and present yourself well in."

"Emphasize your practical experience," Sharpe said. "If you can be a jack-of-all-trades, your stock goes up and the more valuable you are."

Gossett said, "Remember there is a recession going on, but it is possible to find a job. Just beat the bushes, network and remember that nothing is beneath you. You can get just as good of quotes from a high school football game as you can from a Kansas City Chiefs' football game."

Gossett said when managers look at resumes a good grade point average may open the door but it doesn't ensure a job.

Doud said a good GPA may get you in the door, but if you can't pass the barrage of tests, you are out of there. She said your clips are important.

Internships are also important. Sharpe said without an internship, an interviewee may be at a real disadvantage.

"You don't have to take an unpaid internship, you have choices," Doud said. "I just worked my butt off at the school paper. It depends on how hard you want to work."

The panel said asking questions at interviews is very important. Doud said never be afraid to ask questions, especially financial ones. She said ask if you can speak to the people in the newsroom.

Doud also said to ask what happened to the person before you.

Sharpe said to ask about possibilities for advancement in the future. He also said to find out how the station or paper is perceived and what it is like — this can provide good questions to ask at the interview.

The panel discussed the financial rewards of being a journalist.

"If you are in it for the money, you're in it for the wrong reason," Sharpe said. "You can get slammed in the face if you expect big bucks."

Club members take vacations

Trips allow agriculture students to learn in relaxed setting

MELISSA SMITH
Collegian Reporter

Each year the Agricultural Economics Club tries to take one major trip, as well as one or two smaller trips.

The club is a departmental club for all agricultural economics majors, said Kelly Fink, president of the club and senior in agricultural economics.

It currently has a paid membership of about 75 students, he said, and meets once a month. He said they try to have a guest speaker at each meeting.

The trips allow students to learn in a relaxed setting, said Andrew Barkley, assistant professor in agricultural economics and adviser for the club.

At least one faculty adviser goes on the trips, he said, which gives students and faculty an opportunity to interact in an informal setting outside of the classroom without grades or tests.

Ted Schroeder, assistant professor in agricultural economics and former adviser for the club, said the students try to select trips that are relevant to the curriculum and will allow them to enjoy themselves.

"A lot of students haven't been to large cities, agri-businesses or types of markets," he said, "and to see those and how they operate helps them get more out of it than if they just learned about them in the classroom."

The club has traveled to Dallas and Chicago in the past, he said.

The club traveled to Chicago Jan. 10-13.

The students flew from Kansas City to Chicago, he said, and had two full days to spend in Chicago since they did not have to spend as much time on the road.

About 25 students went on the trip. While there, they visited the Chicago Board of Trade, Fink said.

The board is the basis for all agriculture markets, he said, and the Chicago Board is one of the largest in the world.

The students learned the history of the board and watched the trading of commodities, he said.

He said they also visited the Sears Tower, attended a Chicago Bulls basketball game and took a guided bus tour of the city.

"It's a good time," he said, "because the students get to know each other pretty well."

Schroeder said one of the important aspects of the trips is the students who go begin to feel like a part of the group and get to know one another.

They may have to deal with each other in their jobs after college and will be able to connect better, he said.

He said the students receive group discounts on travel and hotel rates, which cuts down on the expenses.

Each member pays for his or her own share of the trip, Fink said. The club also holds a few fund raisers.

The organization also takes one or two smaller trips during the year, Barkley said.

Last fall they went to the Woodlands in Kansas City to watch the races, he said.

naturally pass out of the body, according to the article. This means a victim who is exposed to nerve gas in small amounts, but over an extended period of time may be killed by the nerve agent.

Sarin and agent VX, which is the most powerful nerve agent in the world and was first produced by the United States after World War II based on the German nerve gases, are the two primary nerve agents in the U.S. arsenal.

One milligram of sarin is lethal. VX is more lethal, only .4 milligram is fatal, according to the article. A milligram is equal to about 28-thousandths of an ounce.

Iraq is known to possess nerve agents and mustard gas as well as hydrogen cyanide. It has used chemical weapons against minority populations in Iraq and during the war with Iran.

Defense against nerve agents requires the use of a gas mask and clothing, which completely covers the body. Some antidotes are available to counteract nerve agents, but according to "Chemical Warfare and Chemical Disarmament," are only effective when a victim has received no more than the "median lethal dose."

The use of chemical weapons in international war is prohibited by the Geneva Protocol of 1925, which Iraq and the United States have signed and ratified. The production and stockpiling of chemical weapons is not prohibited by the Geneva Protocol.

Biological weapons development in the United States parallels that of the Manhattan Project, which led to the first atomic bomb. Biological weapons development was started during World War II to counter a perceived German threat and was done secretly, according to "Preventing a Biological Arms Race." Unknown to the United States at the time was the decision by Nazi dictator Adolf Hitler banning all offensive biological weapons research.

Like the United States, the Soviet Union was also conducting biological weapons research during war.

Most of this research focused on botulism and anthrax, the research was directed at how to place these agents in deliverable weapons.

Biological and bacteriological weapons include "organisms (bacteria, viruses, rickettsia and fungi), or infectious material derived from them, which are intended to enter the body and cause illness and death," according to the book.

Biological weapons are deadly through "infection (overwhelming life processes and the body's defenses by rapid reproduction), poisoning (reproducing until able to produce sufficient amounts of nonliving but toxic substance) and cytotoxicity (a virus being absorbed into and killing host cells)," according to the book.

Also often considered with biological and chemical weapons are "supertoxic chemicals at the convergence of the chemical and biological agent categories in both chemistry and arms control" known as toxins, according to the book.

Toxins are non-living directly deadly substances that are unable to reproduce. They come from synthetic sources and natural living sources.

Toxins and biological weapons cannot be developed, produced, stockpiled or otherwise acquired or retained under the terms of the 1972 Biological Weapons Convention, which has been signed by both the United States and Iraq.

Vaccines are considered the primary defense against biological weapons.

Lori and Dan know better. Lori knows better than to get involved with a male who carouses with a different girl every day. Dan knows better than to fall in love. He is the classic male stereotype that women love to complain about; afraid of any kind of commitment.

Deborah and Nick also know better. They both know better than to ruin 16 years of marriage just because it was easier than suppressing their sexual desires. During the course of one day, we see them run the emotional gamut together and the mutual fondness becomes obvious. Unfortunately, it just isn't very funny.

"Scenes From a Mall" seemed like a big joke setup without a punchline. The acting was really low key, and the story was so damn predictable. The lack of funny material can be attributed to the fact that Allen, for the first time in years, appeared only as an actor and didn't write the screenplay or direct.

Instead, the script, penned by director Paul Mazursky and Roger Simon, offers some insights into middle age. The Fifers are lucky enough to go through their mid-life crisis in the most tense and congested of all modern day locations — the mall.

"He Said, She Said" is a little cutsey, but it takes chances. Bacon and Perkins save the movie because there are some painfully bad supporting performances. It's also consistently funny and that is its biggest plus. "Scenes From a Mall" sputters out of the starting gate and never makes it past first gear.

Allied troops continue war

By the Associated Press

WASHINGTON — Under the cover of darkness and in a driving rainstorm, hundreds of M1A1 tanks and infantry from the Army's VII Corps have attacked and defeated a Republican Guard division in Iraq, a senior Pentagon source said Tuesday.

The attack was being conducted on a front dozens of miles wide west of Kuwait, the senior military officer said, adding that the Guard units were offering stiff resistance to the Army thrust.

The attack was led by the 3rd Armored Division and the 1st Infantry Division (Mechanized), and the units were plowing forward and engaging a second Republican Guard division in Iraq, said the source, who spoke on condition of anonymity.

President Bush vowed to press the war against Iraq with undiminished intensity Tuesday, saying Saddam Hussein's shattered army was retreating only in hopes of regrouping to fight again.

"Saddam is not interested in peace," Bush said.

"He is trying to save the remnants of power and control in the Middle East by every means possible," Bush said. "And here, too, Saddam Hussein will fail."

Pounded by air and ground attacks, Saddam's forces were on the run in occupied Kuwait and threatened by more than 100,000 U.S. and allied troops in southern Iraq. The U.S. military said some Iraqi units in Kuwait put up stiff resistance, and tanks battled for the city's airport.

"The liberation of Kuwait is close at hand," Bush said, declaring the allies were advancing faster than expected.

In a radio speech, Saddam said he ordered his troops to withdraw.

"He is trying to claim victory in the midst of a rout," Bush said.

Vice President Dan Quayle was at Bush's side during the White House statement and later made clear the United States wants to render Saddam powerless.

"Saddam and his military machine are simply incompatible with a lasting and just peace," Quayle said in a speech at McGuire Air Force Base in New Jersey.

Britain, France, Egypt, Germany, Italy and Japan all said withdrawal alone was not enough, and Iraq must comply with all U.N. resolutions imposed after Iraq's Aug. 2 takeover of Kuwait.

Aside from demanding immediate and unconditional withdrawal, the measures call for quick release of detained foreigners, raise the possibility of war reparations and urge nations to collect evidence of human rights abuses, presumably for use in war crimes trials.

"We're very pleased with the progress to date but it is not yet over, so it will continue until it is over," said Gen. Colin Powell, chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff.

Bush said Saddam had not renounced his claim on Kuwait nor accepted all the mandates of the United Nations.

"Nor is there any evidence of remorse for Iraq's aggression or any indication that Saddam is prepared to accept the responsibility for the awful consequences of that aggression," Bush said.

He said Saddam also had not complied with demands for the release of prisoners of war and other detained persons or to put an end to the pathological destruction of Kuwait.

"The coalition will therefore continue to prosecute the war with undiminished intensity," he said.

Bush demanded Saddam's forces lay down their arms if they want to be spared. He said the allies would not shoot at unarmed soldiers in retreat but the United States has no choice but to consider retreating combat units as a threat, and respond accordingly.

Bush gave congressional leaders an update on the war.

"I just told the president, don't let Saddam Hussein off the hook," said Senate Minority Leader Bob Dole, R-Kan. "I think that's the view of most American people."

Fort Riley to display war items

DAVID FRESE

Staff Reporter

Fort Riley's Cavalry Museum has become the first U.S. Army museum to receive artifacts from Operation Desert Storm.

"It's another first for the 1st," said Terry Van Meter, museum curator, as he held up a tattered Iraqi flag.

The Iraqi flag and several other Iraqi accessories were captured at an Iraqi outpost somewhere within the theater of operations in the Persian Gulf. Van Meter could not comment specifically from where it came or how it was obtained.

Van Meter said other than the equipment being full of sand, it was in excellent shape. He showed reporters a Korean-made sleeping bag that smelled brand new.

The equipment came to Fort Riley Tuesday from Saudi Arabia via a returning soldier and included two fatigue jackets, ammunition pouches for the AK-47 assault rifle, hand-written documents, a Russian helmet, a Saudi Arabian flag and a poster with photographs and schematic drawings of coalition aircraft very much like posters handed out to coalition troops to help identify Iraqi planes and artillery.

"I am very surprised at the similarity between this document and some of the things we give to our soldiers," Van Meter said. "But some of this other equipment is the same stuff I saw in Vietnam 20 years ago."

Some of the writings in the captured documents were in fractured English, and Van Meter said it was possible the equipment came from an intelligence outpost.

Van Meter said the items would be put on display in the Cavalry Museum sometime early next week and will be part of a permanent display in the 1st Infantry Division museum once it opens.

At a Fort Riley press conference Tuesday morning, Terry Van Meter, Fort Riley Cavalry Museum curator, holds an Iraqi field jacket captured near the Iraq-Kuwait border by 1st Infantry Division troops.

Allies provide Iraqi prisoners of war '3 hots and a cot'

Fort Riley officers describe conditions during internment

DAVID FRESE

Staff Reporter

Iraqi prisoners of war will be treated better by the United States than they were treated by their own government.

Two Fort Riley officers discussed the treatment of POWs required by the Geneva Convention at a Tuesday news conference.

"We will probably feed them and clothe them better than they are used to," said Col. Marshall Kaplan, staff judge advocate for Fort Riley.

"They'll get three hots and a cot," said Maj. Lance Luftman, Fort Riley police operations officer. "By the looks of some of the things I've seen, they weren't getting that before we got them."

Luftman said some military police officers from the 1st Infantry Division are in charge of setting up prison camps in Saudi Arabia and are working with reserve units processed through Fort Riley. Luftman also said he was surprised by the number of POWs he has seen in reports.

"With the numbers I've seen so far, I don't know if we have enough MPs there," he said.

The Geneva Convention requires the coalition to house Iraqi POWs at the same standard as coalition soldiers. The Iraqi POWs are also to be fed, clothed, kept healthy and paid if they work for the coalition at a rate no less than a quarter of a Swiss Franc per day.

But Kaplan said POWs are not required to work for the enemy and are not allowed to work for the enemy in ways that would help the enemy's war effort. POWs are expected to make every attempt to escape and resist the enemy. They are not to sign anything and are not to take any action that would endanger other POWs.

Broadcasts of coalition POWs held by Iraq showed the coalition members saying the coalition was wrong in its war against Iraq. For this, Kaplan said, the soldiers could be courtmartialled.

Kaplan and Luftman said it does not look to them like Iraq is treating the captured coalition soldiers as required by the Geneva convention.

Soldiers are required to tell the enemy four things — name, rank, service number and date of birth. This information allows the captors to notify the enemy of the soldier's location.

Kaplan said POWs are to be repatriated to their home country as soon as the war is officially over.

"There must be a technical end to the war," Kaplan said. "That does not include a cease-fire. There must be a technical end with treaties signed or something of that order."

Asked if POWs low morale could be attributed to U.N. sanctions, Kaplan said he doubted this was why they surrendered.

Threat of bomb disrupts Calvin

TOMARI QUINN

Editor

A bomb threat cleared the classrooms of Calvin Hall early Tuesday morning.

Lt. Rodney Jager, of the Riley County Police Department's criminal investigation division, said a call came through the 911 dispatcher at 7:01 a.m.

"Listen closely," said the man, who delivered the threat. "The reign of terror will begin today on campus. A bomb is set to go off at Calvin Hall at 9 a.m."

The police traced the call to a pay phone at 1455 Anderson Ave. Jager said the Riley County police are investigating the case with the K-State Police.

Capt. Charles Beckom, campus police, said two exams were scheduled for the same time as the bomb threat and may have been the reason for the threat. Fewer bomb threats have been received in the last few semesters, he said, and this is the first one this semester.

Richard Herrman, investigator with the campus police, said the Persian Gulf War could have played a factor.

"In lieu of the situation in the Middle East and Saddam Hussein's statement that he would cause terror in the United States, we have taken this case very seriously," Herrman said.

Beckom said the building was evacuated according to policy.

"Once we are notified, depending on what time we are notified, we have a policy to evacuate the building," Beckom said. "And for those classes that cannot be interrupted, such as during exams, we arrange for other classrooms to be made available."

Both the campus police and people who work in the building search the premises for objects that appear out of place.

"From there, it's a waiting process," Beckom said. "For someone's twisted mind — you never know why someone would do this."

Campus police allowed students to return to the building after the threat had expired.

Raborn passes primary

DAN SCOTT

Staff Reporter

Candidate Craig Raborn hurdled the first obstacle Tuesday night in his effort to become the first K-State student to serve on the Manhattan City Commission.

By placing sixth in the primary election, Raborn will receive a chance to move to the top three positions in the general election, April 2.

"It's about what I expected," Raborn said of the election, in which only 15 percent of the registered voters participated.

Incumbent Roger Maughmer received 987 votes to lead the seven candidates. Edith Stunkel, assistant director of social anthropology and social work at K-State, placed second with 16 votes under Maughmer. Receiving 920 votes and finishing third was Helen Cooper, management analyst for K-State facilities planning.

Candidate Linda Ferguson, who finished fourth with 803 votes, said the low voter turnout may not have given a true picture of community views. The ground war breaking out in the Persian Gulf may have affected the election.

"Unfortunately, this primary shows the election was definitely an unimportant factor with what is going on in the world," Ferguson said. "Interest in the general election will be higher."

In order to increase voter turnout, the candidates said they will have to make their names known to the community. This will involve more forums, such as the two conducted before the primary. Stunkel said forums give candidates a chance to discuss important topics.

Candidates will also need to go out in the community and meet more people, she said.

Raborn said he is relying heavily on K-State student support, so he will target this group of 14,000 eligible voters first. He said he plans to begin a voter registration drive next week.

Panel of gays, lesbians discusses feelings, experiences with human relations class

PAUL NOEL

Staff Reporter

An eight-member panel from the Bisexual and Gay and Lesbian Society spoke to a human relations class Tuesday about the stereotypes of homosexuality and said homosexuals feel discrimination throughout campus.

Carol Fink, graduate student instructor of family relations and sexual roles in human development, said she invited the group from BaGaLS to speak to her class about homosexuality.

Christine Detamore, co-president of BaGaLS and junior in medical technology, told the class it is hard to live a gay life openly in Manhattan.

"Manhattan is really a closeted town," Detamore said. "People are afraid to come out (of the closet) because of how others react."

Chris Turner, senior in horticulture and BaGaLS member, said most homosexuals go into the closet because they are afraid or confused.

He said, "When you first realize (you're a homosexual), you think,

'Well shit what do I do?' and then you hide."

For many, informing parents can be the hardest part of completely coming out of the closet.

Brad, who did not wish to give his last name, is the co-president of BaGaLS. He said when he told his parents, his father sent him to a psychiatric center. After spending more than a month in the center, Brad said his parents had him see a counselor.

"The counseling didn't do what he (his father) wanted it to do, which was change me to a heterosexual," he said.

Turner said his parents also sent him to a counselor. He said seeing a counselor helped him as a person, but didn't change him into a heterosexual.

Turner said his counselor told him there was nothing wrong with his sexuality, but it would be easier to get along in society if he were to change.

There were two panel members were married before they fully discovered and accepted their homosexuality. Each had a child while

Forecasters say recession to be short

WASHINGTON (AP) — An overwhelming majority of the nation's top economic forecasters share the Bush administration's expectation that the current recession will be shorter and much less severe than the average downturn since World War II.

The National Association of Business Economists survey showed on Tuesday that 49 percent of the 54 forecasters participating in the poll believe the recession will last nine months or less — meaning it should be over by mid-year.

Drug ring co-defendant escapes

ABILENE (AP) — A man convicted of conspiracy in a drug ring run by a former Kansas City fire chief escaped from the Dickinson County Jail Tuesday, one day before he was to be sentenced, officials said.

Steven Baker was convicted last November of three counts of conspiracy and distribution of crack cocaine in a case involving former fire Capt. Gilbert Dowdy. Dowdy, an 18-year veteran of the fire department, was convicted of conspiring to import large amounts of cocaine into Kansas City.

Baker and another inmate, Herbert Montanye, were discovered missing from the Dickinson County Jail at about 11 a.m. Tuesday, said Deputy Sheriff Steve Schwab. Montanye was serving a life sentence for a drug offense, he said.

Schwab said officials found a hole in the wall of Montanye's cell, which led to a chimney.

He said the two were being held in separate cells in the county jail, which has a contract to hold federal prisoners. Schwab said the prisoners were allowed to freely enter and leave their cells during the day but were supposed to be locked in the cells at night.

Baker was scheduled to appear in Kansas City today before U.S. District Judge Joseph Stevens Jr. for sentencing, the judge's office said.

Dickinson County officials said they were searching for the men in the area. The men discarded their orange jail jumpsuits on the jail's roof.

Bill opponents make final effort

TOPEKA (AP) — Opponents of interstate banking Tuesday made one final effort to stop legislation that would allow out-of-state banks to buy banks in Kansas, saying the proposal would reduce the credit available to the state's residents.

David Fowler, representing the First State Bank in Burlington, told lawmakers a bill passed two weeks ago by the House would dilute the capital available to Kansans, making it harder for small businesses to obtain loans.

He told the Senate Financial Institutions and Insurance Committee that out-of-state banks are interested in acquiring Kansas banks because they are in such a healthy condition.

The committee took no action on a bill that would allow a bank from six states — Oklahoma, Missouri, Iowa, Colorado, Arkansas, Nebraska and Iowa — to buy Kansas banks if there is reciprocity with those states.

Nude dancing legalized in Wichita

WICHITA (AP) — Nude dancing is legal in town once again, thanks to a municipal court judge who threw out a city ordinance.

Judge Kenneth Ingham ruled Monday in three cases he heard last week. He said there are substantial conflicts between the city ordinance and state law.

City Council attempts to ban nude dancing in the city limits have been struck down several times by local courts and once in the Kansas Supreme Court.

Charlie O'Hara, the Wichita lawyer who represents the owners of topless bars and clubs, said he thinks he knows how the City Council may react to the invalidation of its ordinance.

"The last time that it happened they declared a nude dancing emergency, whatever that is," O'Hara said.

Committee hears tax plan opposition

TOPEKA (AP) — Gov. Joan Finney's property tax relief plan was attacked Tuesday by special interest groups as part of what one lawmaker called a politically exhausting exercise.

Spokesmen for corporations, businesses, trade groups and non-profit organizations blanketed the House Taxation Committee with testimony in opposition to individual parts of Finney's plan. Lobbyists crowded the meeting room to watch.

Finney has proposed eliminating 35 exemptions to the state's 4.25 percent tax and imposing it on 77 kinds of services to raise money for property tax relief. The committee plans to end hearings on her plan today.

Administrators crash-land plane

Five K-State administrators were involved in a crash landing of the University airplane Monday afternoon at Jefferson County Airport in Denver, Colo.

Mary Harrington, University pilot, made what was described as a picture-perfect landing by Ken Lawson, operations manager at JeffCo, after the right windshield blew out at 19,000 feet.

No one was injured.

The plane was about seven to 10 miles from the JeffCo airport, when the crash, fire and rescue unit was put on standby, Lawson said.

Charles Reagan, assistant to President Jon Wefald, said it was a minor accident.

"It was no big deal. It scares people, makes a lot of noise and gets real cold, but that was it," he said.

Airport maintenance and insurance personnel are investigating the cause of the accident, Reagan said.

John Struve, budget director; Tom Schellhardt, associate vice president for administration and finance; Keith Ratzloff, University controller; Celeste Tillson, assistant University controller; and Alonzo White, director of personnel, had flown to Boulder, Colo., for a business meeting.

Blood-mobile fails to reach goal

Last week's blood-mobile at the K-State Union fell well short of the goal set for the drive.

Organizers said they hoped to receive 1,400 units of blood, but got only 1,143 units, said Cindy Burke, the volunteer coordinator of the blood-mobile and director of health education at Lafene Student Health Center.

"We are all really disappointed. Everyone did a lot of work and we still fell short," Burke said.

Burke said this blood-mobile is an improvement over last fall's drive, which raised only 1,093 units of blood.

"We did more publicity for this drive than last fall. I don't know why we didn't make our goal," Burke said.

She said the Persian Gulf War probably had very little to do with donation levels — very few donors expressed a desire to donate due to the war, and the drive does not usually have soldiers from Fort Riley drive to Manhattan to donate.

"I have my hunches why donations are down. The plasma center opened up just before last fall's blood drive, and both drives since then have been down. But that's just a hunch," Burke said.

Oil industry stable after complex, difficult past

JIM STRUBER
Consumer Reporter

The future of oil production should be stable and provide many opportunities for employment, if there aren't any more boom and bust periods reminiscent of the past, said William Metzger, who is actively involved in petroleum exploration and drill-hole preparation for Conoco, North American based in Casper, Wyo.

Metzger's presentation, the "Past, Present and Future of the Petroleum Industry," was given to an audience of 30 faculty and students.

Metzger briefly outlined the history of oil production and the influences on oil production up to the present. He said after World War II the price of oil was stable and relatively cheap because of price regulation and oversupply by the "Seven Sisters" (seven large international oil companies).

When the foreign countries started to gain independence and nationalize, oil industries' prices started to increase. These price increases are reflected in the steady rise of oil prices after the first OPEC oil embargo in 1973 and the steep increase after the second oil embargo in 1979, he said.

"There was no shortage, but they kept oil out of the marketplace," Metzger said. "This caused a dramatic increase in oil prices."

However, when OPEC nations started to withhold production oil prices increased. Non-OPEC and domestic exploration and production increased as well. By 1985, oil prices started to slide because non-OPEC and domestic production outstripped OPEC production.

"The Saudis flooded the market with excess oil, and the price dropped like a rock," Metzger said.

Metzger said the current projections predict prices will fluctuate depending on the overproduction or underproduction of oil.

He said by the year 2000, we can expect over 50 percent of all oil to be produced by OPEC countries. He expressed some apprehension about the supply of oil being stable since many of the oil producing countries are in unstable, developing regions, particularly the Middle East, Africa and Latin America.

Metzger said the projected World oil reserves could also be seen as pessimistic or optimistic, depending on the projected scenario and technological advances expected to increase oil extraction and exploration.

He predicted substantial undiscovered oil and natural gas reserves to be found in many parts of the world, especially North America and the Soviet Union. He predicted there are as many unproven reserves of oil and natural gas to be found as there are now proven reserves.

"The Soviet Union has a tremendous supply of crude oil, yet they lack the technology to extract the oil in an efficient manner," Metzger said. "Many of the major oil companies are bending over backwards to help them out due to the current political situation."

After the presentation he answered questions from faculty and K-State alumni.

Ron West, professor of geology, asked about the consumption of oil, and what conservation measures oil companies are undertaking.

Metzger said oil companies must make a profit by selling oil.

"Most major oil companies should encourage conservation and curtail production," Metzger said. "This may be a very unpopular suggestion, but I would increase taxes along with this to renovate our crumbling highways."

Metzger also said the environmental impact of the burning Kuwaiti oil fields and facilities are unknown. He speculated it would take years to shut down all the fires and rebuild the facilities.

"We have never seen this type of damage before," he said. "This is a serious tragedy."

Debaters take top honors

K-State team defeats UCLA, looks forward to nationals

MARLA ROCKHOLD
Collegian Reporter

The K-State debate team took three places at the University of Kansas' Heart of America tournament Feb. 23-25.

Susan Stanfield, director of debate, said the team of Rich McCollum, senior in speech, and David Filippi, senior in speech, placed third; Marty Horn, senior in speech, and Dan Molden, senior in speech, took fifth; and the team of Jason Klein, sophomore in history, and K.J. Wall, sophomore in speech, placed sixth.

Individual speaker awards were given to three K-State debaters. Horn placed seventh, McCollum ninth and Filippi tenth, she said.

Stanfield said there were 66 teams competing in the tournament.

"It was a good mix of the regions in the country," Stanfield said. There were teams from New York, Florida and the West Coast.

Two of the best teams in the country, she said, who they had previously beaten, defeated K-State. They were Oklahoma's Central State University, who won the tournament, and the University of California at Los Angeles, who finished the tournament in second place.

"We didn't do as good as we hoped we might," Horn said. "In the end, it may help us out because the tournament pointed out things we need to work on for nationals."

Wall said they could have done better, but it was a very tough tournament.

"It is probably the hardest tournament — besides nationals — all year," Wall said.

Stanfield said she is confident going into nationals.

"I think even though we have placed high in tournaments all semester, our arguments are better now than ever," she said.

Horn said he is not worried about coming up against Central State or UCLA at nationals.

"We have beaten them several times in the past. I guess it was their weekend," he said.

Filippi agreed. "We have a really good past record against them," he said.

"We just need to start gearing up for nationals," Wall said.

Utilities improvement contracts awarded; water system targeted

JEFF STURDY
Collegian Reporter

Utilities improvement contracts for the Flint Hill Job Corps Center were granted at a special meeting of the Manhattan City Commissioners Tuesday.

Bayer Construction Co. of Manhattan was awarded the contract to improve the water system. Bayer's bid was about $330,000, some $160,000 below the engineer's estimate.

The contract for sewer system improvements was awarded to the R.A. Pohl Construction Co. Inc. of Riverside, Mo. The bid was slightly over $400,000, which was $75,000 below engineer's estimate.

Both of the contracts approved were the lowest bids and were unanimously approved by the commission.

City Manager Micheal Conduff said both projects will receive federal funding from the U.S. Department of Labor.

According to a memorandum from Conduff's office, the Labor Department has agreed to contribute $150,000 toward the water project and up to $400,000 for the sanitary sewer project.

The amount committed to the water line is firm, but the amount for the sewer system is still in question, the city is to pay for any oversizing.

The sewer system is being oversized to allow for possible growth to the west, Commissioner Gene Klingler said.

Conduff said the utilities are to be finished in July. The Flint Hills Job Corps Center will be ready for occupancy in October.

EDITORIAL

Community service cures some blindness

There are several types of blindness; no one goes through life without, at some time, experiencing one kind or another. Some people simply don't "see" things, even things right in front of their eyes. The vision of others is distorted; when they look at one thing, they see something else. Some see only color and are so distracted by it that they can see nothing else. Some of us are affected by a particular blindness all our lives. But perhaps more of us go through a series of several blindnesses. I feel this continues to be the case for me. As I grow and mature, it seems my vision changes. My hope is that it is getting better, but the only thing I know for sure is that it is different.

I've recently been given an opportunity to explore some of the aspects of my many blindnesses. This summer I'll be working on a student team in the Chelsea neighborhood of Kansas City, Kansas. Chelsea is a racially mixed (mostly black) neighborhood in Wyandotte County. I'll be working with four other students in association with K-State's Community Service Program.

The project is a follow-up to one conducted in Chelsea last summer. The team will be working to organize a program of activities for inner-city youth in the Chelsea area.

It's like nothing I've ever done before. Although I was involved in one of the Community Service Program's summer teams last year, I worked with the rural component of the program. Last summer I worked in a small town. There, I came into contact with issues I feel lucky to have explored, issues of community survival that, at the time, I felt more prepared to work with than those the Kansas City team would have required me to consider.

In fact, when I interviewed for a spot on a 1990 summer team, I asked that I not be placed in Kansas City. I grew up in a medium-sized Kansas community, and the thought of working in a big city scared me. What did I know about the city? And what did I know about inner-city youth?

But when I applied to participate in the 1991 summer program, with the rural experience of last summer behind me, I requested placement on the Kansas City team. I learned a lot by working in rural Kansas last summer, but the Kansas City team guaranteed a different experience — an experience not necessarily better or worse, but different nevertheless.

For one thing, I must now look at some of the issues of the inner city. I was blind to them before. They are things I guess I was always in some way aware of, but didn't really "see." The issues of crime and drugs are, of course, always in the newspapers. These are the aspects of the big city we so often see in the movies. These are some of the stereotypes we maintain when we talk about the city streets.

And these are real problems, but there are other issues in the inner city as well. There are lives in the inner city. There are people with lives as rich, as frustrating and as hopeful as the lives of anyone who lives anywhere else.

Eric Becker

Collegian Columnist

Last weekend I saw a part of these lives. I went to Chelsea with the other team members and our "faculty mentor" in a University van. We drove around the neighborhood and then met with a few community contacts with whom we'll be working this summer.

I don't know what I expected to see. Chelsea is not statistically the most impoverished neighborhood of Kansas City, but it is far from affluent. When I heard the term "inner city" I guess I expected the worst. I pictured four-story brick tenements, broken streetlights and overturned trashcans in alleys.

But when we drove around the Chelsea neighborhood last weekend I was surprised at how much like my own hometown it looked. It looked nothing like my stereotypical visualization of it. It was not my hometown, but neither was it tenements and alleys. I saw it not as I had expected it to look, but the way it really was. It was made up of houses, driveways and yards like everywhere else I've ever been.

Later, while we were meeting with some of our community contacts in Chelsea, I discovered another blindness: colorblindness. Our contacts had arranged for a woman in the neighborhood to cater in a meal. The woman fixed each of us a plate. Her food was delicious: lasagna, a salad and homemade rolls with honey butter.

It felt so good to sit down and eat together. Some of us were white and some of us were black, but the difference in our colors didn't matter in the least as we sat together at the table to eat and talk. We were only people, with different experiences, but with many of the same kinds of interests and concerns. Nothing beyond our shared humanity mattered to us in Chelsea last weekend.

And yet, who can doubt we were nevertheless enriched by the cultural diversity of the gathering? The experience was beautiful. I'm sure I still have a lot to learn this summer. But I feel my orientation in the neighborhood last weekend gave me a good starting place from which to begin my education in the inner city.

I think we are blind, yes. But I think a lot of lines have been drawn which encourage us in our blindness. We draw lines between "good" and "bad" neighborhoods. We draw lines between "upper" and "lower" classes. We draw lines between "rich" and "poor."

We see society as a two-sided structure, made like those National Geographic maps that are printed on both sides. Society seems to have a top and a bottom. We like to talk about America's "underside," and we see it as the dark reflection of an idealized America. We think there is a horizontal line that bisects our society, and we believe separate aspects of our culture have evolved simultaneously on top of and below that line. Talk of society's "class structure" provides us with the top and the bottom we expect. For many of us, this picture of society may seem too familiar and too convenient to discard.

But then, there was a time when people thought the world was flat.

I don't mean to say that there is no class structure. The thing I mean to say is that despite the structure of society there are similarities which operate across classes and colors.

We are blind to what we don't want to see. We ignore impoverished neighborhoods because most of us don't have to look at them and because they're not pleasant to think about.

But the people who live in impoverished neighborhoods are in many respects just like people who live elsewhere. Our humanity does not depend upon our economic class or our color.

I think that there is a significant relationship between "good" and "bad," "upper" and "lower" and "rich" and "poor." Underneath the terminology there exists a relationship that connects us to all of these things. We only need to open our eyes and see.

I don't consider myself "street smart," but I've found that the inner city is not an alien land. It's a part of my America, and a place where I look forward to spending some time this coming summer.

Energy plan needs new focus

President Bush found time last week in his busy schedule to announce a new plan that will shape the future of this nation and the relationship the United States holds with Middle Eastern nations.

That plan was not another attempt to remove Saddam Hussein from power, but instead, an attempt to control power in our own country.

Bush and Sen. Bob Dole announced a new energy plan calling for less foreign dependence on oil.

Hurrah!

Bush and Dole called for a more energy-efficient future.

Hurrah!

Bush and Dole encouraged more drilling for oil in Alaska and on the U.S. coasts, but they mentioned nothing about encouraging the use of alternative energy sources or reduction of consumption.

Boo and double boo!

Why is there such an important emphasis put on oil? Locating, drilling, transporting and refining oil would be far more expensive than encouraging alternative energy use and simply reduce energy consumption.

When Congress votes on a new energy bill, they should revamp Bush's proposal.

Congress should implement requirements for automobile manufacturers to increase their product's fuel efficiency.

Congress should increase the tax on gasoline, lowering the demand for gas because of high prices.

Congress should encourage the use of ethanol, solar, water and wind power to halt an increase in the search for oil or construction of nuclear facilities.

Additionally, the consumers of this nation need to reduce the amount of energy they use. By riding bikes or walking instead of driving to campus each day, we would make phenomenal progress toward reduced consumption.

If this country intends to go on an energy diet, we need to reduce our consumption, use better sources of energy and exercise our energy producers, our own bodies.

Event missed

Editor,

The Second Annual Hispanics of Today Conference was at K-State Feb. 22-24. Speakers and workshop presenters traveled from around the Midwest and Dallas, and included Kansas Secretary of Aging Esther Wolf, Rep. George Gomez (D-Topeka) and three K-State professors and alumni.

Unfortunately, few people would know about these facts because, for some unknown reason, the Collegian decided not to cover our conference. We're curious, editor, as to why you didn't feel it newsworthy to assign a reporter to a conference that was held in the K-State Union from 10 a.m. to 5 p.m. (The same time a biology presentation occurred and got coverage). The Hispanic American Leadership Organization put a lot of time and hard work into bringing the conference to Manhattan, and with the help of Pat Bosco, Diana Caldwell and Student Senate, we represented K-State extremely well. We attracted about 300 students from the Midwestern area, even some from Indiana and Idaho.

When we failed to find even a small mention of the HOT conference in the paper Monday, we foolishly assumed there just wasn't room, which is still pretty lame, and we figured there would be an article Tuesday. Silly us. The second snub showed us that familiar events were taking place.

Time and time again, the Collegian gives little attention to, or outright ignores, the events we work very hard to bring about. Quite frankly, we're getting a little sick of it. It seems that other student groups are given priority over ours every time. In the three years we have attended K-State, we recall very few decent stories about the Hispanics on this campus. (We're talking single digits here, ladies and gentlemen).

We did appreciate the articles you wrote for Racial/Ethnic Harmony Week. They were very informative, and they taught a lot about the different cultures. But you can't just write a few columns and pat yourselves on the back for good representation. We are not asking for front-page coverage, nor are we asking for an article in each newspaper. It's fairly obvious each student group deserves equal representation, and to give anything less is wrong. Please don't fail the students, or yourselves, again.

View disturbs

Editor,

As I am sure we all know, the ground war in the Gulf has begun. George Bush and Saddam Hussein decided they were willing to go to war over the fine print — whether Iraq would be given one week or three weeks to withdraw from Kuwait.

Soon after the news broadcast that both sides had rejected the peace proposals, a group of people paraded through Aggieville cheering the news. I am not sure how to best respond to people cheering the coming of war. A statement made by Maria Cotto, whose brother Marine Cpl. Ismael Cotto Jr. was killed in Saudi Arabia just a few weeks ago, says it well.

"I saw them on television, saying they were spending billions on this. I saw them on Wall Street, and they were cheering. It was sick. They were cheering like it was a game. Don't they know it means people will die? Not them. Not their families. Not their kids. People like my brother," she said.

U.S. addicted

Editor,

In the last eight years, the United States has sent soldiers into combat three times: in Grenada, Panama and the Persian Gulf. If we include the Nicaraguan Contras, organized and paid for by the Central Intelligence Agency as stand-ins for our troops, we can say the U.S. has fought four wars in the last eight years. (Let's not look any further back.) That averages out to one war every two years.

What's with us?

We don't seem to be able to stay out of foreign wars, yet we deny that we have a taste for them. Furthermore, our habit is causing us to spend beyond our means. With our ever-increasing military expenditures, we haven't had a balanced budget in years. On top of that (and because of it), we've been foregoing the proper nourishment, such as effective education for our children, adequate health care for all, protection for our decaying environment and many other things we need, in favor of more foreign wars.

We have here a clear pattern of frequent abuse, denial of it (the habit), extravagant spending on our habit and the ignoring of our proper nourishment. They all add up to one thing: addiction. This country is addicted to war. Now, being the addicts we are, we've gone and dragged some of our "friends" into this Persian Gulf War. Misery loves company.

Now there will be some among us who say, "Oh no, that's not us at all; we don't have a 'war problem.'"

Well, that is denial too, my friends. How can we go straight? The first step is to admit we're habitual abusers/addicts caught in a vicious cycle. Next, does anybody out there know of a detoxification and rehabilitation program for countries addicted to war?

Larry Thorpe Jr.
assistant foreign student adviser

Editorial overkill

Editor,

The Collegian must really be lacking of editorial material when it resorts to devoting not one, but three editorials on a supposition (with all the doubletalk) that the Baghdad underground shelter may not have been a mistake.

The truth of the matter is that if they (the United States) want to kill civilians, there are ample targets available like sitting ducks. It is OK for you to be anti-war, but let's not get carried away.

Band scene increases in popularity

KIMBERLY KOHLS
Staff Reporter

The band scene is growing in the Manhattan area and Aggieville bars. "There's been a demand from around town for bands lately," said Ken Snook, owner of Snookies in Aggieville. "It seems like all the bars are jumping in at the same time."

Other places in Manhattan that feature bands almost weekly are Charlie's Neighborhood Bar, the Spot, the Ranch Saloon, Wareham Opera House and the Blue River Pub. "There are a lot of bands out there that are willing to play at smaller bars," Snook said. Snookies features bands on Wednesday and Thursday nights.

From 1982 to 1985, the band scene in Aggieville was fairly big, Snook said. The Avalon, Brothers and the Rockin' K, all former bars in Aggieville, featured live bands just about every week.

Some of the bands that have played in the bars are Shooting Star, Producers and Steve, Bob and Rich and the Rainmakers. Huey Lewis and the News even played a gig while in town with Joan Jett. Many of the bands were up and coming then, but have now become well-known.

The Blue River Pub has bands every Friday and Saturday night. The bar has featured bands from the local, state and national circuits during the last five years.

"People know that if they want to hear a live band on the weekends, they can come out here," said Michele Jonas, manager. "They know that they can dance or just listen to the music.

"The bands love to play here," Jonas said. "I've never had a band that didn't ask to come back to play."

Snook said one of the reasons bands like to play is because there is good response from the public.

"A lot of the local bands have their own following. The crowd may be different for every band," he said. The Blue River Pub's crowd is usually made up of a group of regulars that come to the bar every weekend and a group of the band's followers, Jonas said.

"Our crowd for bands is what keeps us going on the weekends," Jonas said.

Snookies has also been trying to book nationally known bands touring the Midwest. They try to hire the bands at a reasonable rate so tickets are moderately priced for students, Snook said.

"After one good show like the Romantics, the word gets around on the national scene and agents call you," Snook said. "The biggest problem is timing open dates with dates that they are coming through."

"Ideally, we'd like to mix the local bands with the national acts," Snook said. "Right now, we are going for quality."

The Blue River Pub has had some bands from the national circuit, but the problem with booking big bands is waiting for them to come to the area. They also want to play during the week which conflicts with studying and work, Jonas said.

If a band wants to play at the Blue River Pub, they have to be booked about three months ahead of time.

"If a band is going to play in April, they were probably booked last semester," Jonas said.

Jonas said she has seen a growing number of local bands lately.

"We like to give them a chance to play out here," Jonas said. "They usually have a good following, and they are always willing to play. We have our bands on a six- to eight-week rotation and we try to work in the new bands," Jonas said.

Snook and Jonas both said being close to Kansas City and Lawrence helps the Manhattan bar scene.

The followers of bands playing in Kansas City and Lawrence will drive to Manhattan to see the bands, and national bands touring the Midwest will often play in Kansas City, then stop in Manhattan to play, Snook said.

Jim Palmer may not have to wait very long to see if he belongs on the mound or in the broadcast booth.

Baltimore manager Frank Robinson suggested Tuesday the Hall of Famer might be the Orioles' starter for the team's first exhibition game against the Chicago White Sox March 7.

Palmer, 45, was released by the Orioles during the 1983 season and entered the Hall of Fame last summer. He has a career record of 268-152, including four straight 20-win seasons (1975-78).

"I'm going to look at both him and Mike Flanagan as starters (early)," Robinson said Tuesday. "Because it's a lot easier to back off than it is to step things up later in the spring."

Palmer, an Orioles and ESPN broadcaster last season, threw for the third time Tuesday and did not report any problems.

"The hitters will let me know if I still have it," said Palmer, who has overcome a blister sustained after his first day of throwing.

Flanagan, 39, is also pitching without pain and appears to have a good chance to make the club as a long reliever or spot starter. He pitched for the Orioles from 1975-1987 before going to Toronto.

'Cat pitchers combine for no-hitter

SCOTT PASKE
Sports Reporter

OK, so it was Friends University, an NAIA opponent without a feared reputation among NCAA Division I teams.

But what K-State did to the Falcons Tuesday should still turn a few heads.

The Wildcats came out one away from tossing back-to-back no-hitters, and pounded 25 hits in a 15-0, 10-0 doubleheader sweep at Frank Myers Field.

Dave Christensen and Greg McNamara combined for K-State's first no-hitter since 1976 in the opener. The last player to do it was Lon Ostrom, who shut down Oklahoma State in a 2-1 seven-inning contest. Both of Tuesday's games were shortened to five innings because of cold weather.

Chris Hmielewski blanked the Falcons for four innings in the nightcap, and Tim Churchman struck out two batters in the fifth before pinch-hitter Luke Davis slapped a single just out of the reach of K-State second baseman Van Torian.

K-State coach Mike Clark described his staff's effort as "overpowering."

"When you pull two pitchers out of no-hitters, it's kind of a rarity," Clark said. "It's creating a problem, because we need to get some kids some innings."

Clark had to settle for near perfection from his starters. Christensen countered four walks with three strikeouts, and allowed only one baserunner to reach third base. In the second game, Hmielewski fanned the first five batters he faced and ended with eight strikeouts.

McNamara got Friends' first baseman Barry Cobb to ground into a double play to end the first game and Churchman retired Kyle Warner on a slow grounder in the nightcap to lower the 'Cats' season ERA to 0.78.

"We're kind of sacrificing individual accomplishments for the good of the team in the long term," Clark said. "We have to get some of that pitching depth out on the mound."

K-State's offense made things easy for the pitchers by pounding Falcon starters Ken Hansard and Will Johnson. The 'Cats chased Hansard in the third inning of the opener after scoring 13 runs on 14 hits.

The 'Cats struck quickly in both games. Lance Wilson led off the opener with an infield hit and scored on Craig Wilson's triple to right field. K-State sent 10 batters to the plate in the inning and scored five times on six hits.

Things got worse for Hansard in the second. Hmielewski tripled to left field to score Craig Wilson and Brian Culp, and Brad Rippelmeyer knocked in Hmielewski for an 8-0 lead.

Hmielewski, who had five RBI in the first game, tagged a three-run home run over the right field wall off Hansard in the third. Lance Wilson added a two-run triple later in the inning to complete the rout.

"In this type of weather, you don't want the ball hit in the air, and we hit the ball on a straight line a lot today," Clark said. "When you've got the wind blowing in, that's the way you've got to play the game."

In the nightcap, K-State sent Johnson to the dugout in the third inning with eight runs on six singles. The 'Cats took advantage of three Falcon errors to build their lead to 10-0.

After Johnson was pulled, Scott Stroth greeted Friends reliever Chris Howell with a two-run single that scored Rippelmeyer and Blair Hanneman.

Dave Christensen pitches to a Friends University hitter in the opener of a doubleheader Tuesday afternoon. Christensen combined with Greg McNamara to throw a no-hitter as the 'Cats downed the Falcons.

"Around 1982, I knew retirement was facing me, and I was scared," Nelson said. "I had always had this as a hobby and baseball cards were becoming popular, so I decided to open the shop."

Besides memorabilia, Dev's Dugout is full of K-State lore. Nelson can tell you stories for hours about the former greats he has seen in purple and white.

your tough losses," Nelson added, "like the one-point loss to Marquette in 1977 in the second round of the NCAA tournament and the loss to Syracuse in 1975 in the Eastern Regional Championship of the tournament."

Being the Voice of the Wildcats also enabled Nelson to meet many people in the business.

"The most satisfying thing with broadcasting was the contacts I made with people," Nelson said. "Most of the time, sports leads to good fellowship, and I got to be real close with the people I met."

Nelson entered into broadcasting when it was just becoming popular. He said he remembers when there was only one radio station in the state and ballgames were heard only by tape delay.

Some of Nelson's first assignments as a broadcaster came off the court. He gained experience by broadcasting some rodeos in the summer.

"When I started, I don't think I knew the difference between a steer and a horse," Nelson said with a laugh.

Although he has been approached to get back on the air, he has declined the offers.

"I was afraid I wouldn't be prepared, and you've got to be prepared because if you listen to broadcasters today, you can tell if they've done their homework," Nelson said.

Although he hasn't been asked to broadcast a K-State game, Nelson is uncertain whether or not he would broadcast for his alma mater.

Nelson has also been approached by eager students hoping to get some tips from one of the top broadcasters in K-State history.

"I still get students who come in and ask me to listen to a tape of their broadcast," Nelson replied, "and I'm more than happy to do it."

"I kind of envy them because they have so many opportunities. If they want it bad enough and are willing to put their nose to the grindstone, they can do it."

Wildcats to face
MizzouDAN WICKER
Sports Reporter

If incentive will count as a victory and lead K-State to a strong finish in the Big Eight Conference, then it had better start to kick in.

K-State has dropped its last five conference games, including losses to Iowa State and Oklahoma State at Bramlage Coliseum, en route to a 12-13 overall record and a 2-10 record in the Big Eight.

With only two games remaining on the schedule before the Big Eight Tournament in Kansas City, Coach Dana Altman said the team has a desire to finish the season strong.

"I think the team has a little incentive to finish out the year strong. The team has kept its motivation and is playing for some pride," Altman said.

That motivation and pride will be put to a test tonight at 8:05 when the Missouri Tigers invade Bramlage Coliseum.

Missouri captured a two-point victory earlier this season in Columbia, Mo. when K-State missed a chance to tie at the buzzer. The last time Mizzou came to Manhattan, however, the Tigers carried the No. 1 ranking in and dropped a 65-58 decision to the 'Cats in front of a national ESPN viewing audience.

"They are 6-6 in the league, and with (Anthony) Peeler and (Doug) Smith, no one is safe with those guys. Before the season, they were the best 1-2 punch in the conference," Altman said.

Missouri, just as every other team in the Big Eight, has suffered its share of setbacks and devastating losses during the rough and tumble 1990-91 Big Eight season. One of those setbacks came last week in Ames, Iowa, when Missouri let Victor Alexander and the Cyclones back into the game and then let the 'Clones walk away with the victory.

"They have had some ups and downs. They may have had a few more ups and downs than some of the other teams," Altman said. "I know Anthony's knee problem had something to do with that. When he is healthy and playing, they are a lot different ballclub."

K-State was put in the position to win the game in Columbia this year.

"I hope we have the same type of effort. We lost by two there. So I hope we can come out and play hard and make that big play, that extra effort to get us over the hump," Altman said. "I don't foresee us changing much that we did from down there."

Atmosphere at Colorado downright depressing

Dan Wicker

Sports Reporter

Two weeks ago, I traveled to the Coors Event Center in Boulder, Colo., to cover the 100th meeting between K-State and Colorado.

The fans did not arrive for the game until almost tip-off time, and kept slowly trickling in through first 10 minutes of the first half. But what surprised me was still to come.

In a season where the Buffaloes had a winning record, and had the chance to climb out of the conference cellar for the first time since the 1985-86 season, the Event Center could only manage half capacity.

The Event Center will hold 11,199, but only a pathetic 5,221 fans turned out for the matchup. The Buffaloes, who have the best 1-2 punch in the conference in Shaun Vandiver and Stevie Wise, had all ready knocked off Nebraska, which at the time of their matchup, was leading the Big Eight. Their other Big Eight win was recorded against Iowa State.

Once the game started, the fans sat on their butts and only tried to ridicule K-State. Now, I know K-State fans like to ridicule the visiting players and are good at it. I have been in the stands for many of the home contests. But we also yell for our own squad.

I don't think the Colorado fans knew what it meant to cheer for the home team. Granted, at a few times the Event Center might have registered on the decibel level, but compared to the Bramlage Coliseum fans it wouldn't even have been a contest.

A breakaway dunk by Jean Derouillere or a trey from Marcus Zeigler will make for a deafening roar in Bramlage. At Colorado, I could have almost talked to somebody sitting on the other side of the arena.

K-State fans are some of the greatest a basketball team could ask for, and this is a thank you to the fans for sticking with the team through thick and thin.

"The fans have been outstanding, and they have done a great job," K-State coach Dana Altman said recently. "I think they have stuck with us for a number of reasons. Most of the games have been entertaining, and our effort has been good. We appreciate the support."

Even with the down season this year, K-State's attendance average has still remained at 10,428, which will probably rank it one of the top 30 in the nation.

If you are not attending the games because you don't want to see the 'Cats lose, you are using a pretty weak excuse. K-State has been in the hunt for the victory in almost every Big Eight game. This is a conference which has been rated the toughest in the nation this year by USA Today, and any team can win on any given night.

Since that win Colorado got against K-State two weeks ago, they have won on the road at Iowa State and knocked Kansas into a tie with Oklahoma State, but the attendance level there has only averaged 5,511 during the season.

K-State fans, don't let yourself slip into this pool. Keep up one of the richest basketball traditions in the nation for many years to come.

Glee club tours Kansas schools

SEAN MORAN
Collegian Reporter

Singing on tour may sound like an easy way to see the world, but members of K-State's Men's Glee Club said it was also a lot of hard work.

Recently, the Men's Glee Club toured the Wichita area. The trip included performances at four area high schools and an evening concert in Wichita for K-State alumni and prospective high school students.

Tour days began early for the group, which is comprised of 76 non-music majors. The group left Manhattan at 6:30 a.m. in a large bus and two vans.

Once they were on the road, the majority of the group went to sleep, hoping to get some final rest before the day of performances began.

"The tours are done to give the singers a chance to perform what they've practiced and to act as a recruiting device for the group and the university," said Jerry Polich, director of the glee club.

The first stop on the tour was Sedgwick High School. After a brief warmup, the group performed for about 150 students in the gymnasium.

The concert, as do all tour performances, lasted about 30 minutes. The group sang songs of many different types, including folk songs like "Old Tom Wilson," a Kentucky Mountain song; religious songs like "Last Words of David"; and fun songs, like "Splish Splash" and "The Auctioneer."

Following the performance at Sedgwick, the group loaded up and headed to Clearwater, where they performed a similar concert and ate lunch at the school cafeteria.

By this time, the bus ride became more lively. People started telling jokes and soon the bus was buzzing with noise.

"I think the tours are good because we get to spend the day with the group and get to know some people in the group," said Tim Johnson, president of the glee club and senior in industrial engineering.

Two more high school concerts followed that afternoon. Stops at Mulvane and Derby high schools took up the afternoon and it was then time for supper.

With two hours to kill before its performance at the Wichita Marriott, the group headed to Towne East Mall for supper at Wyatt's Cafeteria and free time for shopping and relaxation.

After arriving back at the Marriott, many of the singers opted to stay on the bus and watch "The Simpsons" on the bus television. Others wandered around the hotel, which happened to be housing the Miss USA contestants.

Finally, the last concert was given and the singers, who were by now almost hoarse, loaded up one last time and headed for home. This ride went like the first one, with many of the members asleep in their seats.

The bus pulled into Manhattan about midnight, when everyone stepped off and headed separate ways. Although a day of classes was missed, many of the members said it as a fun experience.

The glee club performs on a Kansas tour at least once a semester. This year, the group has gone on one other tour, visiting rural Topeka high schools, and said plans include one more tour in April. April's performance will include performances at Kansas City high schools and will conclude with the national anthem at a Kansas City Royals' game.

"It is a sacrifice because it takes you away from a day of class," Johnson said, "but the benefits make it more of a positive experience than a negative one."

College offers class in scientific writing

MIKE MARTIN
Collegian Reporter

A course with no tests may sound simple, but to the students in the College of Agriculture's scientific writing course, there is nothing simple about it.

"There are no tests, but the class is hard enough without that," said Nora Ransom, English instructor who teaches the course.

Ransom said the course, which is the only one of its kind offered at K-State, is designed to teach graduate students manuscript writing.

The goal of the class is to have a journal article, based on the student's thesis or dissertation, ready for publication by the end of the semester, she said.

Learning how to write a title, writing correctly and concisely and how to write a general introduction are what the first part of the class focuses on, she said.

The middle of the semester is spent working on the first half of the paper, while at the end of the semester the students critique each other's papers.

They then revise them and turn in a final draft, upon which their grade for the course is solely based, she said.

"The average length of the final copy is usually 25 typewritten, double-spaced pages.

"The published length is usually no longer than five pages, due to the fact that it is not unusual for a publication to charge $250 per page," she said.

She said she also keeps a record of who gets an article published and in what publication.

"The publication rate is high," she said.

The class is first offered to graduate students in agriculture, then if there are any openings left, students from other departments can enroll.

"The class allows a maximum of 14 students, but that is really pushing it," she said.

"The agriculture department really accepts the class, they are aware of the need for good writing."

Students who enroll in the class are also aware of the need for good writing.

"I thought it was useful, it was different than most composition classes," said Karen Warren, graduate student in animal sciences.

"It made me more aware of common mistakes and of what you're writing," Warren said.

David Wright, graduate student in agronomy, said the course was effective and he would like to see it required for all agriculture students working toward doctorates.

"A course like this helps students get a jump," he said.

Spring Break

Resorts predict great ski conditions

Cooler temperatures, more powder replace last year's warm temps, icy slopes

ANDREW CAPPS
Collegian Reporter

Spring breakers who are venturing out for fun and sun in Colorado should look for great skiing ahead. All reports indicate that the weather is great, and the powder is fresh.

Each year, students pack their skis, poles, boots and other needed items into a car and drive to Colorado during spring break for fun and exercise. This season is expected to be as good as ever. With poor ski conditions at selected slopes last year, skiers can look forward to a great spring break this year.

"Last year was awful in different places. Steamboat was the only resort that had any snow at all," Ada Cherp, reservation agent in Grand Junction, Colo., said.

"It started real well last year, but it got warm causing the slopes to get icy. It will be a lot better than last year," Cherp said.

Steamboat has reported that it is on a record-setting pace, and has had a great season.

"We are doing about 2 percent better now than we did for all of last year," Rod Hanna, director of public relations at Steamboat resort, said.

Hanna said students are not choosing to spend spring break at Steamboat and expects only about 1,000 college students to visit this year.

Many college students are expected to be skiing at Summit County, Colo. Summit County consists of Breckenridge, Copper Mountain and Keystone resorts.

"Spring break is the best time to go skiing, the skiing conditions are at an optimum and it's just a fun time to be at the summit," Rachel Flood, public relations coordinator for Copper Mountain, said.

"The ski conditions are very, very good. We had a little bit of a slow start but it started snowing and hasn't let up," Flood said.

More snow has been falling on the average than last year and the temperatures have been ideal. Temperatures in the low 30's are considered to be ideal skiing temperatures, Flood said.

In the spring, skiers run into what is known as the freeze-thaw syndrome. This occurs when the snow on the slopes freezes during the night and thaws during the day.

"We try to groom our intermediate and beginner slopes every night but the trick is to follow the sun," Flood said.

When the slopes are still frozen in the early mornings, Flood's advice is to ski all the eastern slopes.

"Ski the eastern slopes in the morning and by about 11 a.m. everything is soft," Flood said.

"The skiing is great and so is the powder," Flood said.

Places to stay at Copper Mountain are located at the base of the mountain. The cost is about $125-$140 a night for four people and are within walking distance of the lifts.

Brenda Wilson, secretary for Classic Travel Tours in Manhattan, said many students are going to the Summit.

"You can choose where you want to go, you have a choice of three mountains," Wilson said. "It's also a lot easier to get around. Shuttles run for people who don't want to drive."

Rachel Ratzlaff, junior in pre-occupational therapy, is one of 12 K-State students in her group traveling to the summit. Ratzlaff said her group chose the summit because she has an opportunity to stay for free, and she really likes to ski at Breckenridge.

Ratzlaff said she decided to go skiing for several reasons.

"Padre is a tourist trap, and I just want to have fun and exercise," she said. "It's nice to be outside, and it's fun and relaxing."

Hotels at Winter Park cost about $40-$80 a night, based on the location, and $80-$99 at the base of the mountain for two people.

Ron Lackey, senior in agriculture economics, took a semester off from school to do something he's always wanted to do — work in a ski town and be able to ski frequently.

"I was burned out on school, and I always wanted to just be a ski bum," Lackey said.

He said he spent the spring of 1990 at Vail resort working as a waiter in a lodge at the base of the mountain.

"I skied five days a week, every week. It was great," he said. "I was there for five months and had the best time."

Lackey chose to work and ski at Vail because it is the largest mountain resort by acreage.

Lackey's advice to spring breakers is to have fun and enjoy skiing. "Get in shape before you go, carry a backpack full of food and beer and have fun," he said.

Vail reports a base of 41-42 inches with 114 trails open.

Prices for lift tickets at the resorts vary.

"Ski the Summit," Vail and Steamboat tickets are $35. Winter Park tickets are $32.

Skiing reports and conditions are changed each day and are updated every half day. By calling 1-800-USA-SNOW. Skiers can receive skiing information 24 hours a day.

Cities prepare year-round for student crowd

Daytona works for safe, fun week

KEVIN CARROLL
Collegian Reporter

Spring break 1991 will offer plenty of excitement and fun in Daytona Beach, Fla., but the success of the plan in the background requires hard work and dedication.

It takes an entire year of planning by the citizens of Daytona to prepare for the arrival of more than 400,000 college students during spring break.

The Daytona Chamber of Commerce, in connection with the Daytona Police Department and the Visitor's Bureau, have teamed up to ensure that the college students visiting their city have a safe and fun spring break.

The Spring Break Festival Task Force is made up of business people, city managers and members of the sheriff's ocean-front beach department, said Suzanne Smith, vice-president of special events and tourism for the chamber of commerce.

"We have been working all year long coordinating events, managing traffic problems and informing students about beverage laws," Smith said. "We review spring break activities and make recommendations on how to make it work so that the overall timing and location of the events don't overlap each other."

Daytona police also have their job cut out for them.

"The preparation for such a large number of students in the city is a very time consuming job," said Sgt. Bill Tillard, police information officer for the Daytona Police Department. "You don't want 400,000 people to show up and not have a plan of action."

"With such a large crowd in the city at one time, the citizens of Daytona must be ensured that their daily activities will not be affected," Tillard said.

One of the biggest problems the police face is parking.

"We have combated the problem by issuing resident parking permits. Anyone caught parking in an unauthorized parking space will be towed."

Tillard said they have learned, by past experience, to make changes through new city ordinances. These ordinances should provide a successful spring break not only for students, but also for the citizens of the Daytona area.

"In 1989, Fort Lauderdale closed, and we were hit with many more people than we expected," Tillard said. "Sometimes it takes experiences such as this to show you that organization is required."

"Party Smart" is the theme for spring break this year. "Party Smart" is an alcohol awareness program developed by the Beer Drinkers of America that urges adults who have made the decision to drink to do it responsibly, Smith said.

The local bars require that persons not yet 21 wear a wrist band to indicate that they are underage. The hotels require that those who are registered also wear wrist bands so that the hotel security can monitor traffic throughout the building.

"We have provided seminars for bar owners so that they can detect fake drivers' licenses," Tillard said. "The purpose of the wrist bands and seminars is to have bar and hotel owners take some of the pressure away from the police department so that we can concentrate on other duties."

Smith said Daytona Beach is the No. 1 student destination in America. The large number of vacationers during spring break brings $170 million of direct income to the city of Daytona.

"We want everyone to have a good time and go home with great memories of their stay in Daytona," Smith said. "The long-term goal we strive for is to provide such a memorable experience so that students will continue to visit Daytona even after their college days."

UPC trips fill up quickly; students look to hit the beach in Florida, hit the trails in Arizona

LISA NOLL
Collegian Reporter

While some K-State students will be soaking up the sun in Florida during spring break, others will be roughing it in the Grand Canyon.

Both vacation packages are being offered to students by the K-State Union Program Council.

Students going to Florida will be spending their vacation in Panama City Beach, the new hot spot for spring break.

The trip costs $265 and includes seven nights lodging at an area motel and round-trip transportation by motor-coach from K-State.

Amy Brackhahn, sophomore in industrial psychology and co-sponsor for the trip, said the UPC vacation packages are successful because the students are able to give a lot of input into what they want.

"It's for the students, so we try to do everything we can for them," Brackhahn said.

K-State students will be joined in Florida by the University of Kansas, Wichita State and Emporia State.

Brackhahn said involving the other schools is a good way to meet a variety of college students.

The sponsors from the four universities have already met twice in Emporia to discuss ideas for the trip.

"We have activities planned for the students everyday like volleyball tournaments, barbecues and beach parties," Brackhahn said.

Tracy Lilly, junior in social work, said she is going to Panama City Beach because she loves Florida.

"I want to go somewhere warm and come back with a tan," Lilly said.

The 40 students going to the Grand Canyon will probably not be working on their tans or playing volleyball. Instead, they will be hiking along unmaintained wilderness trails that range from four to 14 miles.

Charla Bailey, outdoor recreation adviser for UPC, said the sign-up for the trip began at 8 a.m. Feb. 8 and was full by 9:30 a.m.

The trip cost is $46 and includes meals on the trail, camping permits, cooking equipment and road maps.

Jennifer Tuvell, chairperson for outdoor recreation, said the Grand Canyon trip is popular every year.

Last year students began camping out for tickets the night before the sign-up, Tuvell said.

UPC is able to keep the cost of the trip low because transportation is not provided for the students.

Students are also expected to provide their own backpack, sleeping bag and tent.

Clay Walter, junior in journalism and mass communications, said he decided to go on the trip because he likes the outdoors and camping. The low cost was also a factor.

"I went to Padre last year and I wanted to get away from the major crowds, and this was something different," Walter said.

Three trails are available on the trip. The UPC sponsors recommend that students be in good physical condition because the hiking may be very demanding.

The students will also be expected to function without an authoritarian leader.

Walter said he expects his group, which consists of 16 students to be very dependent on each other for support.

Tuvell and Bailey said the trips are going well so far, and they are receiving a lot of positive feedback from the students.

Students going to Florida will spend March 8-17 in Panama City Beach; those going to the Grand Canyon will be there March 10-14.

Missouri offers nearby ski resort

LORIE BYSEL
Collegian Reporter

If funds are low this year, but that's not stopping you from trying to get something together for spring break, then try something close and inexpensive.

Snowcreek in Weston, Mo., is a man-made ski resort.

"We have 12 runs from the top of our three main slopes," Dave Grenier, general manager, said. "They run from 1,500 to 2,000 feet long."

Snowcreek is open seven days a week — from 1 p.m. to 10 p.m. Monday through Thursday and from 9 a.m. to 10 p.m. Friday through Sunday.

"Our slopes are 100 percent fully lighted," Grenier said.

"You make snow the same way nature does only we need cold weather instead of clouds," he said.

"We have a machine that takes water and compressed air and propels it into the air," he said. "It then turns into a snowflake before it ever reaches the ground."

To make one foot of snow on a 1,500-foot run it takes about 24 hours, he said.

"We start making snow at night when it hits anywhere from the mid- to low-20s all the way up to 30 degrees," Grenier said.

Sessions at Snowcreek are $18 during the week and $23 on the weekend. Equipment charge is $11.

Doug Wertenberger, junior in business, has skied Snowcreek.

"When I went, it was kind of slushy and it didn't have as much snow as Colorado," he said.

"For being in Missouri it was alright," he said. "It's a lot better to drive two hours to ski instead of 12."

"It would be an alright place to go if you didn't have any place else to go," he said.

Snowcreek is close to KCI airport, so there are plenty of hotels close by.

The Best Western has a package deal to stay for one night and ski for one day for $28. This includes lift tickets and ski rental.

"We have excellent spring skiing," Grenier said.

"Now that it's getting warmer you can ski and work on your tan at the same time," he said.

A couple of favorite sessions they have are the TGIF on Fridays for $20, lift and rental included, and the midnight ski session on Friday and Saturday nights for 11 p.m. til 4 a.m.

Every year on New Year's Eve Snowcreek sponsors a non-alcoholic party.

"This year we had over 1,000 people show up, and it keeps getting bigger and bigger every year," Grenier said.

Excessive sun can be dangerous

Sun lovers tend to ignore possible health risks

LORI STAUFFER
Staff Reporter

Spring break inevitably brings out sun lovers. It is natural for most students to head to the slopes or the beach for fun and sun.

This practice, however, may be seriously endangering their health.

Experts say it's not that students aren't aware about many of the health risks, they just choose to ignore them. And, now that there are new studies that have uncovered more problems related to sun exposure, students may be getting into more trouble health-wise than ever before.

It is not unknown that the sun causes premature aging of the skin, but what most people don't know is the possible eye damage and crippling of the immune system also related to sun exposure.

Eye damage, caused by sun exposure, is a long-term process. Over the years, the constant bombardment of ultraviolet rays can turn the eye's clear lens brownish, like a piece of cellophane exposed in a window. Eventually, cataracts and partial blindness may result.

"Long-term exposure to the sun definitely brings out the tendency for cataracts in some people," said Dr. Robert Cathey, dermatologist.

Another frightening consequence of sun exposure is the effect it may have on the body's immune system.

Doctors have long known that sun-tanning causes outbreaks of herpes sores on the lips of susceptible people, Cathey said. Since the herpes virus is always latent in these patients' bodies, scientists think ultraviolet radiation may suppress natural defense mechanisms.

Cathey also said the ability to fight off cancer-causing cells, such as malignant melanoma, squamous melanoma and basal-cell carcinoma, is also hampered by exposure to UV light.

In an Australian study, volunteers were given a dozen 30-minute treatments with solarium lamps, and then had their blood cells tested for the ability to ward off malignant melanoma, a cancer so dangerous that one-fifth of its victims die within five years of diagnosis.

The volunteers' natural killer cells had decreased in number and lost much of their disease-fighting capacity, even a week after exposure to UV radiation stopped.

"I've heard about some of the problems sun-tanning causes but I always think it won't happen to me," said Natalie Norris, sophomore in early childhood development.

Norris said she often tans in the summer, if she's not working, and occasionally uses a tanning bed throughout the year.

Dan Skala, manager of Southern Sun tanning salon, said that in a six-state region, which includes Kansas, there has been only one reported case of a person with cancer caused by exposure to UV rays in a tanning bed.

"That was a case where the woman owned her own bed and used it everyday for an hour for about three or four years. There is no proof that the beds cause cancer. It's all rumors," Skala said.

"Ultraviolet light in a tanning bed is much more controlled than sunlight," he said. "The lamps are regulated to emit only 5 percent of actual sunlight."

This may be true in comparison to 20 minutes exposure to the UVA rays the sun emits and 20 minutes exposure to the lower emission of UVA rays in a tanning bed, Cathey said. But exposure to ultraviolet rays is still not healthy, he said.

So, what is considered safe exposure to the sun? There just simply is none, Cathey said.

Avoiding the sun is more difficult than most people realize. Some doctors recommend slathering on sunscreen even before a brief walk outdoors. Others recommend sunscreen if the individual will be outside for over 15 minutes.

"A short jaunt from the house to work, the person is probably OK," Cathey said. "Where the person gets in trouble is when they are exposed through recreation or occupation. For those who are in the sun while golfing, sailing or ranching or farming, that is when they should be using sunscreen."

A problem with determining which sunscreens to use has come into focus of the Food and Drug Administration because many lotion companies began adding protection from UVA rays to their claims.

Most sunscreens block UVB rays, shorter wavelength radiation that causes sunburn and some skin cancers. The longer UVA rays, which are also emitted by tanning beds, were once considered safe. Growing evidence shows, however, that UVA rays contribute to aging, cancer and cataracts.

While full screening from UVA is desirable, protection is difficult to measure, and the FDA hasn't yet set a standard.

A healthier alternative to sun-tanning is using self-tanning lotions.

Protecting skin from sun's rays

Whether going skiing or to the beach, protecting your skin from the sun is important. Here are some tips to keep your skin healthy:

- Use a high SPF (Sun Protection Factor) sun screen. Twelve months a year, whenever you go out, rub a liberal amount of sunscreen to block the sun's burning rays. For maximum safety, re-apply every few hours or so and after swimming or perspiring.
- Shield your eyes. Wear UV-blocking sun glasses or coated prescription lenses that also provide protection. Sunglasses also help shield the area around your eyes.
- Wear protective clothing. A tightly woven cotton shirt will screen out most ultraviolet radiation. The tighter the weave, the greater the protection. Avoid loosely woven polyester, which lets large amounts of UV rays through.
- Be alert to skin changes. If you notice any, see your doctor immediately. Although skin cancer is the most common malignancy, it is also the most curable — if caught in time. Keep a keen watch on any dark moles.

Source: Reader's Digest

GREGORY A. BRANSON/Collegian

They last almost as long as a natural tan — about three to five days — and give the same golden tan received by the sun.

The problem may lie in the stigma old streaky orange products gave to the self-tanning lotions. Students may be unwilling to try them.

"I never would have thought to use it," Norris said. "I always thought it would look funny. But, I saw someone the other day that used some and she was proof that you can't tell the difference between the lotion and a real tan."

"Now I'm considering a selftanning lotion instead of using a tanning bed before my house's formal," she said.

"I haven't seen any problems at all with the self-tanning lotions. The use of the lotions seems to be more popular now," Cathey said.

More good news may be that fashion industry trends show the deep dark tan is on its way out. Still, most students feel pale skin isn't as attractive as skin with a light tanned hue.

"There really is an emphasis put on tans and on summer. I think a fewer people would tan if their wasn't so much focus on it," Norris said.

Crew trains for regatta

Team to compete in annual Heart of Texas during break

ANDREW CAPPS
Collegian Reporter

While most students think of fun and relaxation during Spring Break, the K-State crew team will spend its Spring Break in Austin, Texas preparing for the annual "Heart of Texas Regatta."

The team will leave Manhattan and travel first to Waco, Texas to train twice a day for six days. After practicing on 16 miles of open river water they will travel to Austin for the race on March 16.

The length of the regatta is typically 1,250 meters but because of a scheduling conflict the race this year will be shortened to 1,000 meters.

"The Audi Masters race is the day after so they reduced the length of the race," said Michael Janzen, crew president. "It will basically be a sprint."

The "Heart of Texas Regatta" is a 10-15 team race with four different categories. K-State will be competing in five eight-man races including light-weight men, open men, open women and novice men and women.

K-State will have two boats of four men in each of the five race categories.

Other teams participating in the regatta include the University of Mexico, University of Texas, University of Kansas, and Notre Dame.

Races range from eight-men boats to two-men boats. "We will break them down into four-men boats. This gives us a chance to allow everyone to race in two or three races," Janzen said.

"We like to take everybody down during spring break, it gives us a chance to get in a lot of miles on the water. It's a real good experience to go down there and learn to really row," Janzen said.

Traci Cole, junior in food and nutrition and exercise science, said she enjoys spending her spring break in Texas but "it's not all social, we practice a lot."

With this being the first race of the season the team hopes to do well and Janzen predicts to be "in the top two definitely."

The team lost four men from the 1990 team and have eight men returning. "We have a real good attitude and we hope to do real well," Janzen said.

After returning from the "Heart of Texas Regatta," the team will compete every weekend until the end of school.

War changes few students' plans

STACY HILBURN
Collegian Reporter

Most students are still making plans for spring break, despite the war in the Persian Gulf.

Mike Penner, Union Program Council director, said both UPC trips filled up on the first day they were offered.

Theresa Mueller, junior in advertising, had planned on taking the trip to Panama City. Later, she found out her dad was going to Saudi Arabia, and changed her plans to spend spring break with her mom.

Mueller said she did not think twice about going home. She said spring break is not important to her now.

Jeff Williams, director of sales for Sunchase in Fort Collins, Colo., said the people have been waiting longer to make reservations. He said students are trying to not let the war affect their lives, and they want to enjoy their last years of school.

Shelley Gowdy, owner of Travel Unlimited, said numbers are up drastically from last year.

Gowdy said people may have been hesitant at the beginning of the war, but tight airport security has eased many people's apprehensions.

The only cancellations related to the war were from those who were called to active duty or had relatives in the service, Williams said.

Club to sponsor Padre Island trip

MELANIE SCHOENBECK
Collegian Reporter

The Marketing Club is sponsoring a spring break trip to Padre. Kyler Tarwater, junior in marketing and vice president of fundraising for the club, is coordinating the event.

"Anybody is welcome to go because there is still room. It is fun to go to Padre with a large group. You meet a bunch of new people all from Kansas," Tarwater said.

The trip is through Campus Beach Club. Normally, people must register for the trips 45 days prior to spring break.

The deadline, however, is being extended to 30 days to increase overall participation in spring break, Tarwater said.

"If you wait until the last minute to make your spring break decision, the good properties will be gone. Our spring break is during the peak week," Tarwater said.

The most inexpensive trip Tarwater can offer college students through Campus Beach Club is a five night stay for $159 or a seven night stay for $194.

A $50 deposit is required for this trip and Padre-goers will be billed by Campus Beach Club. Due to the time element, Tarwater began to handle payment procedures in mid-February.

"You can go to Padre cheap. It depends on what kind of accommodations you want. Where you stay can totally make your spring break," Tarwater said.

A round-trip motor coach is a possibility if 44 people desire that mode of transportation. If the coach becomes an option, it will cost individuals $100, Tarwater said.

Madeira Carpenter, sophomore in business, is going through the Marketing Club to plan her spring break. She is planning to drive to Padre with three friends.

"We want to go somewhere warm because we are tired of the Kansas weather. We've heard about Padre and we want to see what it is like," Carpenter said.

The Campus Beach Club package includes lodging, a welcome celebration, one free windsurfing or sailing session, co-ed volleyball, tour directors, resort taxes and a farewell party.

Shopping in Mexico, nightclub trips and cruises are optional activities and not included in the price of the trip. People participating in the trip will have to pay extra money for the optional activities, Tarwater said.

K-State spring break facts

When it's time to set the books aside for a breather, modern-day Cats have it better than their predecessors. A few quick spring break facts:

- Currently the break lasts nine days: From 1949-55, it was four days. From 1965-66, it was six days. From 1967-70, it was eight days.

- First known as spring recess, it was before Easter weekend.

- The break always fell in March or April, depending when Easter was.

Spring break trips sometimes frauds

Students should deal with local, reputable agency

LORI STAUFFER
Staff Reporter

Last year, some K-State students planning to spend spring break on the beaches at Cancun, Mexico, were unhappily surprised to find their vacation in paradise would not be as perfect as they had hoped.

When they arrived, they discovered their promised hotel rooms were not available. They were forced to sleep on the beach.

"A lot of people got stung last year because of companies like this that take advantage of students," David Garvin, owner of Creative Travel, said.

To avoid getting stuck with a less-than-expected tour package, Garvin recommends dealing with a reputable agency with whom the student is familiar.

"Stay away from fly-by-night companies. A known company may cost more, but the student will get what was promised," he said.

Bob Pearson, manager of Kansas State Travel, said students will not be paying more by using a travel agency to make spring break plans. The commissions received by the travel agents are paid by the airlines or hotels, not by the student.

"The travel agent does the legwork for the individual. It takes the worry out of the planning and it is at no additional cost to the customer," Pearson said.

If students want to make travel plans themselves, Pearson cautions against using unknown companies that advertise in magazines.

"God only knows what business it is. If the student takes the hot deal advertised, they will be taking a chance," he said.

Jan Willey, travel agent at Travel Unlimited, said it is important to read the fine print, and if the deal sounds too good to be true, it is.

"If it's too cheap, who knows what you're going to be sleeping with. You may be sleeping in a tent," she

Checking out those spring break "deals"

- Ask location of the company offering the tour package, then call the Better Business Bureau in that city to see if there have been any complaints filed against them.

- Find out how long they have been in business and ask for references.

- Read the fine print in advertisements, contracts and tickets.

- If a company offers insurance, buy it.

- Purchase tickets, hotel accommodations, whatever possible on credit cards.

- Get a written confirmation for hotel accommodations.

said.

Garvin said to check out the company offering the tour package thoroughly by talking to the Better Business Bureau about complaints filed against the company. It is also important to ask the company for references.

"Ask for other schools and students they've worked with. Call those students and find out if the company did what it promised," Garvin said. "I can almost guarantee that the company that burned the students last year will be on some other campus this year."

Students should use local operators with whom they can have personal contact with when planning their spring break trips, he said.

"Inquire around town, and around the state, before dealing with third parties out-of-state," Garvin said.

Pearson said scam operations are not that common, and that it is not a critical problem. However, he said they are out there and that students should be aware.

"Above all, know who you're dealing with," he said.

Outdoor activities inexpensive

Backpacking, canoeing, biking spring break alternatives

MIKE MARTIN
Collegian Reporter

Backpacking, biking, camping and canoeing are not traditional spring break activities, but they can be at a very inexpensive cost.

"The rental equipment for trips like these is fairly inexpensive," Jan Lewenberger, treasurer of the Prairie Packers club, said.

People do need to plan ahead if they want to rent equipment such as packs and tents during spring break, Dave Colburn, manager of The Pathfinder, said.

"Spring break offers people a good opportunity on one hand, but all the rental equipment is usually zapped up by then," Colburn said.

Recreational Services started renting equipment Feb. 20, Steve Martini, associate director of the services, said.

They offer a two-week reservation period for their camping equipment.

I recommend the Ozarks for anyone backpacking and hiking.

—Dave Colburn
Manager of the Pathfinder

"It depends on the weather if a lot of equipment is rented out," Martini said.

Colburn agrees that Mother Nature plays an important role when planning trips.

"The weather makes planning trips like these a hit and miss situation," he said. "I recommend the Ozarks for anyone backpacking and hiking."

"Snow is slim and rain is possible, but spring is starting to happen there," he said.

Kansas does offer some backpacking at Perry and Clinton reservoirs and at Elk City Lake, Colburn said. But it is marginal backpacking at best.

"It seems real artificial to follow a reservoir, it's not much of an experience," he said.

The Prairie Packers is a club that is oriented toward outdoor activities in and out of the state, Lewenberger said.

During spring break, they are sponsoring a canoe trip on the Delaware river to watch bald eagles, he said.

The club also sponsors trips such as caving expeditions in Missouri and canoe trips to observe buffalo in Kansas, but there is not a great number of sponsored trips in the area.

"Liability makes it difficult for a business to sponsor a trip," Colburn said.

For people wanting to go on biking trips, Colorado is the obvious favorite for mountain biking, but Missouri also has a lot to offer.

The Missouri Department of Natural Resources is currently renovating unused railroad routes into biking and hiking trails, which are bordered by the Missouri River and limestone bluffs.

Parachute Club prepares to train spring rush of first-time jumpers

MELANIE SCHOENBECK
Collegian Reporter

Jumping onto the field at a K-State football game is one of the ways parachute club members display their skills.

The four stadium jumpers competed by seeing who could land the closest to the eye of the wildcat located in the middle of the field.

"It is nerve-racking to jump at a game just for the fact that there is a crowd down there watching you, and you don't exactly want to land in the parking lot," Jason Smith, senior in agriculture economics and president of the parachute club, said.

As warm weather and spring approaches, club members said they are looking forward to preparing people for first jumps. First-jump classes are offered every fall and spring. Currently, the club has one instructor and three jumpmasters, which are instructors who go up in the plane with the jumpers, Smith said.

"Last fall, we trained about 80 people for first-jump classes. Right now, we have about 30 people signed up to parachute," Smith said.

A person completes his or her first jump with a static line. The line is hooked to the parachute and airplane. When the jumper lets go of the airplane, the parachute is automatically opened, Smith said.

"The FAA and United States Parachute Association have guidelines the club must follow," Smith said. "The training methods we have require you to do a minimum of five static line jumps. Then you have to be cleared by your jumpmasters to go any further. It is a slow progression method into the free fall."

The parachuters keep a log book with information about each jump they make. This allows the club members to apply for licenses through the United States Parachute Association. The four license categories range in requirements from 25 jumps to 200 free falls, Smith said.

"The second jump a person takes is usually worse than the first. It's because you begin thinking about what you are doing up there," Smith said. "However, once you start getting comfortable with it, you don't really think about the altitude or look down. You are thinking about what to do with each jump."

Carolyn Farris, sophomore in elementary education and member of the parachute club, has jumped nine times. Her first jump was in October.

"I heard about the club, and it sounded appealing. I joined because I thought it sounded like something unique to do. I like to do things that are adventuresome and fun," Farris said.

The parachute club travels to a small airport in Wamego with an asphalt runway and four hangars to participate in a day of jumping.

William Dawes, associate professor of engineering technology and parachute club sponsor, owns a Cessna 182 that carries four jumpers and one pilot, Smith said.

"He has students here on campus that are commercial pilots or flight instructors that fly the plane for us and have been trained to fly jumpers," Smith said.

"Sometimes they go home for spring break or stick around an extra day to jump," Dawes said.

Although the club is not planning anything specific for spring break, it is in the process of possibly putting together an accuracy contest for the spring.

Accuracy is measured in centimeters with an electronic scoring pad. If the contest is held, it will be on the field at the Chester E. Peters Recreation Complex, Smith said.

"We usually jump every Saturday and Sunday. We start jumping in the morning and jump until sundown," Smith said. "If it is a full moon, we will jump until midnight. Jumping at night is great because you can see the lights of Topeka like you are right over the top of them."

Merchants don't view break as problem

SEAN MORAN
Collegian Reporter

While K-State students are relaxing during spring break, Aggieville merchants will notice a decrease in business, but most don't see it as a major problem.

"It has an effect," Jon Levin, president and general manager of Varney's, said, "but it's nothing we worry about."

Levin said a couple of recent changes have made an improvement in business during the break.

"I've notice a couple of changes recently," Levin said. "There are a lot more married students in Manhattan now, so this is home for them. There are also a whole lot more students living in apartments, and they tend to come back early or never leave."

David Colburn, manager of the Pathfinder, also said that having the students away doesn't necessarily mean a large drop in business.

"Traditionally, we're slower," Colburn said, "but we're not totally student-oriented. Some of our clients aren't comfortable when the students are around and will come in while they're gone."

Colburn also said the deployment of Big Red One will have an effect on his business during the break because soldiers often stopped in during that time.

While the vacation doesn't seem to affect some businesses, others notice a drastic difference.

"We're really dead," Tammi Rogers, manager of Aggie Ski and Sport, said. "The two weeks before spring break are really busy, but the break gives us a chance to recover from the rush."

Some merchants even use the break as a time to take their own vacation. Sonny Ballard, owner of Ballard's Sporting Goods, usually goes on vacation during spring break. Ballard said business goes down about 30 percent during the break.

One way Aggieville maintains business during spring break is the annual St. Patrick's Day parade. The parade is in its 13th year and often brings visitors from five or six states to Manhattan.

Although the parade brings many people to Aggieville, most of the merchants said it isn't profitable.

Transportation choices reflect trip destination

WADE RAMSEY
Collegian Reporter

Depending upon your travel destination, it may be more advantageous to fly than to drive.

"If you fly instead of drive, there are several advantages. Naturally, flying takes less time and is more comfortable. Probably the biggest advantage is that it's more comfortable," said Debbie Edwards, of International Tours of Manhattan.

"With the war in the Persian Gulf, a lot of people are afraid to fly. There's been a pretty big difference in people wanting to take that risk. People are scared. But they still say that flying is safer than driving," said Connie Steinman, of Kansas State Travel in Westloop.

"Driving is more of a time hassle. You have to stop to eat and get a hotel. You have baggage to worry about," she said.

Both admitted that driving to nearby destinations is cheaper than flying.

"It would be cheaper to drive to, say, Padre for spring break than to fly. It would be cheaper to fly to the coast," Edwards said.

"Flying from Kansas City to Oklahoma City is about $200 right now. It would probably be cheaper to drive to Oklahoma City," Steinman said. "But flying to Washington, D.C., would be cheaper than driving."

"Of course, if you drive you have a way to get around once you reach your destination," Edwards said.

Car rental is not an option available to many traveling college students, she said.

"Most major car rental agencies require you to be over 25 and have a major credit card in your name," she said. "A lot of students don't fit both those requirements. They really sock it to the student age group. Some companies will rent to students, but charge more per day or require a cash deposit."

Car rental agencies usually charge between $30 and $50 per day for unlimited mileage. Car insurance is an additional $6 to $7 per day, Steinman said.

"Renting a car is still cheaper than taking a taxi all over town," she said.

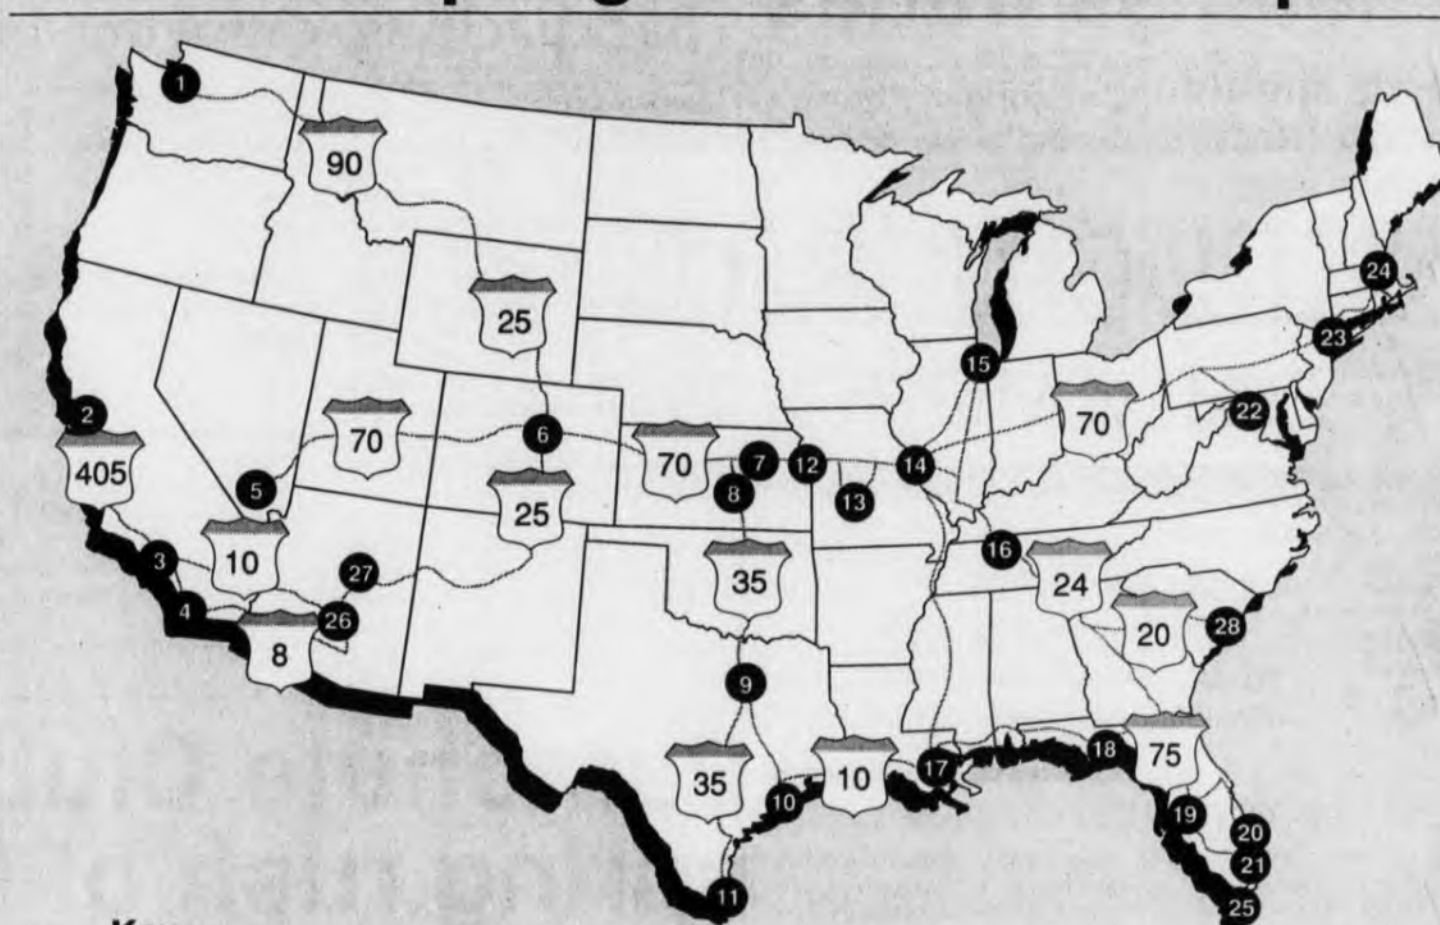

Students going to Florida for spring break should consider cruises, Steinman said.

"Cruises are a real bargain. The cost includes round-trip airfare to the port, transport to the ship and up to eight gourmet meals a day. There are some extra costs, like alcoholic drinks, tips, massages and skeet shooting, but cruises are a good deal," she said.

Advertised package deals for student spring break trips are sometimes more expensive than others, she said. The advantage of arranging trips through such companies is the specifics of your trip can be settled in one phone call.

"They're quick. In one phone call you can get the address where you will be staying and other details. But they are often more expensive," Steinman said.

Spring break alternatives abundant

PAULA BERGLUND
Collegian Reporter

Spring break does not have to mean crowded beaches or ski slopes. The United States offers many fun, exciting and inexpensive alternatives for spring break.

Padre, Cancun and central Colorado are still very popular spots. But if big crowds, long lines, noise and spending money are things you would like to avoid, then the hot spots are not for you.

Many people are avoiding the cost of an airline ticket by driving. This spring break, cars are going to Dallas, St. Louis, Colorado and Padre.

Some areas in the United States are too distant, but less expensive airline tickets are available. These places include Chicago, New York, Georgia and Detroit.

If skiing is what you want to do for spring break, avoid the central Colorado crowds and head south. Colorado offers ski areas in the southwest corner of the state. Wolf Creek and Purgatory offer great snow with smaller crowds.

Other states that offer snow skiing are Idaho, Nevada, California, Vermont, Maine and New Mexico.

If you have had enough snow to last a year, then you are ready for the beach. Great beaches that are not as crowded during spring break are Myrtle beach in South Carolina and Hilton Head in North Carolina.

Florida is another warm alternative. The Florida Keys are located close to Sea World and Wet & Wild. The Keys are one hour from the beach and 20 minutes from Walt Disney World.

The Sanibel Island in Florida is also growing in popularity.

"By avoiding the crowds and trying some new places you find people like yourself who are also avoiding the crowds," Nancy Dailey, travel consultant for International Tours of Manhattan, said.

Cruises can be expensive, but they are the most economical. You pay for the trip in advance. This price includes your airline ticket and all expenses except alcoholic beverages and activities off the ship. Three, four and seven night cruises are available.

Arrangements for spring break should be made around Christmas time. But last-minute planners still have a chance.

Connie Steinman of Kansas State Travel said, "There are always trips available. They may not be exactly what you want. But we do our best to come close."

Spring break is also a good opportunity for job interviews. This time allows you to visit more than one city at a time. This helps cut down on airline fares.

Willie does the beach thing...

Sailing club ready for warm weather

MELANIE SCHOENBECK
Collegian Reporter

During spring break last year, a group of eight sailing club members flew to Fort Lauderdale, chartered a boat and sailed to the Bahamas for a week.

Although the sailing club is not planning a spring break trip this year, they are preparing for a busy semester that includes learn-to-sail classes, boat safety and rescue demonstrations, sailing videos and a car wash.

"Currently, we are getting members for the coming year. We are planning general activities for the semester in a broad sense," said William Jahne, the sailing club adviser.

"The three big things we do as a group every year are educating and teaching people to sail, having a racing team, and we are also a social club," said Stephanie Metzger, senior in social sciences and the sailing club commodore.

New sailing club members must pass an exam after attending sessions and studying a manual.

Once a new member passes the learn-to-sail exam, experience levels move individuals through the ranks of laser skipper, intermediate skipper and cal skipper, Metzger said.

"Usually we have two large races that are intercollegiate each semester," Rob Swenson, senior in computer science and member of the sailing club, said.

In the fall, the sailing club is host to a competitive event in Manhattan. The University of Kansas has the spring competitive event at Lake Shawnee.

People are interested, and they can't believe there is a sailing club in Kansas.

—Stephanie Metzger senior in social sciences sailing club commodore

"People are interested, and they can't believe there is a sailing club in Kansas. We've got it great here because the KU sailing club has to drive to Topeka to get their boats. We're 10 miles from the lake," Metzger said.

The sailing club owns four two-sail boats, two one-sail boats and two windsurfers. Ownership of the boats is made possible through club dues, fundraisers and donations.

"Our club allows us to be members of the Blue Valley Yacht Club, and we pay them dues that allow us to use their facilities," Metzger said.

"The club is open to anybody whether you have ever been on a boat or not. We have about 30 people who pay dues every semester and receive unlimited use of the boats."

Some of the money from dues is used for boat maintenance, life jackets, food and drinks for cook-outs and newsletters, Metzger said.

"We are a group of like-minded people who are out to have fun, go sailing, promote teaching people to sail, compete and enjoy social life together," Swenson said.

"I would bet that we had 250 to 300 students register to vote," Ra-born said. "I'd like to get 7,000 to 8,000 students registered for the general election."

Increasing student involvement is one of Stunkel's priorities. She said she hopes to make the students a viable part of the city government.

"I really hope we can double or quadruple the number of students registered," Stunkel said.

"I think you can accomplish anything with hard work," Ferguson said. "I plan to work very hard."

Candidate Jim Dubois, associate professor of interior architecture, finished fifth in the primary with 751 votes. The lone candidate to be eliminated from the race was Stanley Crowder, who received 189 votes.

Mary, who also did not wish to give her last name, said she has been homosexual all her life.

"I'm not ashamed of it. I don't try to hide it, but I don't wear it on my chest either," she said as she pointed to her shirt.

Mary's female partner is a 1st Infantry soldier in Saudi Arabia. She said they had joint bank accounts and she also has power of attorney.

"She looks at everything as a typical American dream," Mary said.

"We have plans of getting married, and she wants to have a child."

Aaron Carriker, senior in marketing, said he felt sorry for panel members because they were homosexuals.

"I'm a religious Christian," Carriker said, "and I look at it (homoosexuality) as wrong."

Brad Stutz, sophomore in business, said he was against the idea of homosexuality.

"The Bible says no man shall lie with another," Stutz said.

He said he and his friends have gone to the Liberty Memorial in Kansas City, Mo., and harassed homosexuals there.

"We were what they might call gay-bashers," Stutz said. "We would do that kind of stuff."

Mary said she thought gay-bashers have a problem with themselves, not with homosexuals.

"Ignorance is one of the biggest problems," she said.

Detamore said there is no difference between a gay lifestyle and other lifestyles.

"We fight about money and jealousy," she said. "It's just with someone of the same sex."

ESCAPE WITH UPC TRAVEL
To St. Louis
April

Did you stay home and work over spring break? Now is your chance to make up that lost spring break and get away before finals! The accommodations will be near the ever-popular Union Station, a festive marketplace with shops and restaurants. Plus, don't miss St. Louis Centre with over 100 stores. Also, join the city in celebrating the 25th anniversary of the Arch, attend a Cardinal's baseball game, or just enjoy the beautiful river-front with its many attractions. No matter what you do, one thing's for sure—it will be a blast! So grab a friend and don't miss out. This trip includes roundtrip transportation and hotel accommodations. Info Meeting: Monday, March 4, Union Room 208, 7 p.m. Sign-up begins: Tuesday, March 5, 8 a.m.-4 p.m., in UPC office, 3rd floor Union.

Bush announces halt of war Suspension dependent on Iraqi action

ERWIN SEBA
Staff Reporter

President Bush said coalition forces would cease offensive operations in the Persian Gulf War at midnight EST, Wednesday (11 p.m. CST, Wednesday), during a televised speech to the nation Wednesday night.

The suspension of offensive operations would continue as long as Iraq did not fire upon coalition forces and did not fire Scud missiles at coalition member-states or other nations, Bush said.

A permanent cease-fire could be arranged when Iraq released coalition prisoners of war, the remains of coalition troops who have died in the war, third-country nationals and Kuwaiti detainees, the president said. Iraq must also announce it will comply with all 12 United Nations Security Council resolutions relating to its invasion of Kuwait.

As part of that announcement, Bush said, Iraq must announce its willingness to pay reparations to Kuwait for the damage done by its occupation.

"Kuwait is liberated. Iraq's army is defeated," Bush said at the beginning of his 8 p.m. CST address from the Oval Office.

He said the coalition shares in all Kuwaitis' joy at being liberated.

"A joy which is tempered only by sympathy at their ordeal," the president said. It is also not a time to be boastful, he said, but a time to be proud of the "people whose strength and resolve made victory quick, decisive and just."

"This is a victory for all mankind and for the rule of law," Bush said. The president also told the Iraqi people that they were not America's enemies in the war.

"You, the people of Iraq are not our enemy. We have not sought your destruction," Bush said. "We look forward to the day when your nation is led by people who are committed to peace."

The president said he was sending Secretary of State James Baker III to the Middle East for consultations with coalition partners on the post-war peace.

"We can be a catalyst for peace," Bush said. "The war is now behind us. Ahead of us lays the difficult task of securing a potentially historic peace."

Securing such a peace is possible, said a historian of the Middle East from Manhattan, but it would involve resolving long-standing area conflicts and solving problems that have plagued the region since the early part of this century.

Sarah Shields, who earned a doctorate in Middle East studies from the University of Chicago, said the instability inherent in the boundaries of the current Arab nations, drawn by Britain and France after World War I, must be removed.

As an example of this instability, she pointed to the borders shared by Iraq, Turkey and Iran, which divide the homeland of the Kurdish people. The Kurds, a non-Arab people, have been persecuted by all three nations.

These borders, and others throughout the Middle East, Shields said, were based on the needs of the colonial powers and not in best interests of the people in the region.

Resolutions must also be found to the continuing problem of Lebanon's instability and to the problem of the ongoing denial of a homeland to the Palestinian people, she said.

The undemocratic nature of Middle Eastern countries must be changed to promote further regional stability, Shields said. And the inequities of wealth between Middle Eastern nations and between people within those nations must also be solved.

By insisting that reparations be paid by Iraq to Kuwait, however, President Bush may be increasing the likelihood of conflict in the area, she

Allies inflict damages on enemy

In his press conference Wednesday, Gen. H. Norman Schwarzkopf updated reporters on allied progress to date.

He said allied forces have liberated Kuwait City and have prevented all routes of escape from the city.

Meanwhile, the Republican Guard is trapped in the northeast corner of Kuwait, pinned between allied forces and the Euphrates River. Air forces have prevented retreat across the river by destroying most bridges across the waterway.

The Marine amphibious unit stationed off the coast of Kuwait remains in the water, part of a massive feint by the allied forces.

Big Red 1 soldier killed Sunday in gulf action

DAVID FRESE
Staff Reporter

A 1st Infantry Division soldier was killed in action Sunday.

Pfc. Melford Collins of HHC 5th battalion 16th Infantry Regiment was killed this weekend in what Pentagon sources called a hostile action Sunday. Collins was a petroleum supply specialist from Uhlend, Texas.

He was 34.

Department of the Army spokeswoman Capt. Barbara Goodno said Collins had been in the Army since May 1985.

The Cable News Network reported Tuesday a soldier from the 1st Division died when he stepped on a land mine or an unexploded shell, but Goodno said she had no details on where or how Collins died. The CNN report did not identify the soldier.

Goodno said she could not confirm the report, but said it was consistent with the Pentagon's listing of a hostile death.

A 2nd Armored Division (Forward) soldier was also killed in action Sunday, Goodno said. The 2nd Division is attached to the 1st Division in support of Operation Desert Storm. The name of the 2nd Division soldier has not been released pending notification of relatives.

A K-State student riding a bicycle was hit by a car at about 11:30 a.m. Wednesday in the northeast corner of the B-2 parking lot.

Jianjun Wang, graduate student in curriculum and instruction, was taken to Memorial Hospital where he was treated and released.

K-State police officer Roy

Doughty said Wang was hit by a southbound car driven by Becky Nordin, sophomore in mechanical engineering. Wang's bicycle hit the left, front fender of the car. Nordin said she was looking for a parking space when Wang rode his bike in front of her.

"I didn't even see him," she said. "I looked that way to turn, and he was there."

Nordin said Wang stood up after the accident, and she told him to lie still. She said he expressed concern about missing class.

Capt. Charles Beckom, K-State police, said the accident caused less than $500 damage to the car and bicycle.

There was no ticket issued for the accident, Beckom said.

UAB members, students address chalking issue

Concern about freedom of expression prompts discussion

LAJEAN RAU
Staff Reporter

Students concerned about freedom of expression convinced the University Activities Board to further investigate before regulating sidewalk chalking.

The UAB's agenda Wednesday night included voting on new campus organizations and discussing a proposed revision of campus publicity regulations. One of the proposal's new items — regulations of chalk messages on campus — overshadowed other business.

A group of about 10 students sat and waited while three potential campus organizations told the board about their purpose and goals and were voted on to be registered. Then the group spoke up.

After more than an hour of discussion, the consensus of both board members and students was that sidewalk chalking has broader implications than the board's proposed regulations.

"I think you may be talking to the wrong people," said Barb Pretzer, administrative assistant to the K-State Union director.

The proposal drafted by a special committee of UAB stemmed from an increase in the past several semesters in student interest in chalking campus sidewalks as an alternative form of expression.

Until this proposal, no rules existed regarding using chalk for sidewalk messages or art.

Monday night K-State police stopped a group of protesters chalking anti-war messages and took their names pending charges or restitution for the action.

Someone wrote in chalk on the K-State Vietnam Veteran's Memorial Jan. 16.

One of the protesters stopped Monday night said she was confused about just what was allowed and what was not.

New traffic signal to be installed

LORI STAUFFER
Staff Reporter

A new traffic signal will be installed at the intersection of Denison Avenue and College Heights early this summer.

The need for the signal was called to the attention of the Campus Safety Task Force, which was formed last year by former student body president Todd Johnson.

Rob Dieringer, former task force chair and current campus safety director with student government, said there were many complaints from faculty, staff and students who cross the street at that intersection.

He said crossing the street early in the morning and in the late afternoon is particularly difficult due to the heavy traffic in the area.

The administration, prior to forming the task force, had been lobbying and working with the city to install a traffic signal, Dieringer said.

"They were already working in the wings with this plan for the traffic signal but hadn't really moved with it," he said. "We just got the cogs and the gears moving and said, 'Hey, let's put this thing in now. Let's not let this sit on a dusty book shelf any longer.'"

Dieringer said one traffic light costs around $60,000.

"I guess the reason is all the wiring, the signal itself, the mechanism that makes it work. I thought it would be around $10,000 at the most," he said.

Because the price tag was so high, the University itself was unable to come up with all the money needed.

"Since it is on the city-University border, the administration asked for a joint deal with the city for each to pay 50 percent of the bill," Dieringer said.

The task force urged the administration to capitalize on the offer before the city pulled the offer and spent the money elsewhere, he said.

Tom Schellhardt, assistant vice president for administration and finance, said the University money promised for the traffic signals was earmarked last year to be taken from the central reserves.

"We were looking at the crosswalks, and a signal there at Denison and College Heights based upon input from students for several years. It was probably October 1989 that we started to look for funding for that intersection," Schellhardt said.

Another concern the task force had was the pedestrian traffic at Manhattan Avenue, Dieringer said.

Traffic signals, additional crosswalks and ways to funnel pedestrian traffic to the available crosswalks were discussed.

Dieringer said the number of students walking and commuting to school was a concern for the task force in the area due to four lane traffic and the number of entrances on to Manhattan Avenue.

The task force discussed planting shrubs or using a chain link fence to guide pedestrians toward crosswalks.

"There are about 16 streets and alleyways on the east side of Manhattan Avenue and three or four entrances into campus. The possibility of funneling that many students to

Site of traffic signal

GREGORY A. BRANSON/Collegian

cross walks is next to impossible," said John Lambert, director of campus safety.

Dieringer said the task force discussed placing a signal somewhere along the avenue, but nothing definite has been set.

"It is up in the air," he said. "We asked the administration to initiate talks with the city concerning a solution to alleviate some of the traffic problems there. But, we didn't come with anything concrete for the avenue at this point."

"I know the city has agreed to continually restripe and repaint the crosswalks. I know that we are interested in looking into the possibility of a traffic light along there somewhere," he said.

Pope wants role in reconciliation

VATICAN CITY — His pleas to prevent the Persian Gulf War having gone unheeded, Pope John Paul II is now seeking to play a role in postwar reconciliation.

As the allies battled the remnants of Iraq's retreating army, the pope, Wednesday, looked ahead to an extraordinary meeting he has called here next week, saying he hopes it can contribute to a just and lasting peace in the Middle East.

John Paul has summoned senior bishops from the United States, Britain, France and Italy to sit down with top churchmen from the Middle East.

Communists accused of coup attempt

MOSCOW (AP) — Pro-reform military officers Wednesday accused eight Communist Party leaders of attempting a coup last month in Lithuania, and said President Mikhail Gorbachev must have known about the plot.

The officers released a report that concluded Soviet troops were responsible for the deaths of 15 people during an attack on the television station in Lithuania's capital of Vilnius. Their report was published in the liberal weekly Moscow News.

The report by the officers, who call themselves Shchit, or Shield, rejected the military's claim that troops were fired on by demonstrators.

It also rejected a claim by Soviet Defense Minister Dmitri Yazov that the troops were only ordered to maintain order, rather than help the shadowy National Salvation Committee seize power during the pre-dawn clash Jan. 13.

"The participation of Soviet military in the government coup was planned beforehand, coordinated and approved in the center (Moscow)," said the report. "The president cannot have not known about the planned action."

Interstate banking bill endorsed

TOPEKA (AP) — The Senate is likely to debate a bill next week that would allow limited interstate banking in Kansas.

The Senate Committee on Financial Institutions and Insurance Wednesday sent the bill to the Senate for floor debate after two days of hearings. The measure was endorsed on a voice vote, with none of the committee members dissenting.

Sen. Alicia Salisbury, R-Topeka, suggested that the state should enact such legislation before a federal mandate comes down requiring interstate banking.

"What we don't want in Kansas is the federal government telling us how to set up interstate banking," Salisbury said.

Last year the Senate approved a similar bill. The House passed the measure earlier this month on 73-48 vote.

Finney said she will sign the bill if she is confident credit would be available in smaller towns and if credit decisions continued to be made locally.

Waste bill approved in first round

LINCOLN, Neb. (AP) — The legislature gave swift, first-round approval Wednesday to omnibus legislation giving Nebraska a significant increase in power over operation of a planned low-level radioactive waste dump.

Lawmakers voted 39-0 to advance Gov. Ben Nelson's measure and make amendments to it after less than an hour of the debate on the issue. The legislature has dealt with this issue for much of the last decade.

The amendments to the bill, which combine two low-level radioactive waste measures Nelson had introduced, became the meat of the bill after a 31-0 vote.

Under the amendments, the state chosen for the Central Interstate Low-level Radioactive Waste Compact's disposal facility would be able to bar access by compact members to the waste warehouse, if the legislatures don't pass a version of the bill.

Stephan may, may not testify

KANSAS CITY (AP) — A former employee who accused the Kansas attorney general of sexual harassment is reportedly scheduled to testify before a federal grand jury today.

The grand jury has been taking testimony periodically since December on allegations that Attorney General Bob Stephan lied during a trial related to the sexual harassment case filed by Marcia Tomson Stingley, a former clerical employee who now lives in San Diego.

The Kansas City Star reported Wednesday that Stingley will appear before the grand jury.

It was also reported that Stephan was scheduled to testify today, but the report could not be confirmed. The U.S. attorney will not comment because grand jury proceedings are secret.

Stingley's 1982 sexual harassment suit was settled out of court, and terms of the $24,000 settlement were supposed to be confidential. Stephan disclosed the amount of the settlement at a news conference, prompting Stingley to file a breach of contract suit.

Convocation series concludes today

The University Convocation Series will conclude today at 10:30 a.m. in McCain Auditorium with a presentation by Judy Chicago.

Chicago is an internationally acclaimed artist and author best known for "The Dinner Party," a multi-media installation celebrating the history of women in western civilization through a series of 39 place settings on a triangular table longer than 46 feet on each side.

Her art and writing have explored the achievements of women, scrutinized creation myths and examined the effects of power on men.

Chicago will present "The Birth Project, Powerplay and Beyond." She is currently involved in working on a historical, philosophical and feminist view of the Holocaust in order to illuminate the meaning of the Genocide.

OPERATION DESERT STORM

Fort hospital prepares additional beds, rooms

DAVID FRESE
Staff Reporter

Irwin Army Community Hospital at Fort Riley has doubled its number of hospital beds in anticipation of casualties from Operation Desert Storm.

The hospital normally operates 130 beds but has increased to 260 since the Persian Gulf War began. Rooms that normally held four patients have been increased to five; administrative areas and offices have been converted into patient rooms; and the pediatrics ward on the hospital's third floor has been changed into rooms for wounded soldiers.

Most of the casualties sent to Irwin Army Hospital will be intermediate to minimal care patients, said Col. William Parry, commander of Irwin Army Hospital. But he said he did not anticipate filling the hospital with the reports of low resistance from Iraqi forces in the theater of operations.

"We've had time to prepare our hospital just as Gen. Schwarzkopf has had time to prepare the battlefield," Parry said. "But if we don't have to take any casualties in, I'd just as soon not."

Parry also said there have been no 1st Infantry Division soldiers returned to Fort Riley because of combat injuries. There have been some troops returned for medical problems other than combat injuries.

A slight increase has been noted in patients reporting to the hospital's mental health units, Parry said. Most of these have been spouses experiencing stress and veterans experiencing some post-traumatic stress syndrome.

Parry said most wounded soldiers would be sent to Europe then to primary military medical hospitals throughout the nation. Only after that would they be turned over to Fort Riley, Parry said he had no way of knowing whether he would receive only Fort Riley soldiers or soldiers from other divisions, but he said the hospital's lack of burn treatment facilities would mean burn victims would have to be treated elsewhere.

Parry also announced Wednesday that blood-donor quotas at the hospital have been reduced to pre-ground war levels. The donor center on the hospital's first floor is now only asking for 25 donors a day as opposed to the 50 donors a day the hospital had previously requested. In contrast, Parry said the peacetime blood-donor quota is 12 donors per week.

Kuwait City freed

1st, 3rd Divisions clash with Iraqi army

By the Associated Press

DHAHRAN, Saudi Arabia — In a desperate, last-ditch defense, Iraqi tank crews fought a losing battle against America's 1st and 3rd Armored Divisions and 2nd Armored Cavalry Regiment Wednesday in the desert outside Basra, as the 4-day-old allied offensive rolled toward a final rout of Iraq's army.

Hundreds of tanks of the U.S. armored divisions clashed with a Republican Guard division in a key showdown in the U.S.-British push to drive the Iraqi army into the Basra corner.

Escape routes were limited from around the southeastern city, which is hemmed in by rivers on two sides and by Desert Storm troops elsewhere.

Troopers of the U.S. 101st Airborne Division stood less than 100 miles from Baghdad, in the deepest penetration yet of Iraq.

Wednesday's battle in Iraq's Southern Desert, west of the southern Iraqi city of Basra, was the biggest armor engagement since World War II.

North of Basra, the Iraqis hurriedly threw pontoon bridges across the Euphrates River, a U.S. military official reported. But tanks retreating north across the expanse would be vulnerable to air attack. Permanent bridges across the river were destroyed in the air war.

The continuing battle in Iraq's Southern Desert was the biggest armor engagement since World War II.

Desert Storm commander Gen. H. Norman Schwarzkopf told reporters Wednesday: "Our intention was purely to eject the Iraqis out of Kuwait and to destroy the military power that had come in here."

Iraq, its troops under furious air and ground assault, announced early Tuesday it was abandoning Kuwait. By Tuesday afternoon, the Iraqis had pulled out of Kuwait City, and by Wednesday the Kuwaiti flag was flying again over the capital, for the first time since the Iraqi invasion last Aug. 2.

In liberated Kuwait City, joyous residents flocked to the streets to cheer their flag and throng triumphant U.S. and Saudi troops. "Thank you, America!" they shouted.

Just west of the city, U.S. Marines defeated the Iraqis in a major tank battle at Kuwait International Airport, ending the last organized resistance in Kuwait.

Schwarzkopf said more than 50,000 Iraqis had been taken prisoner. Tens of thousands of Iraqi troops are believed to have been killed or wounded in the air and ground campaigns. Schwarzkopf said the command would not produce any Iraqi death count.

The Americans had defeated at least four of six Guard divisions in two days of fighting, Pentagon sources said.

The cease-fire hour for Operation

Desert Storm arrived Thursday morning, 100 hours into a lightning allied ground war and 209 days after Saddam Hussein's troops marched into Kuwait.

Although President Bush said allied troops were suspending their attacks at midnight EST Wednesday, U.S. warplanes were still roaring into the air on missions at dawn Thursday. But an hour before the cease-fire hour of 8 a.m. local time, a senior U.S. military source said all allied offensive land, sea and air actions — including the relentless bombing of Baghdad — would stop at the cease-fire deadline.

Iraqi and Soviet sources said Iraq had informed the United Nations it has accepted all Security Council resolutions on the Gulf War, as demanded by the United States and its wartime allies. However, there was no official confirmation.

Iraq's state radio signed on Thursday with defiant rhetoric, making no mention of Bush's speech minutes before.

"This is Baghdad, the voice of dignity and pride, the voice of justice and force... From Baghdad, the graveyard of the criminal invaders, Good morning," a radio announcer said.

F-15s zoomed off runways at the big Dhahran air base in eastern Saudi Arabia after Bush spoke.

Likely KCT, K-State merger may affect governments

Heitschmidt says campus in Salina will probably have college council status with Student Senate for travel reasons

DAN SCOTT
Staff Reporter

With the merger of the Kansas College of Technology and K-State looming in the distance, the status of the student government in the Salina school has been placed in jeopardy.

Todd Heitschmidt, K-State student body president, said the KCT student government will, most likely, be treated as a college council. If this happened, the group would receive the same considerations as the K-State Engineering College Council.

The problem of having senators drive about 70 miles to Manhattan once a week for meetings has caused Heitschmidt to question the incorporation of the two student senates.

"At this point, I don't see them having a seat on Senate," Heitschmidt said. "Finding someone dedicated enough to make that drive every week is unlikely."

If treated as a council, Heitschmidt said the KCT student body president would become a member of the K-State cabinet and have speaking privileges. Any funding the KCT student government wanted would have to be approved by the K-State Senate.

"At this point, I don't see them having a seat on Senate."

—Todd Heitschmidt
K-State student body president

KCT Student Body President David King said the body plans to handle its own affairs.

"There's a lot of business that goes on at K-State that doesn't concern us," King said. "If something pertains to us, we'll get involved. If it doesn't, then we'll leave it alone."

Presently, the KCT student government is running as usual. The only changes have been in moving up the student elections from mid-April to March 22, King said.

Following the election, he said the new senate and the old senate will work together to find a solution to the student government's future.

"We're just starting to open the lines of communication," King said. "We're going to form a task force to look into this."

King said he would not know the future of the KCT student government for certain until April 1.

KU Med Center studies Norplant

HOPE SWARTZ
Collegian Reporter

A new form of contraception has been introduced to the U.S. market that is 99.7 percent effective, second only to sterilization.

Wyeth Ayerst, the company manufacturing the drug, Norplant, has spent 20 years developing the drug testing it in 55,000 women.

The drug contains progesterone and comes in the form of six capsules that are inserted in the upper, inner arm of the patient.

Dr. Julie Strickland, assistant obstetrics and gynecology professor at the University of Kansas Medical Center, said the capsules are effective for five years, but a woman using the contraceptive may have the capsules removed at any time, and fertility usually resumes after three months.

The company has designated KU as the area training site. So far, the KU medical team has inserted the device in two women, she said.

"The drug is not recommended for women with abnormal menstrual bleeding, liver problems, pregnant women or those with blood clotting problems," Strickland said. "The major side effect of Norplant is a significant amount of abnormal bleeding, such as spotting and irregular bleeding during menstrual cycles."

Strickland said KU is charging $470 for the drug and insertion fees and $100 for removal. Placing the capsule in the arm is only a minor office procedure.

Cathie Barry, supervisor of the Women's Clinic at Lafene Student Health Center, said hospitals in the area are still waiting for Norplant and have yet to do the implant in any patients.

"It's only just been approved, and we have information about Norplant, but we don't have any available," she said. "The expense of the procedure is not even in the ballpark for college students."

Memorial Hospital has yet to receive the drug either. Cathy Bulk, unit coordinator for The Saint Mary Hospital, said the procedure would not be available there.

EDITORIAL

Less losses may mean more wars for U.S.

"It is well that war is so terrible; else we would grow too fond of it." Robert E. Lee (1807-1870), Confederate general.

One does not need the intellect of a rocket scientist to conclude that death in war is a nasty way to depart this world. In addition to this conclusion, most people would also deem modern warfare as risky business, very risky business indeed.

Which is essentially why the majority of Americans pay a small minority of Americans to fight and die for the majority.

Which is also why I have to laugh at the false bravado with which a great number of youthful, ripe-for-the-pickin', supporters of the Persian Gulf War shout insults at and malign anti-war protesters. If these so-called patriotic supporters really wanted to demonstrate their support for the war, then what are they doing here? Why aren't they in Saudi Arabia with the rest of our troops? Why haven't they enlisted? As you may recall, we didn't exactly see a gaggle of fanatic "Christian soldiers" trample Armed Forces recruiting offices across the country in a mad, patriotic rush to die for God and country when this conflict began.

I suspect most of the patriotic hooah we are witnessing is about as thin as a sheet of cheap toilet paper. For you see, most of the bleating from the support-the-war corner is coming from people who, as I pointed out earlier, recognize warfare for the risky business it is and want nothing to do with it. But they sure love to watch it.

A logical question one might ask is, "Just how risky is the job of being a soldier in the U.S. military?" Until the destruction of a barracks in Riyadh on Monday by a Scud missile, the war had all the indications of being the equivalent of a Saddam birthday party at Showbiz Pizza Place.

Needless to say, historically, warfare has not been waged with such low casualties. The war with the most U.S. casualties, which includes wounded, non-combat deaths and killed in action, was World War II, with 1,078,162. It was nothing to see hundreds, even thousands of allied soldiers killed in a single battle.

At the battle for Arnhem on the lower Rhine in September, 1944, the British 1st Airborne Division, which had been dropped near the city, lost all but 2,163 of some 9,000 men to the withering fire of two German S.S. panzer divisions.

As another example, in December 1944, the Germans launched the now famous "Battle of the Bulge," in which 8,000 Americans were killed, 48,000 wounded and 21,000 captured or missing; German losses

Brad Seabourn

were almost beyond belief — 120,000 men killed, wounded and missing.

But these are simply examples of soldiers dying en masse, which does not give much of an indication of actual risk.

"The 1991 World Almanac and Book of Facts" lists casualties for the principal wars of the United States. By converting the number of casualties for each war to a quantity based on a per 100,000 population basis, we can make some comparisons to the per 100,000 rate for some selected causes of death, as cited by the U.S. Department of Health and Human Services.

For instance, the leading cause of death in the U.S. is cardiovascular disease, which killed Americans in 1989 at a rate of 372 deaths per 100,000 population. Cancer, in all of its forms, killed at a rate of 199 deaths per 100,000 population. We had people dropping like flies in 1989 from such things as ischemic heart disease: 198.6 deaths per 100,000; acute myocardial infarction: 98.4 deaths per 100,000; chronic obstructive pulmonary diseases: 33.6 deaths per 100,000; pneumonia: 29.9 deaths per 100,000; and all sorts of accidents, including those resulting from motor vehicles, falls, drownings, fires, firearms, poisoning, etc.: 37.2 deaths per 100,000. In fact, if you total the occurrence of death in the U.S. in 1989 from all causes other than what could be termed natural death, the rate was 862 deaths per 100,000.

By comparison, the Vietnam War killed American servicemen and women at a rate of 600 soldiers per 100,000.

The Korean War killed Americans at a rate of 1,000 soldiers per 100,000.

The second World War killed Americans at a rate of 2,500 soldiers per 100,000; the first World War at 2,400 soldiers per 100,000.

The Civil War was the grand daddy of them all — 16,400 deaths per 100,000 Union Soldiers.

Despite the obvious risks of war, American politicians and the naive populace they only slightly represent truly love war. The commander of the U.S. Third Army in World War II, Gen. George Patton, said as much, and I believe he is correct.

In the 200 years since this country's inception, we have fought nine major wars, four of which occurred in the last 50 years. In between the major skirmishes, we managed an attempt to invade Cuba; an invasion of the Dominican Republic; conspired in the assassination of several foreign heads of state; provided surreptitious military support to various rebel groups and governments in Central America; provided naval escort to ships in the Persian Gulf; bombed Libya; sent U.S. troops to Lebanon on two occasions; and most recently, invaded Panama and Grenada. I am sure there are other examples too numerous to cite in this column, but you get the idea.

The upshot is there is not a country in the last 50 years that can equal our propensity for using military force and armed conflict as a foreign policy tool.

So, how does the Persian Gulf War fit into this analysis?

As of 6 p.m. CST, Feb. 26, U.S. personnel killed in action in the gulf war totaled 55, with 30 missing in action. Non-combat deaths equaled 50. That is roughly 20 deaths per 100,000. About the same rate as deaths from automobile accidents.

With losses like that, our love of using war as an instrument of foreign policy can only grow fonder.

Editorials

Pros should not participate

It seems somewhere along the way, the United States has lost sight of the original purpose of the Olympic Games.

Corporations are paying millions of dollars to advertise on the networks during the airing of the summer and winter Olympics. The networks themselves are paying a billion dollars for the privilege to cover and air the games. And now athletes who receive million-dollar salaries to play professional sports will represent the United States in the 1992 Olympics.

What was once a theater for amateur athletes to represent their countries is now becoming big business.

Traditionally, countries have sent their best young, non-professional athletes in each sport to the international games. The emphasis has been on nationalism and sportsmanship, but now it seems the emphasis has changed.

Today, instead of focusing on the purpose of the games, the countries involved are quivering over the definition of "professional" and "amateur" athletes.

The United States will, for the first time, send professional basketball players to the Summer Olympics in 1992 because we, as a nation, don't think it's fair that other countries have athletes trained specifically for the Games.

If the United States sends professional athletes to Atlanta, this new mentality will turn the Olympics into just another opportunity for pros to strut their stuff.

Now, instead of seeing Joe Schmo, unknown athlete, compete with other unknown top-notch athletes, Americans will be watching NBA greats like Michael Jordan and Magic Johnson compete against other pros ... just like any other NBA game.

It may be true other countries are stretching the definition of amateur-status athletes, but that doesn't mean the United States has to follow suit.

Let's, as a nation, set the pace. Let's continue to stress the importance of the Olympic Games as a source of healthy competition between countries for the sake of the sport, not money. Let's continue to give our young amateur athletes the opportunity to represent their country and keep the professionals at home.

Another perspective

In joining a battle that was supposedly to project American values in the Persian Gulf, the Bush administration left one of those virtues — freedom of the press — at home on the dry dock.

Censorship, in several disguises, hasn't stopped the presses. But it has kept the American public from getting the whole story on Operation Desert Storm.

The Pentagon's press pool is nothing new. Neither is military censorship. But experts agree the media are being muzzled to a degree never felt during Vietnam.

Sadly, Americans don't seem to mind the loss of one of their basic rights. In nationwide polls, overwhelming majorities have said the media are reporting too much on the war and reporters should stop being pesky.

No one likes obnoxious people. But reporters wouldn't have to be nuisances if they were allowed to do their jobs without unnatural — and un-American — restrictions.

The end of the battle now appears to be in sight. But that means the war stories are only beginning. Americans deserve to hear them all.

— Daily Nebraskan
Feb. 26, 1991

Pain abounds during time of war

I have been too thoughtless about the war these days, while so many American families suffer separation and worry about death on the battlefield. Now though, maybe God wants me to feel their pain. Maybe I should have felt the pain of the families of the soldiers in the Middle East. Is this why I am facing my own pain now?

The news of the young Kansas soldier's death and his family's reaction caught my eye in the Wichita Eagle last week. Although I felt sorry for the soldier and his family, his death did not directly touch my heart. I sympathized with them because of the painful memory of my father's death.

That was 18 years ago, however, so I did not feel deep sorrow and pain. I consoled my stony heart by mumbling, "It takes a widow to know the other widow."

All that day, after reading the newspaper, something bothered me, but I did not know what. I was thinking about one of my friends who was ill and fighting against pancreatic cancer. I wondered how he was doing in his battle. How was he managing his pain? What feelings did he experience along with the pain and loneliness? How was he preparing for that all-too-real possibility of his own death? I'd better write him soon, I thought.

The mother's sorrow, the one in the newspaper, suddenly struck me as real the next day. I had a cheerful conversation with a mutual friend until she numbed me by announcing our friend's death.

Oh my God. I tried not to feel anything. I suppressed my feelings deep inside my mind and dried my tears just as I did when my father died a long time ago.

It is just a death. I am strong. I should be strong! Life goes on, and my friend had lived a meaningful life. That's what counts. No feelings, no sadness. Only facts. Pain, aches and anger are not too generous. They would not pass from me; they stuck to me. Leave me alone. I cannot afford to feel all of this; I have assignments and homework. I also don't want to appear shaken in public.

I opened my photo album and talked with my dead friend. I threw my pillow away as if I could throw the pain away. I screamed. It should not be real. Why do friends go away? How can my friends leave me alone? For what reason should I become a victim of sickness, accidents, suicide and murder?

"It takes a widow to know the other widow."

Yes, I did not feel the young soldier's mother's suffering. Now, though, I am coming to understand how hard it will be and how long it takes to heal the wounds.

I tried to think of something pleasant so that I could lessen my pain. I thought of the movie "Ghost." In the movie, a young man who died viciously returns as a ghost to visit his girlfriend, to talk to her and protect her. I wanted the movie to become real for me. I wished my friend could visit me.

I am sure my friend is having a family reunion in heaven and gaining strength again. For that, I should be happy. Who knows whether my friend is beside me and can talk to me even though I cannot hear him.

Death comes without notice. Death does not knock on the door before coming in. People wait for at least nine months for a new baby. There may be a surprise delivery, but there is no perfect surprise delivery. The first sign of a baby's arrival is a loud cry. Yet, when the baby does arrive, it brings joy and happiness. But death brings only tears and grieving to those left here in this world.

How can I understand the death of people? How can I understand intermingled life, separation, grieving, suffering, joy and happiness?

Life is not easy to live. The meaning of life should be counted by the quality, not the quantity. If a person lived his or her life fully until the last moment, he or she accomplished much as a human being. This personal belief may ease my pain.

My friend, as a priest, showed me real friendship. He loved people, especially the mentally handicapped, who tend to be shunned. I learned of friendship and unconditional love from him. The young soldier's mother mentioned her son loved being a soldier and wanted to serve his country. My friend and the young soldier fulfilled their lives through their work.

I will experience joy, as well as suffering, as I live my life. I will live my life as fully as I can. I will strive to have a better life. I, too, will help the disadvantaged. Then I might find an answer to what life is about.

You live because life is there ...

Peace Corps takes alumnus to Mayosa

ARLOAH FAIRCHILD
Collegian Reporter

After graduating from K-State, Jim Anderson joined the Peace Corps and is working in a wildlife reserve in Africa.

The Peace Corps is working with the government of Mamunta, Mayosa, to help with the transition from harvesting wildlife to promoting tourism as a way of making a living.

Anderson is educating the people on how to survive without killing the animals protected in the reserve.

"It is important to find an alternate means of living, and that is what Anderson is trying to do," said Keith Lynch, associate professor of forestry.

Mayosa is a warm and humid low-line tropical forest that receives a large amount of precipitation each year, Lynch said. It is a primitive, rural and thinly populated area with scattered villages where natives live. "It is pretty remote from civilization," Lynch said.

"It is easy for us in the United States to be overly critical of those people for killing the animals, but we need to remember they are just trying to survive."

"After Anderson is finished educating the people, they will be able to make a living that is not as harmful or as destructive to the environment," he said.

Lynch said Anderson's job is similar to an extension agent's job in the United States. He has individual interviews with important local leaders and conducts programs for the people of Mamunta.

Rice and fruit are plentiful in Mayosa. Anderson is trying to grow pineapple and think of new ways to prepare rice, Lynch said.

Anderson lives in a concrete block structure with no electricity, which prevents him from use of equipment he would like to use such as overheads or slide projectors.

Anderson recently acquired solar panels for his roof, so he is now able to run a computer and a video cassette recorder, said Anderson's mother, Jean Anderson.

Anderson caught malaria when he first went to Mayosa because the medicine he was taking in the United States was a type the organisms in Mayosa were immune to, she said.

"He lost a large amount of weight before it was diagnosed, but as soon as his medicine was changed, he started feeling much better."

"Jim really likes it over there and has learned to speak their native language," Jean Anderson said. "He has been given the African name of Alie Kamara. Kamara is the town chief's last name."

"I think that most of the people over there have the town chief's last name. Jim became interested in the Peace Corps while at K-State."

Members of the K-State Forest and Park Resource Management Club said they remember Anderson's interest and are trying to help him be successful.

When he needed some supplies to make posters, he wrote a letter to the Department of Forestry and asked if they could send some to him. The Forest and Park Resource Management Club granted Anderson's request.

Lynch said Anderson is a leader. While he was at K-State, he was always willing to help fellow students, and would go the extra mile if he thought they needed his help.

"He is an ideal fit for that situation," Lynch said. "I'm sure the people over there already like and respect Jim."

"I'm sure the people of Mayosa realized quickly he is sincere in wanting to help them to ensure a long-term quality way of life."

"Anderson couldn't have taken a place in this country and have as big of an impact on the long-term use of land."

Anderson will be home in November.

Mrozek takes new position

Department names new head at unusual time

DAVE McCULLAGH
Collegian Reporter

Donald Mrozek was appointed head of the history department Feb. 18, replacing John McCulloh.

Department heads usually serve for five years, but McCulloh served for over six.

"My formal term ended last summer, but there was some difficulty in naming a replacement," McCulloh said.

Mrozek said it is a little unusual to start his term as department head in the middle of the semester.

"Because of a host of reasons, it took extra time," said Jack Holl, associate dean of arts and sciences.

Mrozek said the five-year term is a good way to handle the position of department head.

"The five-year agreement allows rotation and stability in the department units," Mrozek said.

As department head, Mrozek will appoint department committees, be responsible for assisting the department in establishing hiring criteria and be responsible for faculty evaluations and appointment, tenure and promotion decisions, Holl said.

Mrozek, a graduate of Rutgers University, has been at K-State since 1972. He is a specialist in American military history and in American cultural history.

Mrozek said he hopes to continue the improvements in the history department started by McCulloh.

"He (McCulloh) has helped raise the number of undergraduate history majors in the last five years," Mrozek said.

Mrozek said he wants to create an identity among history majors, provide information about careers in history other than teaching and recruit graduate students from other parts of the country.

Mrozek said he blames state budget cuts for hurting the history department and is looking for ways to raise funds to help with the department's budget.

"The budget cuts are unpleasant, but exciting administration changes have encouraged innovation and development," McCulloh said.

Now that he is no longer department head, McCulloh said he will have more time to teach, research and publish.

"It's a very demanding position. You meet people in the department and outside," he said. "There are a lot of good people at K-State."

K-State students assist seniors with community service program

LORIE BYSEL
Collegian Reporter

K-State students help elderly Manhattan residents through a new program called Homeserve.

Homeserve is a program that matches a K-State student with a Manhattan resident from 60-80 years of age who is in need of assistance on a regular basis.

"Most older people are individuals who are living alone in their home and find that it becomes difficult to do small tasks," said Carol Peak, director of the Community Service Program.

The student goes into the elderly person's home and does such things as minor home maintenance, yardwork and crafts with the resident. Together they go shopping, cook or just sit down for a quiet conversation, said Su-Ella McKinzie, student coordinator of Homeserve.

"We currently have 15 successful matches," McKinzie said.

"Our goal is to have 20 matches by the end of the semester," Peak said.

"This program is also a support for the students. Some of the students are far from home and their grandparents."

"This provides companionship for both the student and the elders," she said.

Paula Gerber, freshman in psychology, said she agrees.

"This is one of the neatest things at this school," Gerber said.

"This benefits the elders and us because it develops a long lasting relationship, and it also develops a bond with them," she said.

The program also assists students in their majors.

"This program helps me get used to people I'll be working with in my major," said Stacey Norton, junior in physical therapy.

"It makes me feel good about who I am," Norton said. "This is a good chance to make someone happy, and it doesn't take that much."

"Last semester we went to Alma Manor nursing home and took the matches caroling, and then afterwards we had cake and punch," McKinzie said.

"We wrote a grant called Fund for Improvement for Post Secondary Education, which provided seed money to get Homeserve going," Peak said.

Homeserve, which was a K-State idea, is going to be moving statewide in March.

"Next week we are going to Chautauque to work with the community college there," she said. "We will show them how to involve young people in this type of a program in small communities."

McKinzie said the program could possibly expand.

"We have had five or six communities show an interest in expanding on this program," she said.

There are no requirements to get involved in Homeserve, but participants must go through a personal interview with McKinzie to see if they will work well with the older community.

Homeserve is one of the best programs available on campus," Gerber said. "You don't get that kind of bonding from any other program."

For more information on getting involved in Homeserve, contact Su-Ella McKinzie, student coordinator in Eisenhower 14A, 532-5701.

KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN SPORTS

Same old story: close but no cigar for 'Cats

K-State's Maurice Brittan (52) and Patrick Sams (25) try to block a basket attempt by Missouri's Doug Smith during the game Wednesday night in Bramlage Coliseum. The Wildcats lost to the Tigers 84-75. It was K-State's last men's home game.

DAN WICKER
Sports Reporter

It was more than evident from the look on Jeff Wires' face that Wednesday night's contest with Missouri was a nightmarish end to the home season.

K-State dropped its sixth straight Big Eight game, to the Missouri Tigers by an 84-75 count. With the loss, the Wildcats fell to 2-11 in conference play, and Missouri improved to 7-6.

The story of the game was K-State's inability to get over the hump. The 'Cats were able to climb within three or four points on six different occasions in the second half, but at each point, Missouri would halt the Wildcat charge.

"We had our chances. We got it down to three a couple of times. They got big rebounds, and put it back in and got rebounds off missed free throws," K-State coach Dana Altman said. "They just made the plays."

On two different occasions late in the game — at the 7:59 and 5:48 marks — Chris Heller grabbed offensive rebounds off of missed Tiger charity shots and converted the easy bucket. The second of the two gave Missouri an eight-point cushion, tying its biggest lead of the half to that point.

"Chris Heller is coming on strong ... he had two offensive rebounds and baskets on missed free throws which gave us a lift in the second half," Missouri coach Norm Stewart said. "We kept control of the whole ballgame, but Kansas State is a good ballclub; they've had some tough times and some close losses."

K-State's theory of shutting down Doug Smith and Anthony Peeler worked through most of the first half. They ended up with six and nine points in the first half, respectively. But Heller, who did not see action against K-State in Columbia, picked up the slack for the stars.

Heller ended the game with a career-high 18 points along with seven boards. The Tigers kept their attack very balanced, putting five players in double figures. Peeler had a team-high 19 points, Jamal Coleman 17, Smith 16 and Melvin Booker added 12.

"It was really a solid ball game; the scoring was balanced and everyone made good contributions," Stewart said. "Doug Smith had a tough time tonight, but at the end he had some great passes which resulted in some easy buckets."

In somewhat of a weird first half, which saw three technical fouls called — K-State suffered the same problem as in the second half.

K-State let the Missouri lead swell to as many as 12 with 7:18 left in the half, but by the 1:40 mark K-State had cut the lead to two on a Marcus

MU 84, 'Cats 75

Zeigler three-pointer. However, by the end of the stanza, Peeler had hit two free throws and Smith got an easy layup to give Missouri a 41-35 halftime advantage.

K-State keyed most of its defensive strategy on Smith and Peeler in the first half. The strategy worked, as none of the Tigers' first 24 points came from their big guns. But in that 10:08 stretch, Heller led Missouri with 12 points and Coleman and Booker each added six points to help Mizzou outscore K-State 24-17.

"We really tried to locate those two guys. We talked about that going into the game. However, we let some other people free and they finished plays and hurt us," Altman said.

Jeff Wires and Jean Derouillere led the way for the Wildcats. Playing in the final home game of their careers, both netted more than 20 points. Wires had 22 and Derouillere hit for 21 points and dished out a career-high 10 assists.

"(Wires) stayed after it. He continued to fight and compete. When things got a little bleak there for a while, Jeffrey stayed after it," Altman said. "(Derouillere) had some awfully good passes, and did some awfully good things offensively."

Fritz happy with 2nd shot at hoops

DAN WICKER
Sports Reporter

Can you imagine walking on the campus of K-State, and being asked to join the varsity basketball squad?

Pretty unbelievable, isn't it? Well, this is exactly what happened to senior Steve Fritz this year, to help him notch a spot among the 11 players.

Granted, Fritz had already been a member of the K-State basketball team — in 1988-89 — but the question of joining the team this year still caught him completely by surprise.

"Coach (Dana) Altman just asked me if I would like to help them out. They had some injuries and were a little shorthanded. He wanted to know if I would come out and help as much as I could," Fritz said. "He mentioned it to me during the summer, but I just laughed it off. He caught me by surprise one day when I was walking to Ahearn to talk to my track coaches."

Luckily for Fritz, Altman had asked him to play some pick-up games during last summer that helped ease Fritz's adjustment back into basketball.

"I kept in touch with playing, but nothing near this level. I was lucky. Coach asked me to play some pick-up games with them this summer. So I got all the adjustment out of my system then," Fritz said.

But since the day he joined the team, Fritz had no idea he would contribute to the team as much as he has. He remains one of the top reserves off Altman's bench, averaging just over 10 minutes of play and 3.2 points per game.

"I didn't think I would play as much as I have, and contribute as much. I was hoping to come out and help out a little bit and get a chance to play some," Fritz said. "It is a lot more fun. I sat on the bench a lot that year, and only played in 12 games, and not very many minutes in those games."

This season, Fritz said he feels more a part of K-State than he did his last season of competitive basketball. He said it also remains easier to stay into the game when you know you will see action besides during the last minutes.

"I have blended in a lot more this year than I did that year. There were a lot of conflicts. This year I have helped out more and been more involved, and it's been a little smoother," Fritz said. "It is a whole different situation. This year playing all the time, it is easier to stay focused, and everything is more controlled."

If you didn't know Fritz before this basketball team, then you probably do not know the reason for his layoff from basketball for a season. He was also a star decathlete for K-State. In his final year of track eligibility, Fritz wanted to concentrate on being one of the nation's best.

He finished his last track season as one of the most decorated athletes in the Big Eight. Fritz captured the Big Eight gold medal, finished fourth at the NCAA Outdoor Championships and holds the K-State and Big Eight decathlon record. Last summer, he captured a ninth place finish at the United States Nationals, finished fourth in a dual meet with Russia and third in a dual meet with Canada.

The decathlon is Fritz's real chance for stardom. He said he hopes to compete in the 1992 Olympics and believes his real shot is for a spot on the 1996 Olympic team.

"I will compete this summer, and then try to get ready for next year's Olympic trials. I have a chance of making the team. Things have to go in my favor, and I have to do well in the trials," Fritz said. "I think my real shot is in '96, when I will be older and I'll have a lot more time to work on it then."

Fritz remains very dedicated to decathlon. After K-State's basketball season ends in March, he will have put in eight months of basketball training. Most people would probably be taking a long vacation, but Fritz will begin practicing everyday for the decathlon.

"I will probably begin decathlon training the day after basketball ends. It will take me awhile to get some extra flexibility back, but within a week I will be back to full track training," he said.

Emotion doesn't change outcome

Missouri guard Jamal Coleman attempts to block a shot by K-State guard Jeff Wires in the second half of the Tiger win Wednesday night.

SCOTT PASKE
Sports Reporter

Jean Derouillere cried at the beginning.

Keith Amerson saved his tears for the end.

And even on a night set aside for standing ovations, hugs and senior good-byes, everything in between climaxed into the same bad experience that has haunted K-State's 1990-91 season Wednesday at Bramlage Coliseum.

Another close game, another loss. "It's miserable," senior guard Jeff Wires said following the Wildcats' 84-75 loss to Missouri. "Just knowing if we make half our free throws, grab a couple extra rebounds, a couple loose balls, we'd have 20 wins easily."

Instead, the 'Cats have been forced to spend time wondering what might have been with a 12-14 record. New lineups, team meetings and individual chats with coaches haven't produced answers or positive results. "I guess we're just not tough enough to finish games," junior forward Wylie Howard said. "All year long, we've been searching for excuses. It all comes down to being tougher than they are."

For the eighth time in a game decided by less than 10 points this season, K-State was the weaker team. The 'Cats had chances to catch the Tigers in the second half.

Each time, something was missing.

"We've asked ourselves so many times why we lose close games," Derouillere said. "We're not doing the intangibles and executing like the other teams are doing. For example, tonight we didn't block out the man on the free-throw line and it allowed them to score extra points."

Missouri fought off the 'Cats' final charge with a dunk by Tiger forward Jamal Coleman.

Tiger coach Norm Stewart sympathized with K-State's problems in close games this season.

"They've really had some rough sledding this year," Stewart said. "They hang in there and keep playing you hard."

Howard said there has been little consolation in taking quality teams to the wire and losing.

"There was an air about last year's team that helped us win close games," Howard said. "If this team has it, it sure hasn't shown up."

"We know we have to win the (Big Eight Tournament) to make something happen. Hopefully, that air and toughness will come about us like previous teams."

Bahner has frustrating senior season

BILL LANG
Sports Reporter

Mary Jo Miller gets the ball to the scoring threats. The scoring threats — Diana Miller and Nadira Hazim — can the "Js" and help the team try to overcome yet another foe.

But there is more to the Lady Cats than these three playmakers. There is one stalwart who has gone relatively unnoticed in the scheme of things.

Meet "KB" — Kristie Bahner — quite possibly the glue which holds the team together on the court.

Bahner said that this year, more than any other, has been frustrating. Last year, one of her roles was that of a scorer. This year, though, the offensive burden falls on the shoulders of teammates Diana Miller and Hazim. "Last year I scored quite a bit and that felt good," Bahner said of her performance. "This year, though, there was just so much to learn. I'd have to say it was kind of frustrating in that I didn't play as well as I could have."

Bahner said at one point in the season that her whole game seemed to be lost.

Lady Cat coach Susan Yow was in agreement with Bahner that it's been a down year for her.

"It's probably been a frustrating season for her," Yow said. "There was a lot to our system for her to learn. We really relied on her a lot this year defensively. There were games this year, though, where she couldn't have played any better defensively and offensively."

However, it was the defense that carried Bahner through the regular season. She led the team in rebounds and blocked shots — 171 and 20, respectively.

And as the conference tournament approaches this weekend, Bahner needs only 10 points to join the 1,000-point club for K-State.

"Well, I knew I was getting close, but I guess I'll be getting it in Salina (home of the tourney)," she said. "I think that it would be nice. That way, people won't think of me as a just defensive player."

When she scores her 1,000th point, K-State will join an elite club. Only three teams in the nation — Virginia and Holy Cross are the other two — will have three active 1,000-point scorers.

Living at work has advantages, disadvantages

ARLOAH FAIRCHILD
Collegian Reporter

Some K-State students take "living at the work place" literally. They are students who live in the apartments at each KSU Teaching and Research Center. Each apartment has one to three students living in it.

Jerry Hall, Wendy Winkler and Clay Dalquest, seniors in animal science; Darren Hibdon, senior in agriculture education; and Tim Hamn, sophomore in animal science are all students who live at the KSU Teaching and Research Centers. Each center is referred to as a unit.

The only requirement for living at the units is students must be employed there, Winkler said.

The students agreed that living at the units has both advantages and disadvantages.

"We have extra responsibilities," Hall said. "We have to check first-calf heifers every two or three hours every night during calving."

"If it is real cold weather, we make sure it is every two hours."

"You might think you are going to get a good night's sleep, but you lose sleep instead," he said. "If you think a cow is going to calve, you stay up all night waiting."

"You do have the advantage of being more assured of having a live calf."

"We trade off nights if one of us has plans or a test the next day," said Dalquest, who lives at the swine unit.

"We are also in charge of closing up the offices at night," he said. "The three of us take turns cleaning the swine office and halls at the unit too." Hibdon said the extra responsibility was a good thing.

"I like that they trust me with the responsibility," Hibdon said. "I think it has helped me to become more responsible."

Hibdon, who lives at the sheep unit, and Winkler, who lives at the poultry unit, both said little privacy was a disadvantage.

"It is like living at a public house sometimes," Hibdon said. "At night, you might be sitting there watching television and a person will walk right into your living room."

Winkler said it is hard to keep the smell out of the apartment because she is surrounded by several units.

Hamn, who works at the beef unit, said one of the benefits is that living at the unit enables you to be right there when something happens.

"Although we don't have to be there for calving, we do have to unload cattle when they come in at night," Hamn said.

Another disadvantage was pointed out by Hall, who lives at the purebred-beef unit.

"Cows always have to be fed, even in the cold weather," Hall said.

"Cold weather just makes more work when feeding," Hall said.

"We also assist students who are in the Little American Royal," Hall said. "because some of the students have never shown an animal before."

"Some of the extra responsibilities may be seen as disadvantages, but I don't see it that way because no matter what you do, you are going to have responsibilities," Dalquest said.

The students all said the advantages outweighed the disadvantages.

"The boss sometimes asks us what we want to do, so we are sometimes allowed to have a say in what is done that day," Hall said.

"It is a really good deal as far as I'm concerned," Dalquest said. "Financially, it is a super deal."

"Twelve hours of work a month pays the rent and all utilities, except the phone bill," he said. "When something breaks down, we buy another one, usually from a sale, and the University pays for it."

"A person can also leave some things in the apartment over the summer. That is really nice because then you don't have to cart everything back and forth from home."

"I like living here. It lets you get out of the city, without being clear out in the country," Hibdon said.

Dalquest agreed, "I like living out here simply because I'm not in town."

"One disadvantage to living out here rather than in town in an apartment is that you aren't able to pick your roommates. Except for the first semester of my freshman year when I was with two seniors, it has worked out pretty good."

Both Dalquest and Hibdon said the work helps a person to stop thinking about classes for a while.

"I've had opportunities that I

Heritage part of life, occupation for Rankin

Ex-teacher works to improve minority life

SUZANNE BROWN
Collegian Reporter

Charles Rankin, director of the Midwest Desegregation Assistance of the College of Education, takes great pride in his heritage. He said he wishes for others to know where he comes from.

Close at hand are the emancipation papers of his great-grandfather, and currently Rankin is working on creating a book out of a slave narrative he obtained. The narratives were written by slaves about their experiences, and the narrative Rankin has dates back to 1851.

Rankin was born and raised in Winfield. He obtained his undergraduate degrees in history and elementary education from Wichita State University.

"The reason I got into elementary education was because a guy who my mother knew was the head of personnel at Wichita public schools," he said. "He told me they would not hire black males to teach secondary education and if I wanted to teach school, then I should get an elementary education degree."

After graduating from WSU, Rankin went to work for four years at Boeing Co. as an engineer.

"I got into education through the back door," he said. "Being a former athlete, a lot of the young people I started college with didn't finish. I didn't think about it then, but I kept wondering why they didn't finish school. So, it dawned on me that I was lucky because I had some parents that really believed in education."

While coaching basketball for children aged 8-12, Rankin was approached by a friend who was also a principal. He asked Rankin if he had ever thought about being a teacher.

Rankin then was given a leave of absence from Boeing and began teaching fourth grade at Ingalls Elementary School in Wichita. At the same time, he worked on his master's degree.

"I took a $12,000 a year cut to teach school," Rankin said. "That's a decision I've never regretted. I found that there's more to life than just money and it's very important that we're able to do more for humankind. I do things because they're the right thing to do. I want to be remembered for trying to make things better."

While teaching elementary school, Rankin said he started the first black history program in Kansas. It was so popular that KARD, channel 3, came out and recorded it because no one had ever done that.

He said, as a result of the program's success, he was awarded the principalship of the largest elementary school in the state of Kansas.

Rankin accepted the principalship for a brief time and then went to work for a private research outfit called McREL, Midcontinent Regional Educational Lab.

"They were toying with the idea of developing teachers to work in disadvantaged areas," he said.

Rankin was asked to set up a program to train middle-class white people to work with culturally different children. The resulting program was called the Cooperative Urban Teacher Education program.

In 1970, CUTE was voted the most outstanding teacher education program in the country.

Rankin then received a doctorate in urban education in 1971.

"I did, probably, the first dissertation on the impact of school desegregation on black children," he said.

After finishing his Ph.D., Rankin went to the University of Missouri-Columbia to head up what was called a general assistance center.

"The general assistance centers were established by Lyndon Johnson to help school districts cope with the issues of school desegregation," Rankin said. "I left Missouri because I was depressed to see what was happening to the black community there."

"The folks could really not function. I mean, they were worse than third-class citizens. I felt that I couldn't make any changes in Columbia, so I actually resigned."

"My problem as a minority person is that I can't figure out why people hate people simply because they're a different color, and they don't even know them," he said.

After leaving Missouri, Rankin came to K-State.

He said he thought the project would function better on K-State's campus, and he could do some things on this campus they wouldn't allow him to do at the University of Missouri.

Rankin serves on 10 different advisory and national boards. He serves as the vice-chairman of the Commission on Higher Education for the National Alliance of Black School Educators 1988-1992. He also serves as a resource person to more than 12 professional organizations. Rankin is an active member in eight professional societies.

"The award I cherish the most is one given to me from blacks," he said. "I got it back in 1973. It's from some people who got another chance on life."

Rankin said he has seen changes at K-State, including housing situations for minorities. When he came to Manhattan in 1971, no one would give him a lease. Now, he said, it seems minorities live anywhere they want.

"I think it is imperative that K-State change its teaching pool to include more minorities," he said. "I don't mean minorities from China and India, but good old hard-caring USA minorities. That could be done. It is accomplished other places without a high degree of difficulty."

Rankin said the biggest problems he sees facing black Americans today are the number of black males in the judicial process, the number of black Americans in the Middle East and the impact of drugs on blacks.

"I do a job because a job needs to be done," Rankin said. "God gives us just a little piece of time. My theory is it's not when you're born that's important, or when you die — it's what you do with the dash."

Student to study in Moscow

Morss to learn about Soviet industry, set up experiment

SHANNAN SEELY
Agriculture Reporter

A K-State student will travel to Moscow to test a U.S. flour mill as part of a student-exchange program. Alan Morss, senior in milling science and management, will leave in April for 75 days to learn about the Soviets' flour milling industry.

Two Soviet exchange students will be in Manhattan March 22-May 1. Morss made out their schedule and will show them K-State's large feed mill and flour mill and the U.S. Department of Agriculture Grain Marketing Research Center in Manhattan. The students will also visit industries in Wichita to gain a better understanding of how U.S. mill equipments are made.

In August, the K-State Grain Science and Industry Department and the Ministry of Grain Products in Moscow formalized the exchange agreement. The Ministry of Grain Products has a broad responsibility in research, milling quality and grain use for the Soviet Union.

Morss will set up an experimental flour mill at Zernoproduct, the research arm in Moscow.

Morss said the grain science and industry department will send the Witt Mill and 12 kilos of U.S. wheat for the experiments. Witt Corrugations in Wichita designed K-State's Witt Mill and is in charge of designing the mill for Moscow.

"America and Russia can come together and determine a standard in flour milling," Morss said.

Morss has known about the trip for a month, and with his adviser out of town, he is preparing for the trip on his own. He often performs two-hour experiments on the Witt Mill to learn its capabilities. Morss studies the Russian alphabet and reads correspondence between the two countries.

Although he will have an interpreter, he said communicating and not gathering the large amount of data necessary will be the biggest challenges while in Moscow.

Flour milling is a gradual reduction system, Morss said.

Today's mills extract flour to the degree that all the atypical parts can be separated into the germ, bran and the endosperm, he said.

A main question is the effect the size of the gap between the rolls has on flour extraction.

The size of the gap will affect the amount of starch damage and the ash content. The gap between the rolls will also determine the quality and size of grain being used, he said.

Morss was selected because of his milling experience. Morss was a research assistant in the U.S. Department of Agriculture and a grain quality and storage worker for the Norris and Son Grain Elevator in Burdett.

Most students would like to go, but they want to graduate, he said.

Morss will graduate in December instead of May. He is planning on taking incompletes, except two classes only offered in the spring semester.

The U.S. Wheat Associates, headquartered in Washington, D.C., will sponsor the exchange, along with some assistance from the Kansas Wheat Commission, said Charles Deyoe, head of the grain science and industry department.

Two department professors, Elieser Posner and Roger Johnson, visited the Soviet Union about three years ago. They presented seminars on the U.S. milling industry operations.

Two years later, Deyoe traveled to Moscow.

"Even then, they were talking about the possibility of an exchange," Deyoe said.

The program will be successful if the Soviets' knowledge increases in technical and market-related areas.

"Frankly, we want to improve our communications," he said.

Steel Ring leads activities

SCOTT FOWLER
Collegian Reporter

Steel Ring Professional Engineering Society consists of a select group of senior leaders who make significant contributions to the engineering college and K-State.

Ray Hightower, assistant dean of engineering and adviser to the group, said Steel Ring members lead in professional activities and encourage underclass participation in activities promoting engineering.

They provide recognition of outstanding effort and accomplishment and promote the best interests of the College of Engineering, he said.

A major responsibility is coordinating the Engineering Open House, Hightower said.

"Steel Ring lays the foundation for the rest of the college to showcase departments in the Engineering Open House," said Ira Bolden, senior in electrical engineering and president of the society.

Brad Bodine, senior in mechanical engineering, said the awards banquet is an important part of Open House.

"It's a chance for friends and classmates of people who have worked Open House and Open House projects to come together and really show support and recognition for their efforts," he said.

Winners in all classes of competition receive awards at the banquet, Bodine said. Included in the awards presented are the St. Pat and St. Patricia Awards given to the best male and female students in the college of engineering, he said.

Bodine said the Culbertson Award will be presented to the outstanding junior engineering student at the banquet. The dean also gives out awards to special alumni, he said.

Bolden said four categories of individual display awards in Durland and Seaton hall's and four categories for overall department awards are given at the Open House award banquet.

The Knights of St. Pat's Award is given to elite graduating seniors at Open House, said Amy Young, senior in industrial engineering. The award is based on activity involvement, leadership and grade point average, she said.

Bolden said Open House gives engineering students a chance to show off their efforts by presenting projects and participating in the events.

Steel Ring consist of leaders from each department in engineering.

"We consist of 20 people who get a ton of things done and get them done swiftly. We are able to accomplish a lot at a quick rate because members take the initiative to get things done," Young said.

Hightower said Steel Ring members in previous years initiated the engineering ambassador association to develop student involvement.

Young said the ambassadors visited over 200 Kansas high schools last year and promoted the college of engineering and K-State.

Hightower said many companies are first interested in Steel Ring members because of their demonstrated leadership experience.

Hightower said Steel Ring promotes each department to have a freshman/sophomore leadership body to represent that group. It builds a foundation for future leaders, he said.

Steel Ring members are seniors, and membership is only for one year, Hightower said.

To be nominated for the society an engineering student must have at least a 2.5 grade point average although most members have over a 3.0, Hightower said.

CHRISTOPHER T. ASSAF/Staff

Research by David Margolies, assistant professor of entomology, uses pesticides with ingredients that are chemically identical to soap. His studies involve sorghum plants and greenbugs.

Entomologist uses soybean oil to produce a safe insecticide

MELANIE SCHOENBECK
Collegian Reporter

The walls in Waters Hall leading to his office boast bugs in glass display cases. He doesn't mind because his research revolves around insects.

"I like working with insects. After a while you start to think they are sort of cute and fun to work with," said David Margolies, assistant professor of entomology.

Margolies is currently working on a research project that uses soybean oil soap as a nonpoisonous insecticide.

Margolies said the biochemistry department makes the soaps and Larry Davis, a biochemistry professor, deserves full credit for actually thinking of the research idea.

"We have been working on this for three years," Margolies said. "I have students during the summer who work on the project more. I don't think it is unreasonable to talk about five years until we are at the point where we can say this seems like it is really going to work."

The soap spray does not repel bugs in any way and must make direct contact in order to kill the insect. It does not have any residue or leave anything poisonous on the plant, Margolies said.

The soap-spray investigators said they hope to improve on an existing product and promote new ways of using it.

"There is currently a commercial soap on the market. It is sold mostly through garden supply shops. We use it in our own greenhouses and as a control to test our new soaps against," he said.

"Last year we preliminarily went out and sprayed soybeans and sorghum in the field. The spray did not have any effect on the crops, but we had weeds that the spray killed," Margolies said. "That was really neat because we never imagined that it could have this herbicidal effect."

"Marketing is something that might happen on a local scale, both in Kansas and the United States. Also there is a possibility of it in terms of marketing overseas. A lot of developing countries are looking for insecticides that are relatively safe to use and have the potential for local production to avoid

Manhattan wins tree award

RYAN HAYTER
Collegian Reporter

Manhattan's 14-year recognition by the National Arbor Day Foundation as a Tree City, U.S.A., indicates the concern the city has for the welfare of its trees.

Jim Nighswonger, urban and community forestry program representative for Kansas, said the award recognizes cities doing an exceptional job in maintaining urban tree programs.

Recipients must meet four guidelines established by the foundation before receiving the official Tree City, U.S.A. title, he said. Those guidelines for cities include:

- the existence of a tree board or department.

- a community ordinance regulating the planning and caring of trees.

- demonstration of expenditures of $1 per capita on the urban forest.
- an arbor ceremony and a proclamation signed by the mayor.

"Manhattan is exceptional with its tree resources," Nighswonger said. J. David Mattox, forestry supervisor for Manhattan, said the city has by far surpassed the minimal required standards.

Manhattan has seven full-time employees who work on responding to citizens' requests and landscaping and maintaining trees and other foliage along city streets and property, he said.

"We plant 200-300 trees per year," Mattox said. "The national average is four trees removed for every tree replaced. We plant two new trees for every one removed."

"Arbor Day celebrations are held at elementary schools," he said. "Each school is given a Tree City, U.S.A., flag to fly, but beyond that, they're pretty much free to do what they like," Mattox said. "We've had things from plays to rap groups. This shows Manhattan citizens care about their urban forest and upkeep."

Kansas has 129 cities with urban forest programs and 61 are members of Tree City U.S.A.

Blue Key awards scholarships; 16 students will receive $500

JENNIFER HOFFMAN
Collegian Reporter

Blue Key, a senior honorary, will be awarding 16 scholarships for the next school year.

The amount of the scholarships varies from $7,000 to $9,000. This year a total of $8,000 will be given away.

"The money comes from the Student Foundation, which gets the money from donations either by a memorial or from the Blue Key alumni," said Kristin Johnson, senior in accounting and chairwoman of the Blue Key Scholarship Committee.

Each scholarship will be worth $500 and all 16 scholarships will be awarded, Johnson said.

"There's an application process, which includes the application, a 500-word essay and a resume," she said. "Then we conduct interviews and review each person on the basis of leadership qualities, academics and activities."

Ray Kowalczewski, junior in economics, won the Lewis Sophomore Leadership Award last year. He said he just fixed his resume and wrote the essay the morning it was due.

"I tend to put everything off until the last minute, so I was very surprised when I got an interview," he said. "I went through the interview and answered all their questions. We talked a lot about my resume."

The reviews are conducted by the Blue Key members, faculty and administrators.

The applications are due March 8 and are available in Anderson 122.

Student organization lacks members

Off-Campus Association sets goals to provide social group, informational service, campus voice for 'faceless majority'

KEVIN CARROLL
Collegian Reporter

Without an organization to represent causes, students have no right to complain about University problems, said Natasha Acker, senior in secondary math education.

Acker, president of the Off-Campus Association, said the organization is having difficulty gaining membership at K-State.

"I am extremely discouraged and frustrated with the off-campus students," Acker said. "There are several Texas and Oklahoma universities that have large OCA's, but we (K-State) can't pull in anyone."

Many off-campus students do not have an avenue to voice their concerns or participate fully in University activities.

Acker said off-campus students become detached from a supporting organization when they choose to live independently from other living groups. Because of this detachment, students lose communication connections with services and activities the University offers, and the potential to meet new people outside the classroom.

"The purpose of OCA is to give these students a niche within the University to involve themselves," Acker said.

The main objective the OCA is trying to accomplish is to gain membership, Acker said.

"As soon as we can get students interested," she said, "we can address some of the problems students living off-campus face."

About 70 percent of K-State's students live off campus. The University can better fulfill its responsibilities by tuning in to this faceless majority, Acker said. The only way the University can tune in is if there is a strong voice coming from students.

"One of the main goals of the OCA has been to provide social interactions for off-campus students," Acker said.

"Now, we are trying to provide a strong voice for off-campus grievances, have open discussions on K-State's parking problems and provide workshops and information for the new off-campus students."

First jazz festival set for March 4

Club promotes alternative music

BETSY HILDALGO
Collegian Reporter

Jazz will be live on campus at 7 p.m. March 4 in the Forum Theater because New Currents, the new age, jazz and fusion music club is sponsoring its first jazz festival.

"It will be a small jazz festival with three bands from Manhattan and Wichita," said Eric Brunt, president and co-founder of New Currents and junior in electrical engineering.

If the festival is a success, there will be another one next year, said Ben Rohrer, adviser to the organization and director of jazz studies. The organization is non-profit, but there is a $3 charge at the door for the bands, he said.

The participants in the festival are the K-State Jazz Combo, Mister Direction and Voices of the Heart.

Voices of the Heart has the same kind of sound as Manhattan Transfer does, Brunt said.

"We are trying to promote more jazz in the area because the Midwest does not have too much to offer as far as jazz or new age goes," Brunt said.

The idea to develop a club for new age, jazz and fusion music was born during a night in the computer lab.

"We started talking and decided to start our own club," Brunt said.

The goal of the club is to bring people together who like the same kind of music, and for them to pursue their interest in music, he said.

The funds the organization receives come from the college of arts and sciences.

The club travels to cities in the Midwest going to concerts.

"We go to concerts together in Lawrence, Kansas City and Wichita," Brunt said. "People send me information on concerts from all over."

The meetings are every Sunday at 2 p.m. in the K-State Union Room 203.

Students publish work through Touchstone

VICKI KNIGHT
Collegian Reporter

Touchstone provides an opportunity for college students to get their written work published.

The literary magazine is produced by students, and all the literary work is written by undergraduate students from K-State and other students around the country who submit material.

The magazine is published once a year — in the fall. Submissions are accepted from students from early February until July 31.

All submissions are evaluated by the Touchstone staff, which is comprised of both undergraduate and graduate students, said Micheal Fey, graduate in creative writing and literature.

Fey is also the Touchstone editor this year.

He explained that the staff divides up into two reading groups, one for poetry and one for short stories.

The members all read each submission and argue for the pieces they like the best. Fey said this helps in seeing different points of view.

"Criteria for good submissions are whether the piece is moving, original, entertaining, interesting and any other positive adjective you can think of," Fey said.

Laurie McKinnon, graduate in creative writing and literature, was a co-editor last year for Touchstone.

A big part of the magazine is not just the writers who write the content, Fey said, but also all that is involved in putting the magazine together from the lay-out to the cover design to taking it to the printer.

"It is nice to be doing something within the industry other than bringing in the text," Fey said.

McKinnon said since undergraduate students also work on the production staff it gives them the opportunity to be in peer group situations.

"Working on the magazine gives somebody in a small community a chance to take an honest-to-God publication from stages of infancy to the finished product," McKinnon said.

Chalk

"It frightens me that the campus police and the administration and facilities don't seem to be communicating about this," said Wendy Herdman, senior in theater.

The way the board's proposal is worded, the regulations would only affect registered campus organizations wanting to publicize an upcoming event.

Students asked the board if this would apply to individuals or groups wanting to chalk something other than publicity for an event. They said they wondered if something not explicitly regulated was prohibited.

No one seemed to have the answers.

Board members and students said they were unsure if UAB should regulate chalking, like the anti-war messages stopped by campus police this week. UAB is in charge of regulating all publicity on campus.

"You have to look at whether or not you want to regulate this kind of individual expression," said Lyman Baker, professor of English. "And if so, is this board the body to do it?"

Don Fallon, board member and coordinator of religious activities on campus, pointed out the University could regulate time, place and manner of expression without imposing on people's freedom of expression.

Routson said though the board's proposal dealt with publicity for campus organizations, UAB also regulates individuals publicizing on campus.

Several students said obtaining a permit through facilities planning, which is the current procedure required to publicize on campus, causes unnecessary hassles and paperwork for both the students and the University.

Students also said chalk was the easiest, most effective, most cost-efficient and environmentally-safe method for getting a message to the University community.

Herdman said she appreciated the board's concerns but thought regulating chalking should be limited to keeping it away from doorways, vertical surfaces and tops of planters and benches.

"Taking a more positive approach and making clear to the police what is allowed and what is not would be more beneficial," she said.

Routson said she was thankful for the input and assured the group the board would look into the issue. She said she would talk to the University attorney's office, which reviewed the proposal, and find out the legal implications.

"We are trying to be proactive, not reactive," Routson said, "but it doesn't always turn out that way."

"Maybe we can revise the proposal, taking into account the feedback we got tonight," she said. "We will do our best to gather more information."

Loleta Sump, board member with physical facilities, said other Big-Eight schools prohibit chalking on campus.

"They look at it as vandalism and prosecute it as such," she said. "We've tried to reach some sort of compromise here."

Several students said they hoped the University would foster individual expression and campus activism.

Routson said she hoped UAB could meet to look at further revisions.

Margolies said he likes to call himself an investigator instead of an experimenter. He said they are not sure exactly how the spray kills the insects. It may just clog the breathing apparatus, break down the waxy layer on the skin or be poisonous to insects.

The project has been published in some science and home gardening magazines, and Margolies said he has had readers tell him what an interesting project he is conducting.

"I sort of laugh about it because it is not the main part of my program. Actually, this is probably the smallest project I have going. It just happens to be the one that catches attention because it is the one others perceive as most immediately useful," Margolies said.

"My personal feeling is that it is going to have its greatest utility in commercial greenhouse operations before being used for commercial farming purposes."

said. After World War I, Shields said, harsh reparations were imposed on Germany by the Allies. Those reparations, which Germany was unable to pay, are considered to be one of the causes of World War II.

Forcing Iraq to pay reparations after the destruction of its economic infrastructure during the air war may lead to another conflict, she said. "They have nothing to pay with," Shields said.

A spokesman for Fort Riley said the military installation's command would have no official comment on the end of hostilities until sometime today.

The comment would have to wait until it was clear that Iraq would not fire on coalition forces or fire anymore Scud missiles, said Mark Meseke, Fort Riley spokesman.

"I think we'll want to wait and see," Meseke said.

The fort has made contingency plans for the return of the 1st Infantry Division from the Persian Gulf, he said. But it was unknown when the Big Red One's return might take place.

"Fort Riley is making contingency plans to bring them back. But as for when, I think that's up to George Bush," Meseke said.

Finney against higher education budget cuts

PAUL NOEL
Staff Reporter

Investing in education is the best way of investing in the future, Gov. Joan Finney said at the Alpha Gamma Rho fraternity Wednesday.

Finney spent about an hour answering questions from the AGRs before leaving to kick off the 78th Annual Cattlemen's Day at the Manhattan Holiday Inn & Holidome.

Kurt Harrison, junior in accounting and AGR president, said the fraternity invited the governor to increase its public relations on campus and to give people an opportunity to talk to her on a one-to-one basis.

Finney said she proposed a $24-million budget for the Kansas Board of Regents. She said there needs to be cutbacks in other areas of the state.

"Bigger jails and stiffer mandates are not the answer," she said. "Education is the answer."

Finney called the proposed 3-percent cutback for state agencies shortsighted. If it were to reach her desk, she said she would look at it unfavorably.

John Niemann, sophomore in agribusiness, asked the governor about possible funding from the state lottery.

Finney said the lottery was originally meant to be used for economic development, but much of its money has been appropriated to the racing commission and historical society.

She said she has proposed the racing commission and historical society be reviewed and requested past audits for lottery money.

"Lottery money for the University is possible," she said. "If we don't invest in our young people, the state will continue to deteriorate as it is deteriorating now."

Finney said she was in favor of putting money into classrooms instead of additional building space.

However, she would be interested in working on a bond issue to fund Farrell Library.

"Libraries are overlooked and are the heartbeat of the university," she said. "You need a library."

Finney answered several questions about the tax laws and how they would affect farmers.

She said she would not propose a tax on cattle and called it a rumor started by her opposition during the campaign. However, she said she would propose a tax on new farm machinery.

Finney said most farmers don't buy new heavy equipment, so the proposed tax would not have much effect on them.

Harrison said he was pleased with the discussion and answers the AGRs received.

Funding on the line for regents schools

Committee approves $3.5 million in cuts

By the Collegian Staff

An action by the Kansas House of Representative's Appropriations Committee Thursday threatens K-State with a $3.5-million reduction from fiscal year 1991.

Appropriations Committee member Rep. Sheila Hochhauser, D-Manhattan, said the committee approved a 1.7 percent statewide spending cut for Kansas Board of Regents schools. The proposal will be sent to the House floor next.

"I oppose it," Hochhauser said. "Some legislators were elected on a platform of cutting spending and not increasing taxes in any way. Other people, including me, think education is a very high priority."

K-State President Jon Wefald said the proposed cuts would be a great setback to the University.

"With year three (of the Margin of Excellence), the enrollment adjustments and an increase in faculty salaries, we could continue on the momentum we have had in the last three years," he said. "If we don't get these things, and on the contrary, we get reductions, we would be back to where we were in 1986 before the MOE started."

"We essentially would be receiving no state funding for 3,000 of the 4,000 additional students on campus since the fall of 1987," he said. "This makes our situation even more difficult than the other regents' institutions, because we would face all the same problems, but in addition, we would have no funding for these 3,000 students."

Wefald said the fight was not over. "We are just going to keep pushing and working very hard with the state legislators on this," he said.

"I don't think they will put it on my desk. The Legislature knows the mistakes they've made in the past."

—Joan Finney
Kansas governor

"All of us in public higher education and all of us who represent regents' institutions are still pushing hard for year three of the MOE and for enrollment adjustments," he said. "We will continue to do so and articulate why we need them until the last minute of the session."

Gov. Joan Finney, in Manhattan to kick off the 78th Annual Cattlemen's Day, said her initial response was negative, although she hadn't seen the committee's proposal.

"Legislators need to cut back on other areas," she said. "I believe it would be a short-sighted approach to state government, because we've got to invest in the young people."

"I don't think they will put it on my desk," Finney said. "The Legislature knows the mistakes they've made in the past."

"I look at it as unfavorable. But I'll have to wait, because I can't make a commitment to you I can't keep."

Hochhauser said the success of efforts to increase spending on higher education depend on tax increases.

"There's a sense that it's not a will of the public to have a tax increase," she said. "Some legislators are hearing this from their constituents."

"It's going to depend on whether there's a Senate and House agreement to pass the tax increase, otherwise, the budgets will be cut," she said.

The best chance for passage of a tax increase is when the vote is bipartisan, Hochhauser said.

"That's the only way (to pass a tax increase). Whether a coalition is going to happen is the question," she said. "We have to set up priorities to cut a higher percentage in some places and a lower percentage in other places."

She said the challenge is to sit down with a large group and reach a consensus of the state's priorities.

For example, the southeast Kansas legislators think increasing the highway budget decreases economic depression, she said.

"They are as rabid about highways as I am about education," she said.

Lajan Rau, Shannan Seely and Chrissy Vendel contributed to this report.

Senate to restructure advisory bill

ANDREW CAPPS
Collegian Reporter

Student Senate passed a bill restructuring and redefining the Students' Attorney Advisory Board Thursday night.

The existing function of the board is to determine when litigation by the students' attorney is appropriate and to set governing policies for services offered.

The salary of the students' attorney has been a source of confusion. No other professional employee on campus is required to appear before a governmental body annually for salary allocation.

The bill would also allow the board to hear the students' attorney's report, receive feedback and recommend salary increases.

The board will be composed of one tenured faculty member, not serving in an administrative capacity, who will serve a three-year term. Four students, including one student senator, will each serve a one-year term.

Students' Attorney Dianne Urban sat in on the discussion and said she was pleased with the outcome.

"I provide legal services to students," she said. "Now, there will be a committee that I will report to. Your activity fee pays my salary, and that is allocated by Student Senate."

STUDENT SENATE

The bill also provides the students' attorney the right to address the Student Finance Committee and Student Senate about her salary.

Concerning the issue of the student activity fee, Senate heard first readings on a proposed line-item budget increase and activity fee increase for the College Council.

The proposal would increase the College Council line-item fee 25 cents to $1.75 for full-time students and 50 cents for part-time students. The activity fee will be increased 25 cents for full-time students and 8 cents for part-time students.

Senate will have a second reading and vote on the proposal next week. Presentations by eight groups funded by Senate were heard by Senate with opportunity for questions to be asked.

Dorothy Roberts, spokeswoman for the Older, Wiser, Learning Students, gave a presentation on her organization.

Todd Heitschmidt, student body president, read a letter Roberts wrote to K-State President Jon Wefald about her treatment at a prior presentation before Senate.

In the letter, Roberts said she overheard the comment, "Who gives a blank about non-traditional students? They're too old to be here anyway."

Roberts stated in the letter that she cannot understand the purpose of a body that occupies itself with passing notes and a "KAPSA cup" for keg money. "KAPSA" is the acronym for the Committee to Promote Post-Senate Activities.

Heitschmidt is preparing a response to Roberts and recommended to Senate all note-passing be reduced to only legislative matters and the "KAPSA cup" only be passed during informal discussion.

Gulf in silence as securing peace begins

Officials caution withdrawal of U.S., allied troops may take months

By the Associated Press

DHAHRAN, Saudi Arabia — Allied military officials said the cease-fire was holding in the 43-day Persian Gulf War.

From the Euphrates to the Persian Gulf, U.S. and allied troops ceased their fire along a battlefield Thursday, weary, muddy but victorious in a war that freed Kuwait and humbled Iraq.

Statesmen began what President Bush called the difficult task of securing the peace.

The U.S. military cautioned it will "take us longer to bring the troops home than to get them over there."

With 537,000 Americans serving in the gulf, a withdrawal would take months, and some soldiers might be replaced by fresh troops with different skills, it said.

American paratrooper David Hochins had a warm vision of peace: "My girlfriend, good friends and good times."

Kuwaitis told reporters of murder, torture, rape and kidnapping at the hands of Iraqi troops, who sacked their nation in seven months of occupation.

"What I could tell you about the Iraqis," said optician Nizar Naccash. "I hate them from the inside of my blood."

Kuwaitis said thousands of their countrymen, mostly young men, were taken off to Iraq as hostages in the final days. Kuwait's U.N. ambassador put the number at 22,000, in addition to 8,632 Kuwaiti soldiers held prisoner by Iraq.

The Senate adopted a resolution praising Bush and the military and calling for an examination of whether Iraq committed war crimes. The measure was sponsored by all 100 senators.

The return of Kuwaiti detainees was one demand set by President Bush in declaring the cease-fire for midnight EST Wednesday.

Bush met Thursday evening with the Saudi ambassador, Prince Bandar, who praised America's armed forces and the president's leadership.

"We would be fighting in the eastern provinces of Saudi Arabia right now if you didn't make the right decision at the right time," Bandar said.

The resolution demands the immediate release of all prisoners of war, an accounting of those missing in action and the freeing of all Kuwaiti citizens held by Iraq.

The United States warned Thursday it might resume the offensive against the Iraqi military if Baghdad does not meet all the conditions, which also include the immediate release of U.S. and allied prisoners of war.

"There's still great concern about the next several days," White House spokesman Marlin Fitzwater said. Bush later announced the Iraqis had agreed to designate military commanders to discuss the cease-fire terms.

The U.S. command reported some cease-fire violations Thursday, including an incident in which Iraqi gunners fired on troops of the U.S. XVIII Airborne Corps retrieving the bodies of American airmen killed in a helicopter crash. The Americans fired back and destroyed two tanks and two multiple-rocket launchers, the command said.

The commander of British forces in the coalition, Lt. Gen. Peter de la Billiere, said some Iraqi troops pinned down by Desert Storm forces appeared bewildered by the standdown.

Land-use 2nd draft released by city

LORI STAUFFER
Staff Reporter

The second draft of Manhattan's comprehensive land-use plan was released to the public Feb. 26.

The first draft of the proposal was reworked to accommodate some changes requested by the Citizens Advisory Committee, including concerns about the rezoning of residential areas around the K-State campus, downtown and Aggieville.

Dennis Law, professor of landscape architecture and member of the CAC, said he is especially concerned about the zoning because he lives in the area.

"I live in a single-family home in the heart of Manhattan. I have raised a family there and spent a fortune in remodeling," he said. "Over the years, indiscriminate decisions have been made by the city in regards to this area. It has gradually become more difficult to move down the street due to increased traffic. Noise pollution because of traffic and parties has increased over time. I have had three automobiles hit by drunk drivers."

"In order to protect the financial and emotional investment I have made in this area, I have taken a tough stand on this issue," Law said.

Eric Cattell, American Institute of City Planning senior planner for Manhattan, said the most controversial area has always been housing around campus.

"It has always been a fairly high density area," he said. "Overcrowding and parking has become a concern, and we have decided to down-zone the area to a lower density from the original draft."

Wording in the first draft was changed to allow for the down-zoning. Where the draft read "quality, high density living in and around the downtown and Aggieville areas, including the use of second-story commercial space," the released draft simply calls for "quality living" in these areas.

The plan originally encouraged multiple-family dwellings in and around this area, including creative and adaptive re-use of vacant, second story commercial space.

The city changed these land-use principals and criteria to state that "regardless of where multi-family residential development occurs, it should only be permitted when it is consistent and compatible with adjacent development, and the appropriate infrastructure is in place to accommodate the higher density development."

American shot while in Turkey

IZMIR, Turkey (AP) — Assaults shot an American soldier in the head Thursday in the second attack on a U.S. military employee in Turkey in a month.

A Marxist group opposed to the Persian Gulf War claimed responsibility for both shootings.

U.S. officials said the victim, identified as Lt. Col. Alvin Macke, 44, was in stable condition after surgery. The semi-official news agency Anatolia said Macke worked at NATO Land South-east Command in Izmir. His hometown was not available.

"We will continue our activities until imperialism gets its hands off the Middle East," said a caller claiming to represent Dev Sol, after contacting the Izmir office of the daily newspaper Cumhuriyet.

Two assailants followed the American to his fourth-floor apartment in the western city of Izmir and shot him in the head, Anatolia said.

Officials at the Saglik hospital in Izmir told the Associated Press the American was brought in wearing a U.S. military uniform.

The shooting occurred at 5:15 p.m. in the affluent Alsancak section of Izmir, Anatolia said.

The agency quoted a doctor at Saglik hospital, Mustafa Sheevki Atac, as saying the victim told him, "We got into the elevator together. When I was getting out of the elevator, those two persons opened fire."

It was the second shooting of an American claimed by Dev Sol in a month. On Feb. 7, Dev Sol said it was behind the slaying that day of Bobbie Eugene Mozelle of Detroit, a civilian employed by the U.S.-Turkish base at Incirlik in southern Turkey.

Brando sentenced for manslaughter

SANTA MONICA, Calif. (AP) — Christian Brando was sentenced Thursday to 10 years in prison for voluntary manslaughter in the shooting death of his half-sister's lover.

"It's a tragic situation for both families, for Christian Brando," Superior Court Judge Robert Thomas said in handing down the sentence.

Brando, the son of actor Marlon Brando, drew a six-year sentence on the manslaughter charge and four more years for aggravating circumstances for the use of a gun.

The younger Brando pleaded guilty last month to voluntary manslaughter in the May 17 shooting of Dag Drollet, the lover of his half-sister, Cheyenne.

Bill could require drug testing

TOPEKA (AP) — State health institution employees suspected of drug or alcohol abuse could be subjected to drug testing under a newly introduced legislative bill.

"If they're using drugs while at work they're putting people in our care at risk," Rep. Joan Wagnon, D-Topeka, the bill's sponsor, told the House Public Health and Welfare Committee.

"I never thought I'd be introducing a bill on drug testing; there seems to be no other way to get to the root of the problem."

Wagnon said she introduced the bill because of reports from constituents of substance abuse among employees at institutions in her district, which includes Kansas Neurological Institute.

Only a statement submitted by Gordon Risk of the American Civil Liberties Union raised the issue of constitutional rights. In written testimony, he said employees would be best protected if the state would implement performance testing rather than drug testing.

Family of hepatitis victim files suit

KANSAS CITY, Mo. (AP) — The family of a Belton man who died after contracting hepatitis has sued the restaurant where he allegedly caught the disease.

The lawsuit contends James and Karen Oden, owners of Oden's Cabin restaurant in Belton, Mo., were at fault for serving food contaminated by infected workers, resulting in the negligent death of Jack Huff.

Huff's widow, Judy Huff of Belton, Mo., and sons Brian Huff of Peculiar and Mike Huff of Lenexa, Mo., filed the lawsuit Tuesday in Jackson County Circuit Court.

James Oden declined to comment, and the doctors could not be reached for comment.

Oleen to travel to White House

Sen. Lana Oleen, R-Manhattan, will take part in a briefing at the White House today given by President Bush and Richard Haass, special assistant to the president for Near East and South Asian affairs.

Also invited are Secretary of Defense Dick Cheney, Secretary of State James Baker, and Colin Powell, chairman of the joint chiefs of staff.

The briefing is sponsored by the American Legislative Exchange Council. Oleen is the state chairperson for ALEC.

Oleen will also be carrying a hand-written invitation from Lyn Rhame, wife of Maj. Gen. Thomas Rhame, the commanding officer at Fort Riley, asking the president and Barbara Bush to visit the 1st Division and the 170th and 190th National Guard units.

"It is truly an honor and responsibility to share the perspective of Kansans with the president," Oleen said. "I will also be addressing the concern of federal mandates and their effect on state budgets as those costs continue to escalate."

SpringDance offers variety

Program includes classical ballet, jazz, modern dance

ANNE TATUM
Collegian Reporter

SpringDance 1991 promises a variety of dance when it opens at 8 tonight and plays again at 8 p.m. Saturday in McCain Auditorium. "Don't expect the whole show or each piece to be the same. Each piece is different and unique. If you don't like the first one, then hang on, you might like the second one," said Jo Byrnes, senior in dance and a nine-semester veteran with the dance program. She is performing in four pieces.

Judith Quirk Chitwood, assistant professor of speech, said the program is a faculty and student collaborative effort and nine pieces will be performed. Quirk Chitwood is the production coordinator and director of the dance program.

"We have a wide variety here," she said. "Everything from classical ballet, jazz, modern and a couple comical pieces, one of which is a spoof on ballet."

The spoof is "Danse Macabre," which means dance of death.

"Dancing is the only thing a person can do without people saying that it is right or wrong," said Robert Bailey, senior in secondary education.

Bailey used to dance for K-State dance productions in the mid-1980s when he was getting his first degree. He came back to dance this year because he enjoys it so much, he said.

If the audience is interested in seeing some good student choreography, then SpringDance is something they don't want to miss, Bailey said.

Due to some scheduling conflicts with McCain, the program was bumped up about two months. Normally, the dancers have ample time to practice and prepare. This year only five weeks were allotted.

"Everyone has been putting in a lot more time. Usually we have two months, but this year we have five weeks," Byrnes said. "It will be ready."

Tickets are $3 for students and senior citizens and $6 for the general public.

J. KYLE WYATT/Staff

Dance majors Michael Townsley, senior, and Christine Rome, junior, perform the "Nutcracker Pas de Deux" during rehearsal for SpringDance 1991 Thursday evening. The program starts tonight.

New Yorker finds home at K-State

JENNIFER HOFFMAN
Collegian Reporter

New Yorker Gail Fazzari, assistant professor in the dance program, said she finds Kansas a very friendly and down-to-earth place after her first few months at K-State.

This is Fazzari's first semester teaching jazz, tap and modern dance at K-State.

"I started dance lessons when I was 9 years old and started dancing professionally and teaching when I was 16," she said. "It was the love of dance as an early child that made me start. I've always enjoyed performing in front of people."

She said her passion is in the modern dance, which is an American form of dance.

Fazzari said it began as a rebellion to the strict codifications of ballet and it's a more natural expression.

"I never hold back when I dance," she said. "This is my form of expression that is very real and special to me. If I wanted to do it half-ass, it'd be a waste of my time. I am totally involved in dance."

Fazzari has been dancing for 23 years. She got her master's in fine arts at Sarah Lawrence College in Bronxville, N.Y. She has background in dance/theater and exercise physiology. She has also worked as a physical therapist and a chemist.

"I've always turned back to my love of dance," she said. "My graduate work is in dance and now I'm teaching, which is very exciting."

She said it is very rewarding to see her students grow while teaching them.

"The dance program here at K-

State is for the students to learn and grow," she said. "The faculty is here as a guide."

Even though Fazzari isn't performing now, the faculty is doing a trio in SpringDance. She also choreographed a number the students perform called "Late Night Thoughts."

She said SpringDance is a dance concert that will be a full evening of dance. She said she would rather teach dance concert work because it completely focuses on the dancers. Musical theater has actors with dance scenes in it.

"I think the most exciting thing about being a professional dancer was meeting and talking with other artists," she said. "It's exciting to know where they come from and how they do things. Basically, it's exciting to get with people who I can share the art with."

"I think they're going to sit it out until they run out of water and food. Then they'll have to surrender," he told reporters.

Iraqi soldiers straggling north toward the southern Iraqi city of Basra were screened at checkpoints by allied troops looking for members of units suspected of atrocities in Kuwait.

The Saudi ambassador to Washington said an estimated 85,000 to 100,000 Iraqi soldiers were killed and wounded as their army was shattered in 37 days of air bombardment followed by four days of ground war. Some 80,000 Iraqis are prisoners.

The U.S. command said the American casualty toll for the war stood at 79 killed in action, 212 wounded in action and 45 missing in action. An additional 52 Americans are listed as non-combat deaths, and nine are known to be prisoners of war.

1st Division death toll rises

DAVID FRESE
Staff Reporter

Pentagon sources Thursday evening released the names of three more 1st Infantry Division soldiers killed in Operation Desert Storm.

Maj. Joe Padilla, spokesman for the Department of the Army, said the three soldiers were killed in separate incidents in the theater of operations. Padilla's announcement raised the total of 1st Division casualties to four.

The first incident involved Spc. Steven Trautman, a 21-year-old helicopter repairman from Houstonia, Md. Trautman was a member of the 1st Division's Company E 1st Aviation Battalion, Padilla said.

Trautman died Tuesday in an incident currently under investigation. At presstime, his death was listed as non-hostile.

Spc. Kenneth Perry was also killed Tuesday. Padilla could not release details of Perry's death, but said the incident is listed as hostile.

Perry was a chemical operations specialist with the 1st Division's 12th Chemical Company. Perry was a native of Lake Waccanaw, N.C. He was 23.

Pfc. Mark Miller, of HHC 5th Battalion 16th Infantry Regiment, was killed by an Iraqi exploding bomb. He was a Bradley fighting vehicle mechanic and was 20 years old. His home address was listed as Fort Riley.

The first reported casualty of the 1st Division involved Pfc. Melford Collins, also of HHC 5th Battalion 16th Infantry Regiment. Padilla said Collins was killed when he stepped on an Iraqi mine.

KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN
EDITORIAL

Serendipitous discovery speaks for itself

Walking on campus about nine o'clock last Friday night, I casually noticed I was primarily alone, except for roaming bands of architecture students heading back and forth between Seaton Hall and the K-State Union, much like migrating geese respecting the seasons. Apart from them, however, the sidewalks were all mine.

I was heading for Farrell Library, "mecca of learning," pausing only briefly now and then to read the latest addition to the sidewalk-chalk Persian Gulf debate. I had resigned myself to a rare Friday night of paper-top research and studying for various classes, in hopes I might by some freak of nature gain some ground on the rapidly accumulating mass of overdue homework. My three roommates had chosen to take the night off, creating a homestead atmosphere far from conducive to studying.

The wind had picked up slightly, giving the cold of the evening a bite that forced its way through my jacket and up through my shoes. I quickened my pace, thinking about the warmth I could soon find within the library. Well OK, it's true: the library is one of the only places on Earth where your body can experience three radically different temperatures in one sitting. But some warmth seemed better than none.

Rounding Denison Hall, I noticed the library was only dimly lit, and the stacks were completely black. Not being a late-weekend regular, I attributed this condition to proper conservation techniques probably encouraged by SAVE, and remained determined to study for a few hours.

Reaching the door, I grabbed the handle thinking about which floor would be best. But to my surprise, the door was locked. I moved to the next one. It was locked. I checked all the doors on the west side. All were locked tight. Just to drive the point home I guess, I walked to the east side and tried each door one by one, in case the library had chosen this particular evening to run some sort of IQ test. Each of these doors were similarly locked — even the door reserved for the handicapped wouldn't open.

I stood there alone on the black mat in front of the automatic door, wondering why in the hell my library was closed at 9 p.m. during the middle of the semester. Was there a librarians' strike? Was it a national holiday? Were the 'Cats playing a home game?

While still deeply pondering these questions, a piece of paper taped to the inside of the door caught my attention. Moving closer, I discovered it was a crudely printed calendar of library events. Quickly finding the Friday column, I looked for some substantial reason as to why the building was locked tighter than a church on a weekday.

Roblin Meeks

Collegian Columnist

I discovered, for some reason, the library closes every Friday at 8 p.m., regardless of the basketball schedule. What's even more astounding is it doesn't open on Saturdays until 10 a.m., and only remains open through 6 p.m. On Sundays, the doors open promptly at noon and close at midnight. Exceptions are allowed for finals week exclusively, and then nobody really knows the hours.

As I stood there beguiled, wide-eyed, a little more than irate and slowly beginning to freeze, another apparent newcomer to Friday night scholarship walked up. Although he probably saw me shake my head in vexation and mutter "Damn," he tried a couple of doors anyway. He must have heard something about an IQ test as well.

After a few unsuccessful tries, he looked at me inquisitively, hoping as I was earlier to find some rationale behind keeping a college library locked at 9 p.m. I told him about the schedule on the door and how this seems to be some sort of a regular practice. His face screwed up in anger. He threw his backpack on the hard cement and started ruthlessly jumping on it. After a few moments of intense violence, he started chuckling, and little by little his laughter began to swell. Louder and louder he roared until he fell on his back and began to roll around convulsively.

I stood there dumbfounded, not knowing what to do. I was half thinking about what object I could stuff in his mouth to keep him from biting his tongue when he suddenly stopped, got up, and wiped the tears of laughter from his eyes.

When I asked him why he had thrown such a fit, he said he thought the irony was simply too poetic. The library closes at 8 p.m. and the Chester E. Peters Recreation stays open until midnight. He then muttered something about priorities under his breath, summed up his present opinion of K-State in about four carefully chosen swearwords, and ran away shouting something that sounded like "serendipity."

Well, I was at a total loss. Besides the fact I had just witnessed quite a spectacle, I had never realized if a person needed to do some Friday night research, she had to go to the Rec. First "Reorganization," and now this. I had heard of Kansas being accused of skewed priorities, but I didn't know how far it could go. Before I could allow myself to think of K-State as a cruel and expensive educational joke, I had to discover the truth for myself. I hurried home to call "Rec Check," the local intramural hot line detailing the center's weekly highlights. Sure enough, it didn't close until midnight on Fridays.

Why? Couldn't Farrell find the staff to work late weekend hours? Were there just not enough people using the facilities to justify the utilities? Or was education just not as important as recreation?

Now it was clear to me why that person laughed so hard in front of the library. It was ridiculously funny.

Don't worry about that 25-page paper, hit the Rec for some pickup hoops instead. Nothing beats a tough Friday night workout on the Stairmaster. If we're lucky, we might find an open racketball court. You've got to look good if you want to make it in Aggieville, you know, and besides that school thing already goes for five days a week. Why push it?

Resolved to salvage the evening, I threw my near-bursting satchel in my car and headed toward the Rec Complex. I knew there would be plenty of people there, so I practiced shouting "serendipity" a few times just to be sure to get it right.

Editorials

Media's role has two angles

Not all the issues raised in the Persian Gulf War ended with the cease-fire Wednesday. The debate of the media's proper role in reporting on military conflict was not resolved and will probably arise again. In this brief space, a journalist and a military public affairs officer will describe their viewpoints in the debate.

Journalist's viewpoint:

Openness is essential to a democracy. All Americans have the right to know what the officials of their government are doing in their name, even in war.

Yet, journalists do, at times, voluntarily refrain from providing information which the public has the right to know, such as the names of rape victims who, if a suspect is arrested, become accusers in the courts.

Accepting the statement by a government official, whether she wears stars or he wears pinstripes, without question, invites the possibility that illegal actions by the government will be hidden behind the claim of national security, as Iran-Contra and Watergate were first hidden, until journalists reported on them.

Military public affairs viewpoint:

War, like it or not, changes everything. The public's need to be informed increases, as does the military's need for secrecy.

During war, the priority of a public affairs officer is the safety of the troops. For instance, a journalist is not given the exact size of units, only authorized strengths. If exact sizes are released, it can be determined where they will be sent and endanger their lives.

For the same reason, battlefield reports are verified before panicking the public and soldiers' families unnecessarily. Misinformation can be more damaging than no information.

The military and the media do not have to like each other, or even trust each other. In fact, mistrust keeps accountability high. Somewhere the line has to be drawn between what the public has a right to know, and what could be damaging to troops if made public. What is necessary is an understanding that both journalists and the military should have a say in where that line is drawn.

Letters

EDITOR'S NOTE: The following is a letter from an Army Corporal of the 1st Infantry Division based out of Fort Riley. Cpl. William Freitas, currently stationed in the Persian Gulf, is a generator mechanic for the 101st support group. This letter was also signed by 25 other soldiers in his platoon.

Soldier in the gulf addresses protesters

Editor,

I am a 22-year-old Army soldier currently in Saudi Arabia. I've just read the Jan. 14th issue of Time magazine, and the article on page 14 was the straw that broke the camel's back.

Anti-war protesters. These people, along with other various groups, are allowed to voice their opinion because they live in a free country. But how would these people, who are free, act if they were citizens of Kuwait? What if they were citizens of any country in this area?

It is easy to be in a free country and speak out against war. What if you're in a country (even the United States) and your freedom is taken by force, against your will? What would people involved in these anti-war groups do if the U.S. was invaded and all the freedoms taken away in one swift move?

Americans have freedoms they take for granted: freedom of speech; religion; choice of occupation; choice of when, where and how to go from place to place; and even the right to vote.

Kuwait was taken against its will Aug. 4, 1990. Iraq was given five months and 11 days to give that country back to the Kuwaiti people. Would Americans want to wait that long, or even longer, while other world nations decide their fate? Would they want to wait while an invading country killed American relatives, stole American belongings and gang-raped American women? I know I sure as hell wouldn't.

A lot of people believe this is a blood for oil war. Oil has very little to do with it. Still, others think the U.S. and the United Nations should have given the economic sanctions more time to work. But the sanctions were taking too long, and the Kuwaiti citizens have been without a country long enough. Besides, the more time Saddam Hussein was given, the stronger his arsenal was becoming. Did these people want to give him enough time to achieve nuclear capabilities? That's all the world needs — a ruthless dictator with nuclear weapons.

This war is not about any of the above, but rather about the freedom of a nation. Who's to say Saddam would've stopped there? He has already sent missiles into Israel. What did they do? They were practicing a religion he doesn't agree with. Sound familiar?

What would America be like now if not for the Revolutionary War, World War I or World War II? Why should we let Saddam become as powerful as Hitler? All that would cause would be a larger war over several continents and more human lives ending unnecessarily.

People join the service, and from day one they are trained for combat. If these people joined for any other reason than to defend our free country and its allies, then they joined for the wrong reason. Every soldier, sailor and airman knows the consequences of this profession, yet every one of us is putting our lives on the line in the name of freedom. None of us really wanted war, but all knew it was inevitable. Although I may never see my wife and child again, I am willing to give my life for my country, a free United States of America.

People have said the U.S. should take care of its problems at home first. Yes, the U.S. does have problems; no government is infallible. But if we didn't take care of this problem as quickly as possible, how much longer would we have had a home? We are dealing with a man who has, in the past, used chemical weapons against his own people. What regard does he have for human life? Ask Kuwait.

The children of today are our future for tomorrow. Will they belong to a free democracy like we had the opportunity to live and grow in? Or will they live in a country ruled by a ruthless dictator?

Think of that the next time you drive (in a car you had the freedom to buy) down the street of your choice to the anti-war demonstration that you have the freedom to be able to attend.

Cpl. William Freitas
1st Infantry Division

War does kill

Editor,

I'm getting sick and tired of listening to all these mealy-mouthed peace protesters saying, "War is wrong. War kills. No blood for oil." Why don't they try saying those things to a Kuwaiti citizen and see what kind of response they get?

I term them "mealy-mouth" because they cover the truth with what they say. Are you listening out there, Wendy Herdman? Just because there are some regulations governing the means by which we exercise our freedom of speech, she seems to feel she can't say anything at all. Can't she understand English? Wasn't she at the peace protest outside the K-State Union last month?

The police did not try to stop the group, which had a legitimate permit. Do we cut down trees on campus to protest the depletion of the Brazilian rain forests? No, there are regulations against that. But we can get a permit to wave flags outside the Union. Do we throw our rubbish all over the lawns to protest America's wasteful lifestyle of not recycling? No, there are regulations against that. But we can obtain a permit to stage rallies.

The point is, rules and regulations are in place to provide some semblance of order to any demonstration of free speech. When those rules are followed, I submit the end result is a protest much more effective in getting across its message, in large part because it carries a greater air of respectability.

When Herdman, and people like her, go around making preposterous statements like she did in Tuesday's Collegian, they not only undermine their own credibility, but also the credibility of anyone who has similar goals in mind.

Finally, a little history lesson for those with extremely short memories: Who invaded a sovereign nation in a completely unprovoked act of aggression? Saddam Hussein did. Whose soldiers smashed automobiles that didn't even belong to them, set fire to oil wells that weren't theirs and stole paintings and artifacts from museums? Saddam's did. Whose soldiers rounded up totally innocent people, arrested or shot them, raped women and took premature babies out of hospital incubators and left them to die? Saddam's did.

You're right, Herdman. War kills.

Campus voices

How much control should the military have over news from the current war?

"I think they should have total control over the information. It is a matter of national security. I would rather not know about something than have Saddam Hussein know about it."

Christine Bates, senior in mechanical engineering

"I don't think they should have as much control as they do. I think they are holding back quite a bit of information right now. I think that is bad because the public has a right to know."

Education goal of heritage month

Speakers, powwow planned for Native American Month

LISA NOLL
Collegian Reporter

Making K-State students aware of the diversity of ethnic groups on campus is the goal for the 2nd Annual Native American Heritage Month.

Activities planned throughout the month of March include keynote speakers, films and a powwow.

Cheryl May, faculty staff co-chairperson for Native American Heritage Month, said most of the activities planned are for the whole K-State community.

"It is an educational-type thing, but it's also fun," May said.

Cherokee Chief Wilma Mankiller will be speaking about the economic successes of the Cherokee Nation of Oklahoma Tuesday.

"My job is to improve the overall image of Indian people. There is so little accurate information about Indian people — so many misconceptions," said Mankiller in a recent "Country Lifestyle" article. "It's a vacuum filled by movies and stereotypes."

Other lectures during the month will include "American Indians and the Prison System," "Indian Sovereignty and Taxation Issues In Kansas" and "What Really Happened at Wounded Knee."

Dale Bushyhead, senior in education, is part Cherokee.

"We don't like being called Indians, because Indians are from India," Bushyhead said.

Bushyhead said he is hopeful that with only 50-60 Native Americans on campus, programs like Native American Heritage Month will help people become more educated.

"The kind of discrimination (on campus) is when the person who is doing the discriminating doesn't realize what they're doing, because a lot of people are just ignorant of other cultures," Bushyhead said.

Other activities for the week include an Indian arts and crafts display, Native American dancers and demonstrations of sand painting and drum making.

Jeni Cardin, program adviser for Union Program Council, said the council is to try to bring numerous exhibits to the Union.

The month will end with a powwow at Pottorf Hall in Cico Park March 30.

A teepee will be placed on the lawn outside Pottorf to alert the public of the powwow.

The evening will involve children and adult Native American dancers, arts and crafts and ethnic food.

May said she hopes everyone, not just the ethnic groups, will attend the activities this month.

Future teachers help high school students

JIM STRUBER
Consumer Reporter

"We will promote teaching as a most worthy profession and make a serious effort to achieve our highest academic potential."

Rosemarie Deering, secondary education curriculum coordinator, spoke Thursday afternoon at Junction City High School to the K-State and Junction City high-school students participating in the Teachers of Tomorrow Partnership Collaboration.

Deering said the 20 K-State and Junction City high school students will maintain weekly communication by mail or telephone to share quality experiences and report on academic success throughout the remainder of the semester.

They will also get together in March and April to tour the respective campuses to better understand each other and their activities.

The pairing and partnership of college and high school students will be a learning experience. K-State students will learn what to expect in a high school setting prior to teaching after graduation.

Partnerships will provide high school students with companionship and guidance until they graduate. High school students will also learn what to expect when they entered college.

During lunch, Larry Dixon, Junction City High School principal, thanked K-State students for volunteering in the partnership program.

"I really look forward to working with you," Dixon said.

After lunch, Deering said the students wouldn't forget their partners, or the experiences shared together.

"You will change someone's life," Deering said. "If we are going to change this world we must touch hearts as well as minds. We need to touch each other's lives."

After the pairing ceremony, K-State students and high school students participated in activities to become familiar with partners participating in the program. Faculty and students from both schools were pleased with the exchange of information.

"A terrific idea, one of the best ways for high school students to become knowledgeable about what it means to become a teacher at the college level," said Marvin Darrah, associate principal of Junction City High School.

"The students will create lasting friendships, which will benefit everyone," Wanda Baker, senior in secondary education, said.

Fire burns 20 acres of grass, trees

Firefighters douse flames

ERWIN SEBA

A fire burned across 20 acres of grassland and trees Thursday night between Washington Heights subdivision and the Spillway Marina, near the Rocks area, at Tuttle Creek Lake.

The flames were quickly extinguished by volunteer firefighters from the Blue Township station of the Pottawatomie County Fire Department.

Dan Gerety, a Pottawatomie County Sheriff's deputy, said, "I got an indication that some kids were out here partying, and the fire got away."

Gerety said two people, he described as "college kids," first reported the fire to an area homeowner, who then called the fire department.

The two people told the homeowner some "college kids" were partying at the Rocks and had lit a small campfire, he said.

For the firefighters from Blue Township, it was second of the day.

"I just got out of the shower from the last fire," one firefighter said to another as they refilled the water tank of a fire truck.

Del Petty, director of Emergency Preparedness for Riley County, was at the scene of the blaze with units from the Riley County Rural Fire Department called out to assist the Pottawatomie County units.

Petty said, from his 20 years of experience fighting fires in that area, he thought a campfire started by a group of people out partying may have been the cause of the blaze when he first heard the call. The Rocks area is popular place for outdoors parties.

It is also a popular place for grass fires when the trees, brush and grass are dry, as they are at this time of year, he said.

Petty said it was supposed to rain later in the night.

Lady Cats set for tournament

BILL LANG
Sports Reporter

If the K-State Lady Cats are going anywhere, this is the time to make the travel plans.

Those plans first involve going to Salina and attempting — and hoping — to win the Big Eight Women's Basketball Tournament.

K-State coach Susan Yow said the team has as good a shot as any team in the league of winning it all and advancing to the NCAA Tournament.

K-State, 15-10 and 8-6, will open the tournament against Iowa State, 11-14 and 7-7; a team the Lady Cats split with this season. Each team won on the other's home floor, but Yow said she feels this time around, the Lady Cats will be the winners.

"That (home) loss to Iowa State was a disappointing one," she said. "That was when we went through a stretch of up and down games. We just didn't play well, and they took advantage of that."

After looking at the 73-61 road win against Iowa State on film Wednesday afternoon, Yow said the team showed the type of play that could produce a win at the tournament.

"When we played at their place, we played a great defensive game," she said. "We really got going offensively in the second half. When we put those two together, we had one of the better games that we've had all season long."

Yow said she had heard from various sources that the Big Eight should have three representatives in the NCAA Tournament. She said the top two teams in the conference — Oklahoma State and Nebraska — will definitely go, but possibly as many as three should go.

"Well, if somebody besides those two makes it to the finals, they will go," Yow said.

The winner receives an automatic spot in the national tournament.

Yow, not the kind of coach to look into the future, said she felt if the Lady Cats get by the Cyclones, it will set up the game of the tournament: K-State vs. Oklahoma State.

"That will be a good game," she said. "It probably will be the best game in the tournament."

"The winner of that one will be the one that plays the hardest, executes the best and the team that gets the most breaks."

Oklahoma State coach Dick Halterman, whose Cowgirls are 22-5 and 11-3, said he felt the label of being the No. 1 seed could potentially cause an upset.

"Well, there's a little pressure of being the No. 1 seed," he said. "Last year, it was just a rash of upsets at the tournament. This year, though, everytime we take the court there's a chance of us being upset, basically because everybody is trying their hardest to upset us."

Colorado upset the the Cowgirls, 65-63, Feb. 23 in the last game of the regular season, and it's something that may have awoken the players of O-State.

"We put together a string of wins, and then we just let down mentally and they caught us napping," Halterman said. "Right now, we're focused and ready to go. We should be able to handle Missouri. Then, if we face K-State, it will be a good game. Coach Yow is right about the winner of that one."

Ahearn site of nationals

ERIC BROWN

Many of the nation's best track athletes will compete this weekend at Ahearn Field House, as K-State will be the host of the National Junior College Athletic Association's Indoor Track and Field Championships, giving on-lookers an opportunity to preview future University talent.

K-State has signed a contract to be the host of the event for the next two years, giving the University an opportunity to showcase its facilities and possibly open some otherwise unexplored avenues in the area of recruiting.

"Just the opportunity to have those type of people on our campus is a big plus for our program," K-State coach John Capriotti said. "We're looking forward to hosting such a great event for the next two or three years."

The national championship competition will be in two sessions Friday and one Saturday. The meet kicks off Friday morning at 11, followed by the second session of trials and semifinals at 5 p.m.

Saturday's session begins at 10 a.m., when observers will witness finals in basically all of the events. Admission per session is $1 for students and $3 for adults.

Athletes to try to qualify

Track team members face last shot at getting NCAA trip

JENIFER SCHEIBLER
Sports Reporter

The pressure is on.

Thirteen K-State track and field athletes will travel to meet this weekend in an attempt to qualify for the NCAA Indoor Championships March 8-9 in Indianapolis.

"We're trying to pick up a couple more qualifiers," K-State coach John Capriotti said.

Marcus Wright (800 meters), Tyrone Watkins (400 meters), Clifton Etheridge (long jump), David Warders (5,000 meters), and Todd Trask (mile) will compete at Iowa State in Ames Friday.

Angie Miller, Dione Singleton and Shannon Flanagan will compete in the shot put; Latricia Joyner, Ernest Green and John Dedrick in the 55-meter dash; and Verida Walters in the 55-meter hurdles at the Frank Potts Invitational in Boulder, Co., Saturday.

Capriotti said the sprinters and throwers are going to the meet in Boulder because the higher altitude is more conducive to better performances in these events.

High-jumper Connie Teaberry, pentathlete Gwen Wentland and sprinter Thomas Randolph (55-meter dash) have already qualified for the national meet, Capriotti said.

Sprinter Markeya Jones will probably be headed to the national meet in the 200-meter dash, due to her fast provisional qualifying time of 24.05, just five-hundredths of a second off the automatic qualifying mark of 24.00.

Qualifying criteria set by the NCAA include automatic and provisional times and distances. An athlete who achieves an automatic standard is assured a place in the national meet.

If automatic qualifiers do not fill the field, NCAA officials fill the open spots with provisional qualifiers in order of performance (time or distance achieved during the season), Capriotti said.

He said many K-State athletes have provisionally qualified for the national meet but will likely not attend the meet due to a large number of automatic qualifiers.

There is a specific number of athletes allowed to compete, because the NCAA pays the travel expenses of athletes competing in the meet, Capriotti said.

Event fields are filled to the minimum number of athletes needed for quality competition in the particular event. If there are more automatic qualifiers in the event than the minimum number needed, the field is enlarged to accommodate all automatic qualifiers.

"The provisional marks help determine how deep (number of athletes) they'll go in each event," Capriotti said.

The K-State athletes competing this weekend are hoping to achieve automatic qualifying performances or improve their provisional qualifying marks, Capriotti said.

He said although the pressure is on for these athletes to qualify, they are often able to compete well in these meets.

"They know this is it," he said.

Another road trip awaits team; squad looks for 2nd team win

DAN WICKER
Sports Reporter

Another weekend leads to another long trip for the K-State women's tennis team.

The team just returned Monday from Utah and left Thursday en route to Albuquerque, N.M., for a three-match contest that runs through Sunday.

Today, the Wildcats take on Washington, followed by New Mexico Saturday and Furman Sunday morning.

"I wish I knew more about them. New Mexico is the only team that I am familiar with," K-State coach Steve Bietau said. "Washington and Furman we have never played before. New Mexico, I think we beat 7-2 last year."

K-State is coming off of its first victory of the season last weekend when they captured a victory over Utah, but because of the caliber of schedule the team has faced, its record has suffered at 1-8.

"I think this might be the weekend to see some progress that we haven't been able to see against some of the teams because they were so good," Bietau said. "I don't expect these schools to be up at the level of the teams we have been up against, but we can't back off because they are not as strong. They are definitely solid teams."

Bietau said he is hoping that this weekend could help build the confidence of the team and put some wins under their belts. He said a win would definitely help the team, however, its level of play has not suffered because of some tough road losses.

"A win couldn't hurt us. They've done a particularly good job maintaining an aggressive yet reasonable perspective, and to this point I don't think the fact that we've lost some matches has affected our play," Bietau said. "However, it is still an obvious concern."

Although the excitement level of the members may be escalated heading into this weekend, Bietau said he feels the team will approach these matches just the same as the matches against the more proven teams.

"We don't place a lot of emphasis on one particular match or another, and we work very hard to maintain our consistency in the way we approach every match," Bietau said.

Bietau said the struggle that has faced the tennis team this year has been tough, but he said he feels it is something the team needs.

"There is a certain amount of struggle that we like to take place. The level of our schedule this year, and who we have to play, really borders on overdoing it," Bietau said. "I don't see players coming out to practice and matches acting like they don't care."

'Cats travel to Colorado

DAVID SVOBODA
Sports Editor

The K-State baseball team, fresh off back-to-back doubleheader thrashings of lesser competition, returns to action Saturday in Colorado for a pair of weekend twinbills.

Both doubleheaders will be contested in Fort Collins, with the Saturday matchup pitting the Wildcats and Wyoming, last year's third-place finisher in the WAC.

Sunday's double dip will see K-State and Colorado State square off.

K-State will send Kent Hipp, Sean Pedersen, Dave Christensen and Chris Hmielewski to the hill over the weekend.

K-State Coach Mike Clark said the team has plenty of incentive to do well.

"Last year, we played Colorado State and lost a game to them," he said. "That's one of the things our players talked about in the huddle at the end of practice today (Thursday). They want to get it back."

Sooners final regular-season foe for men

TODD FERTIG
Sports Reporter

Twenty-four days and six Big Eight losses ago, the 'Cats recorded their last victory. In light of their record, it's hard to believe that following their last win, the 'Cats were looking realistically to rebound into conference contention.

But their last win was no ordinary win. In case you don't recall, the win that moved the 'Cats to 2-5 in the conference and put the team briefly back in the race, was against the then 23rd-ranked Oklahoma Sooners.

The reason for such optimism following one victory? The Sooners were not merely defeated in Bramlage Coliseum Feb. 5, they were fast-broke, outmuscled and gunned down by the Wildcat squad fans hoped to see all year.

A squad shooting just 45 percent on the season, K-State shot 64 percent from the field, including an incredible 73 percent in the second half, in shocking the visiting Sooners.

Since the two-game winning streak over Colorado and OU, the 'Cats have seen their chance of rejoining the conference race reduced to zero. But while the outlook of the 'Cats has changed over the weeks, so has that of the Sooners.

Oklahoma came to town with a mark of 15-6 and 4-3 in the conference. Like every Billy Tubbs-coached team, the Sooners had run several teams out of the gym and looked like a definite postseason contender.

The loss to K-State, however, seems to have taken the wind out of OU's sails. Following the loss in Manhattan, the Sooners fell from the national rankings and dropped their next five straight Big Eight contests. The rematch seems a fitting finale for both teams who have watched their high hopes for the season go up in smoke since their last meeting.

"I'm sure they're disappointed with the way their season has gone, just as we're disappointed," Altman said. "They've been inconsistent this season, like we have been, and I'm sure they're looking for something positive to get them going."

Oklahoma edged Colorado 69-68 Wednesday to stop the losing streak, but remains just above K-State in the conference race at 5-8. Altman said his team matches up more favorably with the Sooners than with many teams in the Big Eight.

"They're not a huge team around the basket, and we were able to stay with them defensively," Altman said. "They've had some injuries lately, and they're just not as talented as they've been in years past."

While the 'Cats shot the lights out in their last meeting with OU, they also held the typically high-powered Sooner offense in check. The team that averages 97.8 points per outing was held to just 70 points on 36 percent shooting. Price was handled on the perimeter, scoring just five points on the evening.

"We've got to make sure defensively that they don't get things going and get the crowd really into it," Altman said. "We've also got to do a better job on the boards than we did against Missouri."

Smith quietly emerges as one of Big 8's best

Scott Paske
Sports Reporter

Thanks to a teammate who scored 14 points above his average Wednesday, Missouri's Doug Smith joined an elite Big Eight Conference club without much fanfare.

Smith grabbed his 1,000th career rebound in the first half against K-

State, placing him with former Kansas star Danny Manning and Oklahoma's Wayman Tisdale and Darryl Kennedy as the only players in league history to score 2,000 points and grab 1,000 rebounds in their careers.

Yet Smith was scoreless for the game's first 13 minutes, received a technical foul for hanging on the rim in the first half, and made just 5-of-15 shots for the game.

Meanwhile, Smith's inside mate, Chris Heller, in just his sixth start of the season, was pulling down rebounds, blocking shots and had 12 points by the 11:43 mark in the opening half.

The unlikely hero carried the Tigers until Smith got things rolling and helped Missouri hold off several K-State comeback attempts.

"You can say Doug had an off game," Missouri coach Norm Stewart said, "but he still had 16 points."

That is why it will be sad to see Smith head for the NBA next season. For the past four years, Smith has electrified the league with 40-point performances, powerful dunks, and at 6-foot-10, has run the fast break with more agility and grace than a lot of guards.

When he hasn't posted eye-popping scoring numbers, Smith has intimidated post players with his size and leaping ability, and his passing skills are only a step behind Manning's when he led the Jayhawks to the 1988 national championship.

"It's phenomenal what he's done," Stewart said. "He had a tough time tonight, but at the end, when we needed some things done, he got some key rebounds and made a couple great passes."

What Smith did against the 'Cats is indicative of what he has done all season. When Missouri had to play the opening half of the year without ineligible All-Big Eight guard Anthony Peeler, Smith carried the Tigers with four outings of more than 20 points.

When Peeler came back, Smith got better. He is currently averaging 23.2 points per game, and has posted performances of 40 points against Oklahoma State and 38 against Oklahoma.

And for all Smith has done on the court this year, it may be what he did before the season began that merits

IN FOCUS

■ Jim Gayner, St. Marys, removes rubble from the remains of the Immaculata Church. Gayner spends the better part of his day removing old rocks, bricks and marble from the burned-out structure.

What once was, Shall be again.

■ The roof and interior of the Immaculata Church in St. Marys was destroyed by fire in 1978. A committee has been attempting to raise the millions of dollars necessary to restore the church that started in 1849.

Committee works to revive Immaculata Church

Jim Gayner paused in his work as the sound of children's laughter floated over the ragged walls into the roofless stone church.

After 12 years, the half-burned structure of the Immaculata Church has become a common sight to the children of St. Mary's Academy. They pass by it on their way to class or to play football in the grassy field at the bottom of the hill without even pausing to look up at the majestic building that stands open to the elements just 30 yards away.

But Gayner, a 23-year-old who grew up in St. Marys, doesn't just pass by. He spends most of his day among the rubble of rock and marble littering what once was the floor of the church.

Gayner was hired by the restoration committee for the church to begin clearing some of the rock and foliage that has been growing in the church since a fire in 1978 destroyed the interior and roof of the building, leaving only a shell of stone.

"Jim is basically working slave labor," said his father, Gerry Gayner, who is one of the members of the five-member committee who hired him to start the preliminary clean-up. "He's more or less a volunteer just like the rest of us who are helping with the restoration."

Gerry Gayner said the biggest obstacle for the committee and its goal to restore the Immaculata Church has been raising the millions of dollars needed to fund the project.

"Everything stems from the money," he said. "If someone with really deep pockets comes by tomorrow, we'd be able to get this done right away. But as it is now it'll take quite a bit longer because we're working on smaller monthly donations, and we have quite a bit to go."

In an effort to raise the money, the committee has sent more than 15,000 mailers asking potential donors for help.

Black and Veatch, an engineering firm in Kansas City, Mo., has already designed plans for the footings needed to be built into the hill to make it possible to build an addition to the back of the church.

"We have the money to have the footings done, and maybe some of the steel work," Gerry Gayner said, "but probably not all of it."

He said the committee has people working to locate another altar to replace the church's original one that was destroyed in the fire. The original altar was made of Carrara marble from Italy and was designed by the Joseph Sibbel Studio of New York, and the committee believes others like it might exist.

The search for the altar continues; the fund-raising continues; planning and design for the construction of the church continues; and the preliminary clean-up begins.

The small trees that had begun to grow within the stone walls have been cut down and removed, and Jim Gayner said he is slowly making headway on removing the small mountains of rubble that have piled up during the years.

"It gets really lonely working up here all day by myself," Jim Gayner said. "It's hard to make myself come in some days."

He said the committee hopes to have the rubble cleared from the area by this summer so they can have the new foundation laid.

"It's not going to be a one-man job, though. Some of these pieces of marble are incredibly heavy," he said pointing at the dirty, broken, headless marble Madonna statue that lay among the rubble.

Gerry Gayner said, "We don't have any idea, yet, how long it's going to take, but we will eventually accomplish our goal."

They said the goal is to bring the church that bystanders said they saw die 12 years ago back to life.

■ Members of the St. Marys' Academy ascend steps leading to the former front door of the church. The burned-out structure has been a common sight since it burned about 12 years ago.

Artist, author speaks for last convocation

SUZANNE BROWN
Collegian Reporter

Charged with emotion and strong opinions, Judy Chicago, artist and author, concluded this year's University Convocation Series.

Chicago has been a professional artist for about 30 years. For the final convocation lecture, she discussed her ideas concerning women in the art community and details of the projects she has done.

Calling herself a child prodigy, Chicago said she always wanted to be an artist. She began art lessons at the age of five. Chicago was raised in a Jewish family and said her father strongly believed in equal rights for women.

"I was raised to believe the world could be changed, and I could contribute to that change," Chicago said. "I spend a lot of time thinking about power and power struggles on the planet. Even necessary wars cause great human suffering."

Chicago said she tries to make her contributions through her art and tries to make a contribution to the transformation of consciousness.

She said she has spent years trying to break into the male-dominated art community. Her book, "Through the Flower: My Struggles as a Woman Artist," outlines her determination to claim womanhood in her life and art. "I've spent a number of years trying to build a context for myself and for other women, a context that included setting up galleries and institutions, a women's building, educational programs, specifically geared to the needs of young women trying to become artists."

Through these things, Chicago said the ultimate goal of securing a place in history for her work and a context outside of her work, which alone makes it understood, can be realized.

Chicago presented slides depicting the various art forms of her projects "The Dinner Party," "The Birth Project," and her current one concerning the Holocaust.

"The Dinner Party" completed a 10-year worldwide tour and there is now a search being conducted for a permanent home for the exhibit. The exhibit is a triangle of 45 feet on each side set as a dining table. There are 39 place settings, at which Chicago placed those women whom she said made great contributions to civilization.

The Board of Through the Flower, an art organization supporting Chicago, her work and women artists, chose to make "The Dinner Party" a gift to the University of the District of Columbia.

However, the exhibit came under what Chicago termed a right-wing attack. It was under heated debate in the House of Representatives and was accused of being pornographic. Chicago and the Board of Through the Flower chose to withdraw the gift to calm tensions mounting on the UDC campus.

In 1985, Chicago said she became very interested in her Jewish heritage. Opening in the fall of 1993 will be an exhibit concerning the Holocaust. In 1987, Chicago and her husband took a two-and-a-half-month trip so she could research this event.

The exhibit that entails Chicago's studies will be a combination of stained glass, painting and photography. Chicago said the function of the project is to show what happened.

Through the works in the exhibit, Chicago said she tried to establish a gender balance. She said the Holocaust is usually seen from a male viewpoint, but women also suffered.

Chicago said it is easy to forget what the human cost of the genocide really was, and that is what she wants her audience to remember, along with the cost of human suffering.

Chicago made many comparisons throughout the Holocaust exhibit with nuclear weapons and waste. Chicago said we must awaken to this, no matter how painful.

"My life, my work and 'The Dinner Party' are committed to the equality and empowerment of all peoples," Chicago said.

Campus leaders to exchange ideas

140 Kansas students discuss leadership

DAVE McCULLAGH
Collegian Reporter

Students from K-State and several other Kansas colleges and universities will be attending the 2nd annual Kansas "Student Leadership Forum: Faith Values and Leadership," in Topeka this weekend.

The forum allows student leaders from different schools throughout Kansas to meet and listen to experienced leaders.

The students attending will be those with leadership experience on campus.

"K-State will have more students attending than any other school," said Dave Mugler, director of resident instruction in agriculture.

The students and faculty advisers — enablers — will have a chance to get acquainted after registration Saturday. The students will have a pizza party and a trip to the YMCA for recreation, while the enablers will have a meeting at the Ramada Inn.

The two enablers from K-State are Mugler and Bernard Franklin, assistant dean of student life.

Franklin said K-State is sending a wide variety of students to the forum.

"We invited some student senators, fraternity members, black student union members, native american students, off-campus students and international students. We are trying to be fair," Franklin said.

Franklin is also responsible for leadership development on campus.

"We try to expose students to the different points of view about leadership," Franklin said.

"They won't observe the legislature, but they will spend time with people in the legislature," Franklin said.

Sunday, the schedule alternates between several speakers and small group discussions. The speakers include Mark McEntyre, former speechwriter for former vice president George Bush; Jim Ryun, former Olympic runner; Bill Kinney, former quarterback of the Kansas City Chiefs; and Rep. Jim Slattery, R-Kan.

Mark Meisinger, president of FarmHouse, attended last year's forum and said he thinks this year's will be better.

"They are trying to include the governor a little bit more," Meisinger said. "She is the host of a dessert at Cedar Crest (the governor's mansion) Sunday evening."

Gov. Joan Finney's office sent a letter directly to President Wefald inviting K-State students to the forum.

Franklin said he invited more K-State students because about half wouldn't be able to attend the forum.

"We should have a good showing, with a cross-section of campus," Franklin said.

Franklin said one international student from Jordan had some reservations about attending.

"She was worried about things said against Iraq and being left out with the American-Christian perspective of the forum," Franklin said.

Franklin contacted the coordinating committee and was assured that the student wouldn't feel uncomfortable.

Panel discusses date violence

ULRIKE DAUER
Collegian Reporter

About 25 K-State students, along with more than 100 campuses across the United States, Canada and Bermuda, attended a national teleconference on violence in dating, broadcast by satellite Tuesday in the Union.

The broadcast discussed the issues, causes and possible solutions of dating violence.

Between 14 and 52 percent of all undergraduate students on campuses across the United States have experienced some form of dating violence, said Lynette Heard, teleconference moderator.

Bonnie Carlson, associate professor of social welfare at State University of New York at Albany, said a recent study showed up to 75 percent of the students have at least once participated in a violent relationship.

"Officials have been surprised that it occurs so often. Dating violence is much more prevalent on campuses than most people have thought," Carlson said.

She said as dating violence, the violation of the physical integrity of another person is understood. It can include, but is not limited to slapping, shoving, hitting, punching, kicking, beating up, threatening with a weapon or actually using a weapon toward a dating partner.

Arthur Chickering, university professor of leadership and human development at George Mason University, said date rape is the ultimate expression of dating violence. About 98 percent of date rapes are initiated by the male, whereas date violence might be initiated by male or female.

Dating violence is not primarily a male-to-female phenomenon, as many assume, Carlson said. The rates of inflicting violence are in the same range for men and women.

However, it looks as if men are more likely to initiate violence, whereas women use violence in self-defense, she said.

In general, women are more likely to be victims, and men are two-to-three times more likely to have used violence.

Young men tend to be taught to be more aggressive and competitive, traits which make them incapable to further define and manage interpersonal intimacy, and women have more problems dealing with separation.

Carlson said in women, the fear of their mate leaving is stronger than the fear of the violence, and this is one of the reasons why women remain in violent relationships.

She said there are freshmen who

Minority students attend medical conference

KEVIN CARROLL
Collegian Reporter

Attending mock MCAT exams and attaining information for financial aid are just two areas to be covered for future medical students in the 11th Annual Minority Premed Conference at the University of Iowa.

Representatives from K-State's Minority Assembly of Students in Health, which is funded by the Health Careers Pathways Program from the KU Medical Center, will be attending the conference scheduled for today and Saturday.

"We have a full load of students attending the conference," said Aurora Rowland, sophomore in pre-occupational therapy and president of MASH. "This is the biggest trip that MASH has ever taken."

John Buchanan, junior in pre-med and treasurer of MASH, said the group attended a similar conference last semester at KU, but interest in the Iowa trip has been much larger.

One of the main objectives of the conference is to provide information to minority students interested in pursuing a medical career.

Even though MASH has a minority title, members of the group encourage anyone who is seeking a medical career to join.

"The fact is we want anyone to be a member. MASH is an excellent opportunity for students to get involved with their major."

Film informs students on AIDS

JENNIE DILLON
Collegian Reporter

The focus of the Peer AIDS Education Program presented by Marisa Larson, sophomore in broadcast journalism and Patrick Lee, sophomore in criminal justice, was that everyone needs to be concerned about AIDS, because AIDS doesn't discriminate.

A film, "AIDS: Changing the Rules," was shown to a group of seven people and was followed by a question-and-answer period.

"This is one area everybody needs to be educated in," said Cindy Burke, director of health education. "Everybody needs updates."

The film tells what AIDS is, how the virus is spread and how to avoid it. In the film, AIDS victims relate how they contracted the virus.

AIDS cannot be caught through casual contact such as touching, sharing food or kissing. The strongest defense against the virus is abstinence. The only way to avoid AIDS during sexual contact is to use a condom with a spermicide containing Nonoxonyl-9, a chemical that kills the AIDS virus.

The virus must be spread through the body to have any effect on the victim.

"The AIDS virus cannot survive in the air," Lee said.

AIDS tests check for the presence of AIDS antibodies, they do not reveal the actual virus. A person may be afflicted with the virus even if a test does not indicate a positive response.

"Most people don't know they have it," Lee said. "That's what makes it so dangerous."

Testing for the virus is available at Lafene Student Health Center and results are recorded. Anonymous testing is available at the Manhattan Health Department.

Conference will focus on young horse care

By the Collegian Staff

The 9th Annual Horseman's Conference will be from noon to 9 p.m. Saturday at Williams Auditorium in Umberger Hall.

The afternoon session, from noon to 4 p.m., will feature five speakers — Judy Cox, Gary Brandt, Rick DeBowes, Randy Raub and Kathy Anderson — focusing on foal management.

"They will discuss general health care and the effects of exercise and nutrition on a young growing horse," said Mark Arns, Extension horse specialist.

The evening training session will be from 6-9 p.m.

"Three trainers from Kansas — Billy Allen, Bill James and Terry Champagne will discuss how to train a two-year-old horse," Arns said.

After the first session and before the second will be a poster session and a dinner in Weber Hall.

U.S. involvement in gulf war questioned by local panel

Members relieved fighting finished, fear human cost

ERWIN SEBA
Staff Reporter

The members of a panel on the Persian Gulf War sponsored by the Manhattan Coalition for Peace in the Middle East expressed relief Thursday that the fighting is over but raised questions about the reasons for America's involvement in the conflict.

Saying that he and the other panel members were part of the 10 percent of the American public who do not support the war, John Exdell, associate professor of philosophy, said the conflict is a catastrophe.

"We're overwhelmed by different emotions," Exdell said. "As we see it, this war is a catastrophe."

He said the human catastrophe for the Iraqi people has been hidden from view by the mainstream media.

"What has taken place in the past few weeks has been slaughter on an immense scale," Exdell said.

Exdell told the audience of about 80 people in the K-State Union Courtyard watching the noon-hour forum that he is not a complete pacifist.

"I believe it is permissible to kill only when it is unavoidable," he said. "The burden of proof is greater when we're talking about war."

The Persian Gulf War was avoidable, Exdell said. President Bush's justification for Operation Desert Shield — that Iraq was about to invade Saudi Arabia — was not proven by CIA reports and satellite photographs.

And Bush's claims that Saddam Hussein would remove his forces from Kuwait without being forced out were also untrue, he said. Saddam made two proposals for solving the crisis prior to the end of 1990.

"These proposals were disregarded," Exdell said. "The United States could have achieved its purpose through diplomacy and a historically unique set of sanctions." Bush ignored these opportunities because the United States wishes to have control over the flow of oil from the Middle East, he said.

Cosima Dabbas, president of the international coordinating council and a graduate student in journalism and mass communications, said the United States was only interested in ending occupations which are contrary to U.S. interests.

"The occupation of Palestine has been going on for 20 years and the United States has done nothing about it," Dabbas said. "Not only has it done nothing about it, it has blocked United Nations Security Council resolutions against it."

"No occupation should stand," she said. "No occupation, not just those that are not in the interests of the United States."

Park provides safe trail for bikers

MEREDITH JONES
Collegian Reporter

Manhattan's Linear Park provides a safe trail for both bicyclists and pedestrians.

Ron Fehr, assistant director of the parks and recreation department for the City of Manhattan, said phase one of the trail is completed and is about five miles long. That section runs through the southeast corner of Manhattan from Casement Road to Fort Riley Blvd.

He said the city is working on completing phase two, which will cross Fort Riley Blvd. at Wildcat Creek, by Showbiz Pizza Place.

Fehr said the park, which the city hopes to have completed by the end of this year, will eventually circle the city and be a total of 25 miles long.

Phase two is in an engineering phase, which will include structures and highway and creek crossings, Fehr said. The city is currently obtaining permits to build those structures and a permit for a surface across the tracks of the Union Pacific Railroad.

Phase two will also be five miles long. When completed it will link east and west sides of Manhattan by way of a south route, Fehr said.

The surface of phase one is mostly a limestone screening surface, or a very fine compacted gravel. The trailway under bridges is concrete. The new part will be made of gravel chips and concrete or asphalt.

Fehr said he didn't know when the entire Linear Park would be completed, but land acquisitions are underway.

Linear Park was part of the Quality of Life bond issue, which was approved in July of 1986. Linear Park received $451,000 of the $2.72-million bond issue and phase one began in May of 1988.

Fehr said the trail is used quite heavily.

"People are excited about the trail," he said.

Bicycles have grown in popularity, Fehr said. They are not just used for recreation and fitness, but now for transportation. Linear Park offers safe bicycle routes, and parents like to have a safe place where their children can ride.

Plan

Law said he remains cautiously optimistic about the changes made in the plan.

"A plan is just a piece of paper," he said. "It can be adhered to or be ignored. Before, it has just been ignored."

Don Hoyt, K-State assistant provost for planning and evaluative services, said re-zoning this area will not affect student housing much.

Because enrollment is projected to go down for the next few years and then increase significantly into the year 2000, the city will have enough advanced warning to build additional housing in other areas through private enterprise and the University to accommodate the increase, he said.

Although the demand for housing nearer to campus will increase with the rise in enrollment, students will have to look for housing in other areas of Manhattan.

According to the land-use plan, slightly more than 40 percent of the anticipated new residential development will take place north and northwest of Manhattan.

Cattell said he foresees this as the area many multiple-family dwellings will be built to house the projected increase in city population and K-State students.

"If new apartments are needed but are not allowed in the area near K-

State, where will they go?" Cattell said. "They will probably move near to where Woodway Apartments are now, or further out. Energy consumption and traffic then become concerns when these areas are developed for student use."

Law said he would like to see a growth moratorium be put into place in the downtown and Aggieville areas.

"The area was never designed for high density housing. I would like a commitment by the city to simply enforce laws and codes on the books," he said. "If the original plan went through, a lot of people would have moved out of the area, sold their houses for less than they are worth, and slum lords would have moved in. We need to give people an incentive to stay and invest."

Law said the city should encourage those residents in the area to invest in their houses.

"Quality and deterioration are both contagious," he said. "If people start fixing up their homes, that will usually encourage their neighbors to do the same."

Cattell said the current land-use plan was drafted because the existing plan was written in 1969, and was out of date.

"The land-use plan is a 15 to 20 year guide for the city to use," he said. "If area conditions change, then the city commission must change the plan before anything can be done."

Violence

have already had prior experience with more than one violent relationship. This is a major concern because, with every violent relationship experience, the victim becomes more likely to accept violence as a normal part of relationships.

This means, by the time the person gets married, the victim may expect violence to be a part of the marriage.

"Many, if not most, of the marital relationships that are violent now, began as violent dating relationships," she said.

Chickering said men who use violence in a relationship usually have problems with themselves. Often they are incapable of showing emotions or developing an effective, intimate relationship.

Usually men who use violence were raised in families where violence between parents occurred frequently; they learned violence is the legitimate and ultimate way of dealing with problems.

Chickering said alcohol is often involved in the violence.

Judy Davis, director of the K-State Women's Resource Center, said victims rarely report dating violence. "We have to rely on predictions and surveys," Davis said.

Chickering said women who are involved in a violent relationship tend to deny it, sometimes because they don't realize what is happening is actually violent and abusive.

Chickering also said victims who deny dating violence are harming themselves in the long term. The pervasiveness of the impact of violence is devastating to their interpersonal competency.

James Hurst, professor of psychology at the University of Wyoming, said the violation of trust precludes the woman's chance to be able to develop intimacy in future relationships.

The speakers at the teleconference said violent relationships are sometimes difficult to recognize.

They also agreed universities should act against dating violence and establish counseling centers and other facilities.

"Campuses can no longer deny that the problem exists," Carlson said.

The panelists suggested programs to help the victims of dating violence and support groups for men who react violently.

"The key is to get batterers to acknowledge that they have a problem," Carlson said.

Chickering proposed programs to train peers and orientate new students. He said the judicial system needs to be sensitized of the uniqueness of the dating violence problem so victims are more willing to stand up in public.

Cattle producers to review research

Businessmen, producers to discuss challenges facing Kansas beef industry

JODELL LAMER
Collegian Reporter

The 78th annual Cattlemen's Day will be today at the Brandeberry Indoor Complex.

"Cattlemen's Day is an event to update producers and others in agribusiness on the latest research available to the cattle industry," said Gerry Kuhl, associate professor of animal sciences and industry.

The event features a morning program called "Timely Topics," a series of short informational sessions on subjects relevant to those involved in the beef industry.

Kuhl said one of the topics will be on what animal science graduates are doing after they leave K-State.

Kuhl said he thinks this is something our audience will really be interested in, since most of them are alumni.

The afternoon program will feature Don Smith, president of the National Cattlemen's Association.

Smith is from Tribune and will speak about opportunities and challenges facing Kansas cattlemen.

Kuhl said the focus of the afternoon will be on how the cattle industry needs to become more business-minded.

"As an industry, it has an enormous responsibility to this state," he said.

He said beef in Kansas represents about a $3.5-billion industry and is the largest industry in the state in terms of cash receipts.

Guy Kiracofe, professor of animal sciences and industry, said they are planning on having about 1,000 people attend the event.

"Most of those will be beef-cattle producers," Kiracofe said.

The event begins at 8 a.m. and will continue throughout the afternoon. Kuhl said he encourages students to attend.

more respect.

The Tigers captured the 1990 Big Eight championship amid an NCAA investigation into recruiting violations. The hammer came down last fall, and it cost the Tigers one of their premier underclassmen in guard Travis Ford, who transferred to Kentucky.

With Mizou's ship sinking fast, Smith kept it afloat by announcing he would stay in school and bypass early entry into the NBA draft. It was a pleasant twist to the trend set by LSU's Chris Jackson and Illinois' Marcus Liberty.

Smith, like Mitch Richmond, Jeff Grayer, Manning and Derrick Chievous, will be missed after he scores his last basket in a Big Eight uniform. He's truly been one of the league's all-time greats.

Lyman Baker, instructor of English, said the U.S. actions in the Persian Gulf War were part of a long-standing American policy to maintain control over natural resources in Third World countries.

Quoting from State Department documents written by George Kennan, considered by many to be the father of the policy of containment which was the basis for U.S.-Soviet relations through the Cold War, Baker said the diplomat recommended ensuring control of natural resources possessed by Third World nations through support of repressive regimes.

"It is better to have a strong regime in power than a liberal government that will be soft and allow in Communists," Baker quoted Kennan.

Hallie Holman, wife of Spc. Kyle Holman, ties a ribbon to a tree Saturday for her husband serving with Fort Riley's Alpha Company, 1st Engineer Battalion in Saudi Arabia. Families of the soldiers gathered at the battalion headquarters on the post to tie ribbons to the trees. More than 170 ribbons were tied to this one.

Allied forces clear way for permanent truce in Persian Gulf War

By the Associated Press

SAFWAN, Iraq — Allied and Iraqi military commanders cleared the way Sunday for a permanent truce in the Persian Gulf War, reaching agreement on the release of prisoners and taking steps to avoid further skirmishes.

"I am very happy to tell you that we agreed on all matters," the Desert Storm commander, Gen. H. Norman Schwarzkopf, said after a two-hour meeting in a heavily guarded tent at Safwan air base in southern Iraq.

Schwarzkopf said Iraqi military officers came to discuss and cooperate with a positive attitude. If such dealings continue, the commander told reporters, "We are well on our way to a lasting peace."

The Iraqi commanders also turned over information on the location of hundreds of thousands of mines Iraq planted in Kuwait and Persian Gulf waters.

For their part, the allies promised to withdraw their forces from the Iraqi territory they hold once a formal cease-fire is signed.

Schwarzkopf refused to predict when that may happen, and he said a second meeting with the Iraqi commanders was possible.

The general did not mention other demands the allies have made, demands that could conceivably delay a permanent cease-fire and the long-awaited day when the United States begins withdrawing its 530,000 soldiers.

The United Nations spelled out those requirements Saturday night.

Before a formal cease-fire can be adopted, the world body's Security Council said, in a new resolution, Iraq must also rescind its annexation of Kuwait and accept liability for war damages in the emirate.

In addition, the Security Council reaffirmed earlier anti-Baghdad measures, including one that imposed worldwide trade sanctions on Iraq.

The latest resolution backs President Bush's position that allied troops remain in Iraq until the cease-fire he declared Thursday becomes permanent.

As the complicated endgame to the war continued, there were new reports of civil unrest in Iraq.

Washington, repeatedly, has urged Iraqis to overthrow Saddam Hussein, but U.S. officers say they don't know whether anti-government protests in Iraq have become widespread or are turning into a popular revolt.

Saddam, meanwhile, began the long process of rebuilding his war-torn nation and restoring his image as a regional leader to be reckoned with.

Baghdad Radio reported Sunday that he led a meeting on restoration of Iraqi communications, the first report of his activities since Tuesday.

Returning to the offensive, on radio at least, Iraq repeated its call for Saudis to overthrow King Fahd, claiming his government was responsible for the deaths of innocent Iraqis because it hosted the U.S.-led multinational force.

In Washington, Secretary of States James Baker III said Sunday the United States seeks to maintain an enhanced naval presence in the Persian Gulf but wants Arab countries to dominate postwar security arrangements.

President Hosni Mubarak of Egypt, a key player in the anti-Iraq coalition led by the United States, went even further.

He ruled out Western involvement in any postwar security arrangement in the gulf. "Arab security will only be Arab, and it will have all the protection needed for this part of the world," he said in a speech in Cairo.

On the battlefield, the allies continued to capture Iraqi tanks, artillery pieces, warplanes and prisoners, the U.S. command said Sunday.

In one engagement, Marine Brig. Gen. Richard Neal said, navy helicopters flew over Faylakah Island off Kuwait on Sunday morning, calling through loudspeakers for Iraqi soldiers to surrender and assemble.

Naval forces then went in and took 1,405 POWs, including a brigadier general and 89 other officers, Neal told reporters in Riyadh, Saudi Arabia.

No new allied casualties or significant clashes were reported anywhere in Kuwait or occupied Iraq during the past 24 hours, he said.

Baghdad Radio reported earlier that Saddam led two meetings to discuss rebuilding the nation, and, at sunset, read from the Koran, Islam's holy book and at the tomb of a former defense minister.

The radio said Saddam met Saturday night with his information minister and deputy chief of staff to discuss restoring nationwide TV and radio service in the wake of the allies' six-week bombing campaign.

Pictures of Saddam meeting with ministers were later broadcast on Iraqi television.

The International Red Cross' chief representative in Baghdad said Sunday that Iraqi officials told him they were ready to start the repatriation of POWs according to details worked out in the meeting.

University offers support services for physically limited

Program offers handicapped students equal opportunity to excel in classroom

BETH PALMER
Collegian Reporter

Learning disabled students are a fast-growing percentage of the student body at K-State.

These students have special needs and K-State provides a wide range of supportive services for them through the department of Services for Students with Physical Limitations. This department is located in Holton Hall under the direction of Gretchen Holden.

"Currently, we are serving 110 students," said Michelle Rumsey, graduate student in special education in learning disabilities. Rumsey is the learning disabilities specialist for the program.

The program offers services such as test-taking accommodations, note-takers, editorial assistance and taped textbooks and lectures. Students can have extended test times or have the test read to them, Rumsey said.

"According to Section 504 of the Rehabilitation Act, I provide reasonable accommodations in accordance to a student documentation of a specific learning disability," Rumsey said.

Section 504 states that no qualified handicapped person shall, on the basis of handicap, be subjected to discrimination in employment under any program or activity to which this part applies.

To be eligible for the services, students must provide verification of the learning disability.

"If someone walks in and says they have an impairment, I can't take their word for it. I need documentation," said Lynette Matthews, graduate student in college student personnel services. Matthews is the center program coordinator.

"This has to be supported by the document they have from a clinical psychologist or a school psychologist," Rumsey said. "If a student doesn't have a document, I do an informal assessment to see if there's a pattern which might indicate a learning disability."

"We go through a battery of questions, almost like a clinical test. If I see a pattern that might be a learning disability, I refer them to a psychologist," Rumsey said. "In some cases, the student has a medical problem and they are referred to Lafene, possibly for depression or stress."

"Many students don't know where to turn so this is their first stop a lot of the time," Matthews said.

"Some of our students use us for one or two classes depending on the teacher, the material and the disability," Matthews said. "Some students need letter and note-takers and some need more, like all the tests."

The program also serves as a liaison with the students' instructors so they know how to help the student succeed in the classroom.

"At the beginning of each semester, they type up a letter to introduce my teacher to my situation. It gives advice on how they (the teacher) can accommodate me in the classroom environment," said Robert Jones, senior in general business. Jones suffered a head injury in April 1989 and has been using the service since then.

"A lot of the instructors have had students with disabilities and know what we're talking about," Matthews said. "The majority are willing and eager to work with us."

The workers and students have built a great reputation for the center with honesty so the instructors don't have to worry about test security. The teachers show they trust the workers and the department, Matthews said.

"Security is not a problem. They're (the students) so thankful they have an equal opportunity," Matthews said. "It's not an advantage, it's equalizing it out."

Without this facility, many students with disabilities would not be able to cope with normal classroom procedures and test-taking.

"The knowledge is there, it's just how to get to it," Jones said. "Some need a different method than the traditional approach."

"This facility has really helped me tremendously into getting back into the functional student environment," Jones said. "Without this service, I don't even know what I'd do. I definitely wouldn't be in college."

Jet crashes short of airport

No survivors found in wreck near Colorado Springs

By the Associated Press

COLORADO SPRINGS, Colo. — A United jetliner with 25 people on board crashed in flames as it approached the Colorado Springs airport Sunday morning. There were apparently no survivors, authorities said.

United Flight 585 en route from Denver crashed at 9:55 a.m. four to five miles south of the airport, the Federal Aviation Administration in Washington said. There were 20 passengers on board and a crew of five. The FAA and the airline both said all aboard apparently were killed. The plane narrowly missed houses and apartment buildings; at least one person on the ground was injured.

There does not appear to be any survivors, said Dick Meyer, of the FAA's public information office in Seattle.

Chicago-based United said in a statement that at this time there are no reports of survivors aboard the Boeing 737-200.

"All obviously are presumed dead," said Sgt. Dean Kelsey, of the El Paso County Sheriff's office. However, he said he would not confirm that until search efforts had been exhausted.

Meyer said there was no communication from the pilot to the airport control tower indicating any problem before the crash.

A witness, Army Command Sgt. Maj. Leo Martinez, said the plane banked sharply, veered and then crashed virtually nose first.

"I watched, and it went vertically into the ground," he said. "There was a huge fireball, black smoke and orange flame."

He said there was nothing except debris, and he could see tires burning.

"I don't think there's a part larger than a suitcase. You can't see any wings... or anything," Martinez said.

Sheriff's Lt. Bill Mistretta said the plane crashed in an unincorporated residential area called Widefield. The plane crashed in a park surrounded by houses and apartment buildings.

"It's a long and narrow park," Martinez said. "If he (the pilot) did this on purpose, no one in Iraq and Saudi Arabia could have done a better job of flying. It is the only place he could have taken it in."

Another witness, Bill Ferguson, likened the plane's descent to a dive-bombing mission.

Ed Arangio, administrator at Memorial Hospital, said a 12-year-old girl who was in the doorway of her house suffered a head injury when she was blown backward by the force of the crash. She was in good condition, he said.

The weather was clear but there were high, gusty winds in the area at the time of the crash, Mistretta said. The National Weather Service said winds were from the northwest at 23 mph gusting to 32 mph.

Brent Bahler of the National Transportation Safety Board in Washington said a team of investigators were preparing to leave for Colorado.

Authorities at Stapleton International Airport in Denver, the plane's last stop before the crash, set up a lounge where relatives of passengers could go for information and comfort, said airport official Richard Boulware.

It was the third major accident involving U.S. airlines in four months. On Dec. 3, two Northwest Airlines jets collided on the ground at the Detroit airport, killing eight people. On Feb. 1, a USAir jet landing at the Los Angeles airport struck a commuter plane on the runway, killing 34 people.

A 737-200, an advanced version of a 737, can hold up to 120 passengers. The twin-engine plane was first flown in 1967, a few months after the original 737. In all, Boeing has produced five models of 737; the largest holds up to 159.

Proposals include chops in education

CHRISSE VENDEL

Last week was not a good week in Topeka.

This was the consensus from area legislators during an Eggs and Issues breakfast Saturday morning sponsored by the Manhattan Chamber of Commerce.

Progress this legislative session is going slowly, as five weeks have passed and only one-third of the total bills introduced have been heard.

The House Appropriations Committee recommended Tuesday to cut $30 million from the Department of Transportation budget and $40 million from the Kansas Board of Regents budget.

If the regents budget is not adjusted, several educational goals affecting K-State would be killed, including the Margin of Excellence, an enrollment adjustment and GTA fee waivers.

There was also concern the transportation cut would affect the expansion of K-177 to four lanes between Manhattan to I-70.

Rep. Sheila Hochhauser, D-Manhattan, said although adjustments may be made while the budgets are discussed on the floor of the House, she is not optimistic.

"It depends on if a consensus develops to raise revenue," she said.

Hochhauser is a member of the Appropriations Committee, dubbed the "cuts committee" during Saturday's breakfast, and said her committee has worked hard to prioritize and save vital programs within various budgets.

She referred to the Taxation Committee as the "raise committee" and advised them to do just that — raise revenue so her committee wouldn't have to cut as much.

Rep. Kent Glasscock, R-Manhattan, said cuts need to be made, but they need to be made selectively, as opposed to a 3 per-

More than 130 killed in boat accident

NAIROBI, Kenya (AP) — A boat carrying hundreds of Somali refugees struck a reef off Kenya and sank, killing more than 130 people, newspapers reported.

The accident of a vessel ferrying about 600 people occurred Friday near Malindi, a tourist resort about 400 miles southeast of Nairobi.

First accounts of the accident were Sunday in Kenyan newspapers. Two English-language dailies said the accident occurred one mile off shore, but a third said it was six miles away.

Police, navy divers, tourists and local residents had recovered about 130 bodies by Saturday afternoon, but 50 victims were believed still trapped in the sunken vessel, according to the newspapers.

CBS crew reported in good condition

LONDON (AP) — Four members of a CBS television crew were reported in good condition at a hospital here Sunday, a day after being released from custody in Iraq.

Reporter Bob Simon, CBS London bureau chief Peter Bluff, free-lance cameraman Roberto Alvarez and free-lance sound man Juan Caldera were captured by Iraqi forces near the Kuwait-Saudi border on Jan. 21.

The four have lost weight because of malnutrition, not because of disease, said Dr. Stuart Sanders, who examined the crew at Humana Hospital Wellington.

The crew was released in Baghdad on Saturday morning. President Mikhail S. Gorbachev was among world leaders and organizations who interceded with Iraqi President Saddam Hussein on the journalists' behalf.

Goodman said the four are undergoing a full battery of medical tests, and are expected to be released this week.

Croatian special police seal off town

PAKRAC, Yugoslavia (AP) — Croatian special police Sunday sealed off a second ethnically mixed town, hoping to prevent pro-Serbian supporters from staging rallies in troubled Croatia.

The special Croatian forces, however, began to withdraw from another city, Pakrac, before a midnight deadline set by the federal government for all external forces to leave Pakrac, the state news agency Tanjug said.

Croats and Serbs, Yugoslavia's two largest ethnic groups, are rivals to shape this country of 25 million's future. Their dispute threatens to plunge the federation of six republics and two provinces into civil war.

Desert march commemorates POWs

LAS CRUCES, N.M. (AP) — As Americans celebrated the end of one war, military teams trekked 20 miles across the New Mexico desert in an annual race to commemorate a grim episode of World War II, the Bataan Death March.

Only 550 contestants showed up for the fourth annual Memorial Bataan Death March Competition, down from 750 last year. Many who would have come were keeping vigil in the Persian Gulf, where U.S.-led allied commanders were seeking the return of POWs after forcing Iraq out of Kuwait in a six-week war.

For those who made it, Saturday's memorial to an estimated 30,000 allied POWs who died in a forced 90-mile march to a Japanese prison camp in the Philippines in April 1942 seemed particularly apt.

The New Mexico Army Reserve Officer Training Corps at New Mexico State University invites military units from around the country to compete.

"I thought they wouldn't have this this year and I'm glad they did," said Don Harris, a Bataan survivor. "I think it's pretty important, more than any other time. I think about the POWs over there and what I went through and I certainly wouldn't want them to do anything like I had to do for 3 1/2 years."

Hartford students riot at party

HARTFORD, Conn. (AP) — About 1,000 students at the University of Hartford rioted early Sunday when police tried to break up an unauthorized keg party, authorities said.

Students pelted police with rocks and beer bottles after spilling out of an on-campus apartment to a nearby common.

Seven police officers and nine students suffered cuts and bruises. Twelve students were arrested on charges of first-degree riot, which is a felony, breach of peace and interfering with police.

Witnesses said officers clubbed bystanders who posed no threat.

"They were met by a very large, angry crowd out there," said Hartford police Sgt. Cary Gilbert. "It was definitely a riot."

At its height, about 100 officers from four cities and the campus safety force were called to the melee, which began when campus officers arrived about 1:30 a.m. to confiscate a beer keg, said school spokesman Ed Matesky. The students had not received permission for a keg party.

Legislature could confront Finney

TOPEKA (AP) — A confrontation between Gov. Joan Finney and the Legislature appears likely over her public initiative proposals.

Finney has vowed to veto all budget bills until the Legislature puts initiative proposals on the ballot. Many lawmakers are skeptical of the idea, and adoption of resolutions required to put them on the ballot will be difficult.

Many legislators wonder whether Finney will stand by her promise, and some do not think she has gained any leverage with her attempt at intimidation.

Finney toured the state Friday trying to build support for her proposals to allow Kansans to put proposed laws and constitutional amendments on the ballot without the involvement of the Legislature. She contends the idea is popular and will make government more accessible.

BABY TALK

Fair educates parents about newborns

BETSY HIDALGO
Collegian Reporter

A baby fair this weekend acquainted some of Manhattan's young adults with the services available for young parents.

The fair, from 10 a.m.-3:30 p.m. Saturday, was at Houston Street Ballroom. Memorial Hospital and KQLA worked cooperatively on the fair with the help of 17 other sponsors.

From booths, sponsoring businesses offered brochures of services and a variety of prizes. The sponsors ranged from Earthcare Laundry and Diaper Services to International Tours.

Because the average age of a person in Manhattan is in the 20s, the fair is a good way to reach people and tell them about the services available to them, said Julie Davenport, director of public relations and marketing at Memorial Hospital.

"The fair is fun and educational," she said. "The number of people that attend tells us (that)."

Speakers on childbirth, anesthesia and pediatrics addressed about 700 people who attended the event.

A fashion show, which featured people of various ages — from children to grandparents, was presented by Sears.

Memorial Hospital is interested in educating people about their maternal services. The hospital has a level-two neo-natal care program, Davenport said. This means Memorial has the means to care for premature babies or babies with special medical complications, making it the only hospital in a 50-mile radius that can do so.

"The baby fair appeals to anyone who is interested in children," she said. "You don't have to be a parent, or in a parent role, to get something out of it."

KQLA went to the public relations department of Memorial Hospital with the baby fair idea, said Ed Klimek, general manager of KQLA.

"Our audience ranges basically from 18 to 34 year olds," he said. "So a baby fair is a natural transition for us, because this is the age that

Focus of 78th Cattlemen's Day on future

Outside elements challenge industry

JODELL LAMER
Collegian Reporter

"I'm very bullish on the cattle industry in the state of Kansas over the coming years," said Don Smith, a featured speaker at the 78th Annual Cattlemen's Day Friday at Brandeberry Indoor Complex.

Smith, president of the National Cattlemen's Association, talked about opportunities and challenges facing the Kansas cattle industry.

Smith said there are many outside challenges affecting the cattle industry, such as environmental concerns, food safety, animal welfare and health.

He said environmental concerns would force producers to adjust their operations as new legislation is passed.

He cited the Clean Water Act to be under consideration in Washington this spring as an example of environmental regulation with potential effects on producers.

"We can have a major problem if we're over-regulated or heavily regulated coming out of that act," he said.

In regard to animal welfare, Smith said most consumers think the cattle industry and the livestock industry in general are good caretakers of their livestock.

"However, most of them would support additional regulation against our industry, as long as it didn't raise the cost of food," he said. "But once they realize there is an additional cost involved, they back off."

Smith also talked about changes in Remedying limiting factors crucial to ranchers' success

SHANNAN SEELY
Agriculture Reporter

The general manager of the nation's largest beef cattle operation spoke to about 500 cattlemen and women Friday in the Brandeberry Indoor Complex.

Paul Genho talked about analyzing profit limiting factors at the 78th Annual Cattlemen's Day at K-State.

Genho manages 30,000 head of cattle, forestry, citrus and wildlife operations at Deseret Ranches of Florida.

He was hired in 1981 as a cattle manager and worked to make the operation more profitable.

"It's the same sermon I've been giving the last couple of years," Genho said. "I probably won't tell you anything that you can put in your operation today, like what to plant, how to feed or what bulls to use."

To increase profitability, farm personnel need to sit down, identify and correct the limiting factors.

"Imagine a wooden barrel with the staves and metal hoops in it. It's just a 55 gallon wooden barrel," he said. "If one of the staves is shorter than the others, then you can't fill it. Even if the other staves are raised, it doesn't make a big difference in what the barrel can hold until that stave is corrected."

Genho used an experience encountered about seven years ago as an example.

A Texas rancher, who was also a veterinarian, was losing money in his beef operation. He had the most elaborate vaccination program and protein supplementation, but he couldn't understand why the calf crop was unprofitable, he said.

"The cattle had an exotic disease called 'Hollywood disease.' They were really thin because of a lack of energy in their diet," he said.

The limiting factors are different for each rancher.

"There's not very many lazy ranchers anymore," Genho said. "It's not that we lack the desire to work. Yet, what we tend to do is when things aren't going right, our solution is to work harder or spend more, usually borrowing more dollars."

Sometimes, ranchers think if they invest more or work harder, they can solve more problems, but those steps don't work.

"I'm not telling you to work harder, but try to work smarter and spend wisely," he said.

A rancher must be analyzing, planning, looking at the returns and setting goals regularly.

He said one of the first questions ranchers should ask is, "Should we really be in cattle (business)?"

He said the question at Deseret, and although they knew they would stay in the cattle business, they learned to approach management decisions as land managers.

"We are near the city of Orlando," Genho said. "We hired a biologist, and now we have two, and our wildlife is now 16 percent of our profits."

He said citrus and forestry is also important to the Ranches.

Sometimes, the operator needs to quit the cattle business. The next question is when he should quit.

"In a year is still a good time," he said.

EDITORIAL

Preference, degree dictate all decisions

What is K-State, aside from an invisible administration, a third-rate football team and a bad library?

By this, I don't mean to scare you. This column will not try to convince you to leave or for anyone to change, but wherever you are, look around and think about why the place you are at is different from anyplace else.

It's simple. If you're in a bathroom stall, the features of your surroundings are easily defined. You probably notice close metallic-blue walls, a little poetry etched in for you to read and a familiar odor from which you would not mind escaping. This is a different kind of place than, say, President Wefald's waiting room, where you would find big swirly oil paintings, important certificates to impress you and the pleasant, inviting smell of fresh carpet, or the secretary's perfume—a considerable improvement from your previous surroundings, right?

True, Wefald's waiting room's walls are prettier, the writing is more profound and the atmosphere is more comforting to your nose, but the difference between it and the stall is only a matter of degree. The communist may prefer a stall. The politician may prefer the office. Preference and degree. Remember these words. They are important in this column.

Back to why K-State is not someplace else.

There is a geographical reason, a nomenclatural reason and there are other reasons, but what kind of reason makes alumni return? The answer to this question is also the answer to these questions: Why did you choose to attend K-State? Why are you still here?

Keep looking around. Why are you sitting where you are sitting (or leaning against whatever you are leaning against)? Why are you reading this? Why didn't you skip directly to Sports or why didn't you just skip over to the last paragraph? The last word? It's an awful lot of questions, I know, but I'm getting to the point.

Remember preference and degree. Important words. Preference is your desire for one quality over another. You got a diamond ring for Christmas, but would have preferred a diamond bracelet. You attend K-State, but would prefer the University of Kansas. Or you attend K-State and prefer K-State. But why?

I was at KU this weekend. It's all right. My friends there tell me they like it very much, that they prefer the more open atmosphere and the larger number of long-haired, Volkswagen bug-driving freaks. I tell them I prefer K-State's more paranoid atmosphere and the larger number of acid-washed-denim, fluorescent-hat-wearing Camaro-driving freaks. And we're all happy. We prefer different degrees.

And so do you. You are at K-State because

Ed Skoog

Collegian Columnist

you prefer some degree, which is probably unfathomable to me, such as the alluring Manhattan skyline or that damned fork in front of H.H. (B.B.) King Hall.

Degrees. Eskimos prefer lower ones, while Tahitians and Cubans prefer higher degrees. I'm pursuing a bachelor's. What I'm saying is that not only do people prefer different degrees, they also prefer different degrees of different things. So my friends in Lawrence prefer different degrees of people, as do I, which is probably why we are friends.

I also know people who prefer the same kind of people, but prefer to make their decision on different kinds of preferences. But this is getting too confusing for the points I want you to understand. And one of these points is that this is all very confusing. So ...

Let's compare places, preferences and degrees. Through this maybe we'll understand what K-State is. Who knows?

K-State is not KU (brilliant discovery, Skoog). People at KU prefer different, stranger, more deviant degrees of people, politics, drug use and study (there seem to be a bunch of Painting and Womens' Studies majors up there). I mean all this in a good way. We at K-State prefer a more calm, rational degree of people, landscape, distance and study (notice the size of the engineering and architecture colleges).

This is what K-State is. Sensible. Practical. A little lazy, perhaps. But not so much lazy as just slow. Retarded, in the musical sense. This is why K-State is K-State and not KU, or Tanzania.

We prefer different things here. Camaros and very bright hats are only part of it. We prefer sleep to most things, and we get to sleep earlier than KU people. We prefer sunrise to sunset. We sympathize with the sunrise—we know it's harder to get up than to fall down. KU folk like sunset and twilight because at twilight the blue spectrum is more visible, and in Lawrence they like to think they're depressed. They wear a lot of black clothing over there. We wear brighter colors, such as those hats I like so much.

K-State people aren't ashamed to wear boots. We say "Hey, dude," much more than we say, "Hey, man," while the latter is preferred at KU. We walk to class; they climb. Poison and Dokken play here, while TAD and GWAR play Lawrence. There is no place like Aggieville in Lawrence. They get drunk at home, while we go someplace else to become idiots. And I'm told that crack is on the rise at KU, while Manhattan is content with garden-variety intoxicants. Gen. Colin Powell, chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, gives a speech at K-State. Timothy Leary, the marijuana advocate, lets off steam at KU. We all serve the same impulses, just in different ways. Remember those important words. Preference. Degree.

I'm going to retract a promise now. I said I wasn't going to try to change anybody's mind, but if you look around you and don't like what you see, what you hear, or what you smell, think about why you're here. I almost left K-State right after I got here a couple years ago. I was riding my one-handlebarred bike on the little sidewalk between Eisenhower and Denison when I passed an official-looking woman who addressed me sternly as I went by, saying, "You shouldn't be here."

She must have meant that I shouldn't have been riding my bike on the sidewalk, but I believe a little of the I Ching, that all things are connected. I think she said that to scare me away, deep down inside, but I didn't take the advice to heart. I preferred her degree of warning me not to be around to the probable KU response, which would have been just to kick me right off the bike and onto the sidewalk. I prefer the K-State degree of handling things. If you don't, maybe ... Feh! what do I know?

Soldiers deserve thanks

It's over. It is difficult to believe, but the war is already, and finally, over.

It seems like it was too easy. It's as if we got all tense and worried for nothing.

Now comes the time to shout, "We're No. 1." Now is the time to celebrate as if the home team defeated the arch rivals in the homecoming game, 32-2.

Or is it?

Should we treat the victory in such an All-American, apple pie and "I love my mom" sort of way?

Maybe not.

Perhaps we should just be thankful it is over.

Then we can see, without all the hoopla, it was America's soldiers, members of our families, who were being shot at and bombed. They weren't a bunch of football players running the winning touchdown for the home team.

Instead of treating them like football heroes, we should welcome them home with open hearts and open minds. We can thank them for fighting for truth, justice and the American way. We can thank them for winning.

And, we can give them all the appreciation for ending it quickly, so we could have them back in our homes to fill the roles of brothers, fathers, sons, sisters, mothers and daughters they left behind when they went to the gulf.

It is with a warm welcome home that we extend thanks to the men and women who put their lives on the line to liberate Kuwait and protect the gulf from Saddam Hussein.

And, it is with sad hearts we remember those men and women who gave their lives for the war.

We should have no regrets.

We should just be thankful the soldiers who have completed a job well done are on their way home.

Two wrongs?

Editor,

I would like to respond to remarks made by Brad Stutz, which were quoted in a Collegian article. Stutz's casual comments about how he and his friends were gay bashing is sickening.

Can you imagine someone casually remarking about how often they go out and lynch or beat up blacks? Such statements should be taken down and used as evidence so we can lock these people up. There is no place for this kind of behavior in a civilized society.

Rights supported

Editor,

I supported the war against Iraq. I also support CIA Vershielden's right to oppose the war. Her actions in voicing her opposition reflect great courage, the kind that can only be found in a deep and abiding belief in her values. Her actions are not "un-American," on the contrary, her actions uphold the highest ideals embodied in the United States' Constitution.

War goes deeper

Editor,

When I was young, I used to play "Army" with the other boys and girls in my neighborhood. I suppose we were just acting out what we were being exposed to at the time. The Vietnam War was shown on television each evening. We watched shows like "Combat" and "Twelve O'clock High." Many of our fathers and uncles were veterans of the Korean War or World War II. We wanted to emulate them and be as brave as they were. We revered John Wayne. Luckily, as we matured, we outgrew our fantasies and quit playing war by the time we were ready to attend junior high school.

There are some adults today, however, that have never grown up, and who continue to play war. I am referring to the growing popularity of war games in which contestants shoot and "kill" each other with paint guns.

Are these people to be blamed, or are they just the symptoms of our sick society? A society in which we are fed and addicted to a constant media diet of murder, mayhem and madness. Are they acting out some perverted obsession with death? Or have they simply seen too many Stallone and Schwarzenegger movies which feature up to 100 killings per hour? Perhaps they have been watching too much CNN these past few weeks. Perhaps they see too much glory in the faces of the U.S. troops and too little of the despair in the faces of the wounded Iraqi prisoners of war.

These war games are not a healthy form of recreation. They wrongly portray war, firearms and gunshot wounds. I feel stupid for having to write to these people and tell them that war is not a game. If these people are so obsessed with the idea of combat, they should put their willingness to good use and see an Armed Forces recruiter.

I was taught at a very young age not to point a firearm at anything I did not want to shoot or kill. A bullet can never be called back. A game in which the object is to "kill" your opponent with a toy gun does not promote proper firearm safety. Perhaps these people have no idea of the terrible destruction firearms can inflict. I have killed and have seen many large game animals killed with rifles and shotguns. I have also had the misfortune of being witness to human victims. Unless you have seen them with your own eyes, you cannot imagine how terrible gunshot wounds really are.

A question I have for these war gamers is will they treat a firearm with the respect and safety it necessitates? Or will we have to listen to the tragic sobs of "I didn't really mean to shoot him" excuses? My advice to the war gamers, for their benefit and the benefit of our society, is to grow up and find something better to do with your time and money.

Credit due

Editor,

After reading Brad Seabourn's column, I felt compelled to write. As a "youthful, ripe-for-the-pickin'", supporter of the gulf war," I had to speak my piece. I have always believed everyone has the right to his/her own opinion, and along with it, the right to express their views. I have read some of Seabourn's previous columns, and I have listened to him speak in one of my classes. But until now, I have never so strongly disagreed with him.

To think that because the losses sustained in the gulf were minimal could possibly mean the United States will be jumping into any available conflict is, to me, ridiculous. Had there been numerous fatalities, Seabourn probably would have chalked the Persian Gulf War up as another one of his statistics against the atrocities of war.

When this war began, President Bush said he would not allow it to become another Vietnam War, and it did not. Casualties are inevitable in war, and unfortunately, war at times is also inevitable.

I feel, in Seabourn's eyes, the U.S. military and our nation's leaders were damned, regardless of how this conflict was resolved. In response, all I have to say is, give credit where credit is due.

Ballot issue

Editor,

Gov. Joan Finney has proposed initiative and referendum—a process whereby the citizens of Kansas can bring to the ballot issues of importance to our state. The people of this state are capable of making decisions for the future of all Kansans.

In order to strengthen citizen participation in state government, every state west of the Mississippi River except five, have initiative and referendum.

As a life-long citizen of Kansas and a former member of the Kansas Legislature, I know Kansans are capable, intelligent and caring individuals. Working together we can make a difference in state government. I am asking for your help and support for the passage of initiative and referendum.

It will take a 3/4 vote in the Senate and the House to pass initiative and referendum. Now is the time to be heard. I urge you to write or call your legislators today. The toll-free legislative hotline is 1-800-432-3924.

With this ring we do thee refuse to hire

CHRISSE VENDEL
Collegian Reporter

When preparing for a job interview, taking off a wedding ring probably isn't a top priority, but it might be something to consider.

"It depends on the job," said Jodi Thierer, instructor of marketing. "A company trying to fill a position requiring a lot of overnight travel may be concerned that hiring a married person would cause marital problems — as opposed to a single person who has no ties."

According to guidelines for pre-employment inquiries, any inquiry indicating whether an applicant is married, single, divorced or engaged is illegal and must be avoided.

Wearing a wedding ring may inadvertently answer this illegal inquiry for an interviewer.

Thierer used to recruit for a retail company and said marital status was never used as an employment criteria.

"One of the job requirements was job relocation, and although we never knew the person's marital status, they knew if they couldn't move it would be the end of their career," Thierer said.

When students ask Thierer's advice on the subject, she said she generally advises to take wedding rings off.

"I tell them it probably won't help you; it could only potentially hurt you," she said.

"You should be cautious with the information you present because it could be used to evaluate your credentials," said Tracey Fraser, assistant director at the K-State Career Planning and Placement Center.

"You should assess your own individual strengths and the employer's and decide whether to even apply based on that," she said. "Would you want to work for a company if that is what they're using as hiring criteria?"

Telling potential employers your marital status is something they may not need to know, said Mike Ahern, instructor of marketing.

"They are concerned because they don't want to hire someone and invest $100,000 in training this person only to have them quit because their spouse had to relocate," Ahern said.

Ahern said that every recruiter is different but in some instances being married could actually help.

"It could work for you because they could think of you as more stable, mature and responsible," Ahern said.

Ahern also said many companies are including child care and other options to assist married employees.

Stamina needed for 'Goat'

Jesus Lizard uses gurgles, grunts to create unique sound

ERIC MELIN
Collegian Reviewer

David Yow was out driving his truck one day a couple years ago and was stopped by a policeman who examined the vehicle to find a full skeleton and other assorted human bones. Yow was then put in an insane asylum, causing the breakup of his band, Scratch Acid. Now he sings for the Jesus Lizard.

Released just last week, "Goat" is the latest and most crazed album by the Jesus Lizard. Formed by Yow and fellow ex-Scratch Acid member David Simms, the Jesus Lizard has produced one album a year. "Pure," from 1989, featured a drum machine, but was replaced with the current drummer, Mac MacNeily on 1990's "Head." "Goat," like its predecessors, was released on Touch 'n Go records.

Like their labelmates the Butthole Surfers, the Jesus Lizard specializes in the weird. Yow doesn't really sing at all. Instead, he talks, gurgles, grunts, spits, screams and mumbles his way through all of "Goat's" nine tracks. None of the lyrics rhyme, but most of them are indecipherable anyway. The structure of the songs differs so greatly that it becomes impossible to predict where they will go next.

Reviewer says ...

"Sheer, gut-wrenching pleasure"

The album opens with a slow groove on "Then Comes Dudley." Duane Denison's high-pitched clean-sounding guitar starts off constant, then suddenly stops. The lyrics are sparse, and the guitar is held to quick, jarring outbursts. Like every Jesus Lizard song, Simm's bass and Denison's guitar never play the same thing. They always compliment, never copy, each other.

"Mouthbreather," the best cut, showcases the incredible musicianship of the members. But great musicians do not a great band make. It takes songwriting skills, and the Jesus Lizard definitely has a penchant for oddity. MacNeily's fast off-time drum beat creates a gap that, when filled by the sparse guitar licks, makes your body convulse in all sorts of directions. Everything but the drums drops out for the chorus as Yow sputters, "Don't get me wrong, he's a nice guy, I like him just fine ... but he's a mouthbreather."

On "Seasick," Yow's psychotic ramblings can be understood just long enough to hear the argument raging in his brain.

"I can't swim!" he screams.

Trying to convince himself otherwise, he screams, "I can swim!" directly afterward.

This goes on for a while over the pounding drum beat, and he finally mutters, "Maybe I'll take a dip."

"Southmouth" finds Yow careening closely toward rap, and the only intelligible lyrics he has to offer are: "Hate sometimes like a cannibal/React sometimes like a little girl."

It should be noted that even when Yow is talking, his voice is still distorted through the mixing board. Every song has the same vocal effect, making Yow sound as though he was singing through a walkie-talkie.

The Jesus Lizard has its own unique sound. The songs seem to be totally devoid of structure, there are no vocal melodies at all (unless you count the yodeling Yow does on one track), and the muddy vocals provide a sharp contrast to the clean sound of the guitars. Even the cover, featuring a photo of hundreds of nails superimposed on the chest of a nude woman, defies formula. If you've got the guts and the stamina, "Goat" is the album for you.

Bull sale helps students learn merchandising of seed stock

MELISSA SMITH
Collegian Reporter

Since 1977, students enrolled in the Livestock Sales Management class have helped put together the Special "K" Bull Sale.

Miles McKee, professor of animal sciences and industry, said the class was designed to provide students with hands-on experience in the merchandising of seed stock.

Seed stock, he said, are cattle registered according to their family backgrounds. They are used as a foundation to genetically improve livestock bloodlines.

The class began this semester to prepare for the sale, which will be April 6 at Weber Arena.

About 60 students, primarily agriculture and animal science majors, are enrolled in the class this semester, McKee said.

He said some of the preliminary work for the sale had to be done before the class started, but the students are involved in every operation of the auction sale.

Students design and develop advertisements. They also contact magazines and newspapers to find out how much they charge for ads and how many people read the publication in order to determine where to advertise the sale.

In addition, they are also responsible for the catalog used at the sale, he said. Students take photographs of the animals that will be used to encourage potential buyers, and they design the catalog on a desktop computer.

The day of the sale, the students set up the sale ring and the bleachers, as well as decorate the arena.

During the sale, they register people, take bids on the cattle, wash the cattle for the sale, record who buys what and at what price and collect the money.

Martin Albright, senior in agricultural economics, said he is on the registration committee and takes the name and address of buyers and gives out buyer numbers.

He said the class provides students with hands-on experience in budgeting and the operation of the sale since they are in charge of the whole thing.

The class allows students to work on a livestock sale from start to finish, said Jane Beaty, senior in animal sciences and industry.

Beaty is co-chairwoman of the catalog committee and chairwoman of the photograph committee.

She has taken pictures of the bulls for the catalog and provided information for prospective buyers about the expected improvement in offspring from registration headquarters.

Although the class is divided into committees, everyone learns about each step in the process, she said.

McKee said the only thing students don't do is serve as the auctioneer — a professional is hired.

At the first sale in 1977, buyers came from 10 different states and Canada, he said.

Last year, buyers came primarily from Kansas, Missouri and Nebraska, he said, and about 60 bulls were sold.

The average price for each lot was $1,900, and the total from the sale was $106,975.

Income from the sale goes back into the department and is used for the cost of feed, and teaching and researching expenses.

Sudafed capsules recalled by maker

By the Associated Press

SEATTLE — Officials say two deaths and an illness may be linked to cyanide-laden Sudafed decongestant capsules, leading the maker of the product to issue a nationwide recall Sunday.

"Consumers should avoid taking Sudafed 12-Hour Capsules, and return all Sudafed 12-Hour Capsules to the store from which they purchased the product," said manufacturer Burroughs Wellcome Co. of Research Triangle Park, N.C.

Washington state and federal officials ordered a recall of the capsules from two counties in western Washington late Saturday night. They also urged store owners and consumers throughout the state to check Sudafed boxes and foil packs that contain the pills for specific code numbers.

No deaths or illness related to Sudafed have been reported in other parts of the country. No arrests have been made.

Cowgirls roar past Lady Cats, 87-70

BILL LANG
Sports Reporter

SALINA — The letter "D" in basketball can stand for desire, determination and defense.

The Oklahoma State Cowgirls displayed all three as they roared past the K-State Lady Cats, 87-71, Sunday afternoon in the semifinals of the Big Eight Conference Women's Basketball Tournament.

The defense of the Cowgirls held Nadira Hazim and Diana Miller to a combined total of nine points in the first half. The K-State duo was held to 28 for the game on 10-of-30 shooting.

"I don't know what to say. Oklahoma State played an excellent game," K-State coach Susan Yow said. "We just couldn't get anything going offensively. We tried to maintain our defense. The more things got difficult on our offense, the more we started to let down on our whole game."

Yow said the seniors did not want to go out this way, but maybe the let-down was from wanting a game too much.

"In theory, I feel that they were very high emotionally and that it took away from their performance in the game," she said. "They were really keyed up for the game. When you are at that level of emotion, you usually bottom out on performance."

OSU 87, K-State 70

O-State's desire to win showed as it started to drive early and often, as the players were continually able to get the ball to All-Big Eight center Lisa McGill.

In the first half, McGill collected 10 points and eight rebounds. The Cowgirls as a team collected 22 rebounds to K-State's 11 in the opening stanza.

"(Lisa McGill) is a very good player and presents a lot of problems, and we just couldn't handle her," Yow said. "She's got a good shot, and she was on tonight."

The rest of McGill's team was on, as it shot 50 percent from the field in the first half to the Lady Cats' 36 percent.

O-State also displayed a little "O," as they had 10 of 11 players score.

But it was the play of Althea Cox and All-Big Eight player Liz Brown as they shadowed Hazim everywhere she went on the court that may have been a bigger key. Hazim scored her first bucket at the 5:05 mark in the first half.

Hazim was able to collect one jumper in the second half at the 16:27 mark and didn't score again until she hit a three-pointer with 3:53 left in regulation.

O-State coach Dick Halterman was quick to point out it was his team's defense — the Cowgirls collected 28 defensive caroms, eight steals and caused 19 turnovers — which led them to the title game against Kansas.

"I thought that we played well, especially early in the game," Halterman said. "We knew that coming into the game we had to slow down Diana Miller and Nadira. I thought the kids that we had on them did just a superb job on them. They got some points early, then we shut them down and they didn't score until late in the second half."

K-State 77, Iowa State 65

In K-State's first round contest against Iowa State, Hazim scored 25 and Miller threw in another 22 points as the Lady Cats struggled to get past the Cyclones.

K-State played the two games in the tournament without the services of Sheila Cherry. Conflicting reports had her either quitting the team or being asked to leave.

The Lady Cats finished the season at 16-11.

Lady Cat guard Nadira Hazim fights for a loose ball with Iowa State guard Leslie Maple and guard Tynetta Rasheed during K-State's first-round 77-65 win in the Big Eight Women's Tournament at the Bicentennial Center in Salina. Hazim led all scorers in the game with 25 points.

Semifinal loss brings end of senior careers

DAN WICKER
Sports Reporter

SALINA — K-State wound down a season filled with highs and lows with an impressive 77-65 first-round victory over Iowa State and a disappointing 87-70 loss to Oklahoma State in semifinal action in the Big Eight Women's Basketball Tournament.

But the end of the season also brought the end of careers for three players, who each logged impressive four-year stints at K-State. Diana Miller, Kristie Bahner and Nadira Hazim have all finished their eligibility on the hardwood.

"It seems like I have been hearing those names and facing those faces for so many years," Iowa State coach Pam Wettig said following her team's loss to K-State Saturday. "Their eligibility has to be about up."

Well, Wettig is probably not alone in suffering from frustration about the senior trio. The Big Eight tourney allowed all three to reach accomplishments that not many players reach in their careers.

Miller became the all-time leading scorer in K-State history when she nailed a turnaround jumper 3:13 into the contest with Iowa State. Miller ended her career with 1,705 points.

"I am pleased with how I played the four years. It hasn't hit me yet, that I have become the all-time leading scorer," Miller said. "My goal was to average 20 points or more on the season. Overall I am pleased, and I am going to miss it."

At the 18:30 mark in the second half of the Iowa State victory, Bahner dropped in an easy bank shot to give her 11 points in the game and 1,001 points on her career. She joined her teammates Miller and Hazim in the 1,000-point category, and K-State joined only three other schools — Virginia, Holy Cross and Stanford — to have three active 1,000-point scorers.

"It feels really good. The way the season was going, I wasn't sure I was going to get it," Bahner said. "I had no idea which shot it was, but it was my goal and I was trying for it."

And to round out the milestone marks, there was Hazim. She canned her final points of the tournament with 2:51 left in the loss to Oklahoma State on a three-pointer that gave her 1,670 points in her career. That mark places Hazim in a tie with Eileen Feeney as the second all-time leading scorer in K-State history.

Forward Diana Miller shoots over Oklahoma State forwards Lisa McGill and Shea Jackson during Sunday's loss. Miller became K-State's all-time leading women's scorer during the Lady Cat win over Iowa State on Saturday. Miller ended her collegiate career with 1,705 points.

Strong defense gives K-State 1st-round win

DAN WICKER
Sports Reporter

SALINA — There first was a game that made K-State look like the team that produced an overtime victory against Oklahoma State, and then there was the reality of a semifinal game against Oklahoma State.

If you were one of the fans that made the trip down I-70 to the Bicentennial Center in Salina, then you already know the night and day comparison between K-State's win over Iowa State and Oklahoma State's blowout of K-State.

In Saturday's game against Iowa State, K-State's trio of seniors combined for 61 of the team's 77 points. Nadira Hazim had 25, Diana Miller netted 22 and Kristie Bahner had 14.

K-State knew exactly what it had to do, and came out with a strong defense that held Iowa State's leading scorer, Lynne Lorenzen, to only nine points. The defense also allowed the Cyclones to convert on 39 percent of their field goals, and forced 30 Iowa State turnovers.

All this happened while on the opposite side of the court, the Lady Cats were connecting for almost 50 percent.

"I am pleased for the seniors at K-State, and pleased they made it to the semifinal game," K-State coach Susan Yow said following the Iowa State victory. "I thought we played very hard today, and I thought our defense was very tenacious in the first half and forced a lot of turnovers for us."

Following the win over Iowa State, the emotion grew as K-State had a chance to avenge a 79-61 drubbing from Oklahoma State Feb. 20 in Stillwater. But the Cowgirls had other things in their minds, and watched as K-State turned into a different team in the contest.

Yow said she believed the team's emotion grew to a level that was too high, and in turn it affected their play.

"I think they were really keyed up for the game, and sometimes when you are at that level emotionally, you kind of bomb out in your performance," Yow said.

Yow's theory was tested and approved by the Cowgirls.

K-State's leading scorers were stopped in their tracks from Oklahoma State's defense. Miller and Bahner both had seven at the half and Hazim had only one field goal, while the Lady Cats were shooting only 36 percent from the field.

The second half showed no relief in sight for the Lady Cats, as they could manage to connect on only 41

Baseball team splits pair against Colorado State

DAVID SVOBODA

Sunday was a day of extremes for the K-State baseball team.

In the opener of a doubleheader against Colorado State, the Wildcats got strong pitching and earned a victory.

In the nightcap, the brilliance on the hill disappeared, and the team fell to defeat.

That's baseball.

Sophomore hurler Sean Pedersen, 2-1, spun a three-hit masterpiece in the first game, a 7-2 K-State win. Pedersen allowed single tallies in the first and fourth innings on a pair of CSU homers. He struck out six and walked six.

Pedersen got solid offensive support from his battery mate, Jeff Ryan. Ryan went 2-for-3 with a three-run homer and an RBI single. He also stole a base and threw out three CSU would-be base stealers.

Brad Rippelmeyer collected three hits and an RBI, and Brian Culp added two hits for K-State.

In the second game, however, control problems hurt Wildcat starter Chris Hmielewski, 1-1. After his teammates put up five in the first on the strength of a three-run blast by Blair Hanneman, Hmielewski proceeded to give it all right back — and then some.

CSU scored six runs in the bottom of the frame and benefitted from three walks. All three hitters walked came around to score. The home team wasn't done there, adding six more in the second, again benefiting from three free passes.

K-State will meet nationally ranked in-state rival Wichita State Wednesday night at Frank Myers Field, with senior Kent Hipp pitching for the Wildcats.

Women's tennis squad captures 3rd

SCOTT PASKE

A return trip to the Southwest was producing similar results for the K-State women's tennis team.

Then, Furman came along.

The homesick Wildcats took third place at the Coors Light Invitational in Albuquerque, N.M., with a 6-3 dual victory over the Paladins, a 1-7 team, on Sunday.

K-State won four singles matches and two of three in doubles competition against Furman to snap a losing streak of eight duals. The 'Cats, who improved to 2-10, last won Feb. 8 against Purdue. Coach Steve Bie-tau's team lost four duals on a swing through Utah last week.

The losing trend continued in K-State's opening duals on Saturday, as the 'Cats lost to Washington and eventual champion New Mexico.

K-State's match with the Huskies was scheduled for Friday, but rain pushed the dual back to Saturday morning. Washington won five of six singles matches, with K-State's No. 4 player, Theresa Burcham, capturing the only win for the 'Cats. She defeated Michelle Thomas 2-6, 6-3, 7-6 for her first win of the season.

Because Washington had already clinched the dual win, K-State forfeited all three doubles matches.

Later in the day, New Mexico broke away from K-State in the doubles matches to defeat the 'Cats 6-3.

Michele Riniker and Angie Gover won straight-set matches, and Rosemary Hunter fought back against Tonna Rieger after losing the opening set to win at No. 6 singles.

The 'Cats used a trio of three-set wins over Furman to take the lead into doubles play. The No. 1 doubles team of Riniker and Gover defeated Furman's top duo of Erin Powell and Beth Niemyer 6-3, 3-6, 6-3 to clinch the win for the 'Cats.

Miller qualifies for return trip to national meet

JENIFER SCHEIBLER

K-State's All-American shot put performer Angie Miller will be returning to the NCAA Indoor Championships.

Miller's heave of 50-foot-2 at the Frank Potts Invitational in Boulder, Colo., this weekend surpassed the NCAA automatic qualifying standard and will assure her a place in the field at the national meet in Indianapolis, Ind., Friday and Saturday.

Other Wildcat athletes turned in strong performances in the meet.

Sprinter John Dedrick's time of 6.25 in the 55-meters provisionally qualified him for the national meet.

The Wildcat women continued their strong shot put performances when freshman Shanelle Stires' heave of 48-7 placed second behind teammate Miller.

Those competing in the Last Chance Qualifier meet in Ames, Iowa, this past weekend didn't set any automatic qualifying marks for the NCAA indoor, but turned in strong performances.

Three runners brought home victories for the Wildcats.

All-American Clifton Etheridge won the long jump with a leap of 25-4½, David Warders won the 5,000-meters in 14:20.71, and Nikki

Green was victorious in the 400-meters at 54.35, just edging out teammate Debra Malone, who ran a time of 54.44.

Other Wildcats placing in the meet were Tyrone Watkins, third in the 400-meters with a time of 47.35 and Marcus Wright, third in the 800-meters with a time of 1:49.90.

"Most of the athletes competing this weekend did improve," Coach John Capriotti said.

Balanced effort produces upset in finale

Wildcat forward Keith Amerson goes up for two against Sooner forward Kermit Holmes during the first half of the 'Cats' 101-98 overtime victory over Oklahoma Saturday afternoon in Norman, Okla.

Misses at close of regulation fail to dampen Cats' spirit in overtime

TODD FERTIG
Sports Reporter

NORMAN, Okla. — Considering that several last-second finishes had gone the wrong way for the Wildcats this season and that the team had no experience in overtime, K-State's track record appeared to be the biggest obstacle between them and an upset victory over the Oklahoma Sooners on Saturday.

After rebounding from a 10-point deficit in the second half, the 'Cats swapped leads with OU during the final minutes. But after failing to capitalize on several opportunities to win in regulation, another "so close, but yet so far" finish appeared in store.

But instead of being overwhelmed by the pressure, the team pulled together in the extra period. Led by 7-of-10 free throw shooting and the guidance of point guard Jeff Wires in the clutch, the 'Cats pulled ahead and held off a desperate Sooner comeback attempt to win 101-98.

"I think that tells you something about our players," Coach Dana Altman said. "With a 2-11 team, it could have been very easy to quit playing. But our basketball team showed some determination there, and I thought we did a very good job down the stretch."

The win was the first for the K-State men in the Lloyd Noble Center since 1987, and gave the 'Cats their first sweep of the Sooners since 1978.

Wires provided a driving jumper and 3-of-4 free throws to head the overtime scoring effort for K-State, but it was his acting job on defense that secured the win.

Fouled on an inbound play with 32 seconds left, Wires hit one free throw to extend the 'Cats' overtime lead to 96-92. After Terrence Mullins rebounded Wires' second attempt, however, the Sooners looked to slice into the deficit.

'Cats 101, Oklahoma 98

But as the rest of the Wildcats raced back to defend, Wires suddenly turned and intercepted Mullins' outlet at the free throw line. The Wildcat point guard was quickly fouled as he tried to elude the surprised Sooners and nailed two more from the stripe to put the game out of reach.

"I think Mullins got a little relaxed," Wires said. "He saw me backing up and thought I was going to just sprint down court, and he just lobbed it. I just stopped and stepped in."

The steal was the fourth of the game for Wires. Finishing the contest with 64 on the year, Wires eclipsed Steve Henson's season mark of 62.

Wires narrowly missed ending the game five minutes earlier. Taking the ball with 29 seconds left in regulation and the score knotted at 86, the 'Cats worked for a final shot.

Finally, with six ticks showing, Wires split a crease in the OU defense and flashed through the lane for a short jumper. The shot rolled off the front iron, however, and fell into the hands of center Maurice Brittan.

Brittan rose above the crowd of defenders in the lane for a second attempt, but his shot was too hard, kicking to Keith Amerson on the left wing. But in rushing to beat the clock, Amerson misfired too, leaving the Wildcat players staring at the goal in disbelief as the buzzer sounded.

"We got three good shots at it, but our players just couldn't knock it down," Altman said. "I'm proud of this team that it came out in the overtime aggressive and ready to play after that kind of end to regulation."

Sams' scoring spree shocks OU

TODD FERTIG
Sports Reporter

NORMAN, Okla. — Patrick Sams' first score against the Oklahoma Sooners came in typical Patrick Sams fashion.

Hustling from his No. -2 guard spot, Sams sliced through the lane to rebound a miss and lay it in at 11:50 in the first period. The bucket was an important one, pulling the 'Cats to within one, 19-18.

But like Sams himself, the moment came and went without attracting much notice. The brunt of the attention was focused on more noted scoring threats in the Wildcat lineup.

Usually inserted for defensive purposes, Sams had accounted for just 10 points in Big Eight play. The bucket nearly equalled Sams' scoring average of 2.2 points per contest.

The hoop seemed of little significance to most, but Coach Dana Altman seemed to see it as an indication of what Sams was prepared to produce that day.

Generally using him as a defensive stopper, Altman rarely leaves Sams in for more than a few trips up and down the floor. Altman allowed Sams nearly 18 minutes of playing time on Saturday.

"We came in knowing he was going to play more than he had," Altman said. "But he earned even more playing time as the game went on."

Sams himself gained confidence following the basket. Instead of kicking the ball around the perimeter to fellow guards Jeff Wires and Jean Derouillere, Sams suddenly took some of the scoring burden upon himself.

"It helped when I hit that shot to give me some confidence," Sams said. "I've always got confidence in my offense. So I thought it was just a matter of time (before I begin producing more points)."

Less than a minute later, Sams fearlessly drove the lane, drawing a foul in going to the hoop. After Sams hit the first of his two attempts, Keith Amerson pulled down a Sams' miss. Amerson quickly hit Sams as he again drove into the teeth of the OU defense and scored on a goaltend.

The aggressive drives by Sams, though unexpected by Wildcat fans, are not new to the sophomore from Bartow, Fla.

"In high school, I was aggressive offensively, so I guess I sort of expect to be that way still," Sams said. "I take a lot of pride in all aspects of my game. If defense will help the team win, I'll play defense. Today we needed rebounding, and I'd been rebounding well lately, so I got the chance to contribute."

Though Sams may have been in the lineup to concentrate on rebounding and defense, things just kept coming his way at the offensive end. Battling to keep the 'Cats close to the rallying Sooners, Sams took the ball in the lane and maneuvered through traffic to flip in a scoop shot. The bucket cut the Sooners' lead to 30-26 at 8:27 left in the first half. Another score gave him nine points at halftime on 4-of-6 shooting.

Sams returned to slow the offense of the Sooners early in the second period. Trailing 63-57, the 'Cats needed a big play to stay close. Working to free one of the 'Cats for a shot, Sams found himself open on the perimeter.

With the ball in his hands and his confidence up, Sams knocked down just the second three-pointer of his career to cut the lead to three with 14:20 left.

Finishing with 14 points in just 18 minutes of play, Sams provided his

Never-say-die team still battles

David Svoboda
Sports Editor

It would have been easy for Coach Dana Altman and his Wildcat basketball players to have pulled up their tent stakes about three weeks ago.

But if Saturday's win over Oklahoma is any indication, this team plans on braving the conference elements as long as is humanly possible.

And that's saying something.

Though at times the team has obviously lacked a floor leader capable of taking control of a game all by himself, one thing hasn't been lacking this season: guts and determination on the part of each of the men wearing the purple and white.

Saturday's overtime thriller with the Sooners was a capsule look at a season gone bad. Only this time, the script had an ending befitting the actors.

So many times this season have the 'Cats been so close as to taste the sweet nectar of victory, only to have the bitter taste of defeat on their collective palate at game's end.

To put it in sports lingo, they've lost a ton of heartbreakers this year, and it has to be getting hard for the players to take.

I've got to admit, I was one of several naysayers at the beginning of the conference season. After the opening Big Eight loss to Nebraska, I boldly proclaimed this team would be lucky to win four league games. And I was right. The team won but three.

But that's not the point. I truly believed this team might be blown out of several games. And in reality, with the exception of a disappointing home loss to Iowa State, this team wasn't blown out of any game in the conference race.

Character played a big part in that. That's character shown by the coaching staff, the players, the fans — character of the first order.

Altman and his assistants Jim Kerwin and Ken Turner aren't used to losing. Altman didn't lose at Moberly in the juco ranks, and his reign as an assistant here brought back the glory days of K-State hoops.

Kerwin brought a ton of talented players to Norman, and the Sooner teams he assisted on were some of the best in the country year in and year out.

And Turner has been a recruiting and coaching success at every stop on his coaching journey.

But they had to sell the players on the fact that even though they weren't going to win a league title, there was still plenty to play for. It wasn't a very tough sell.

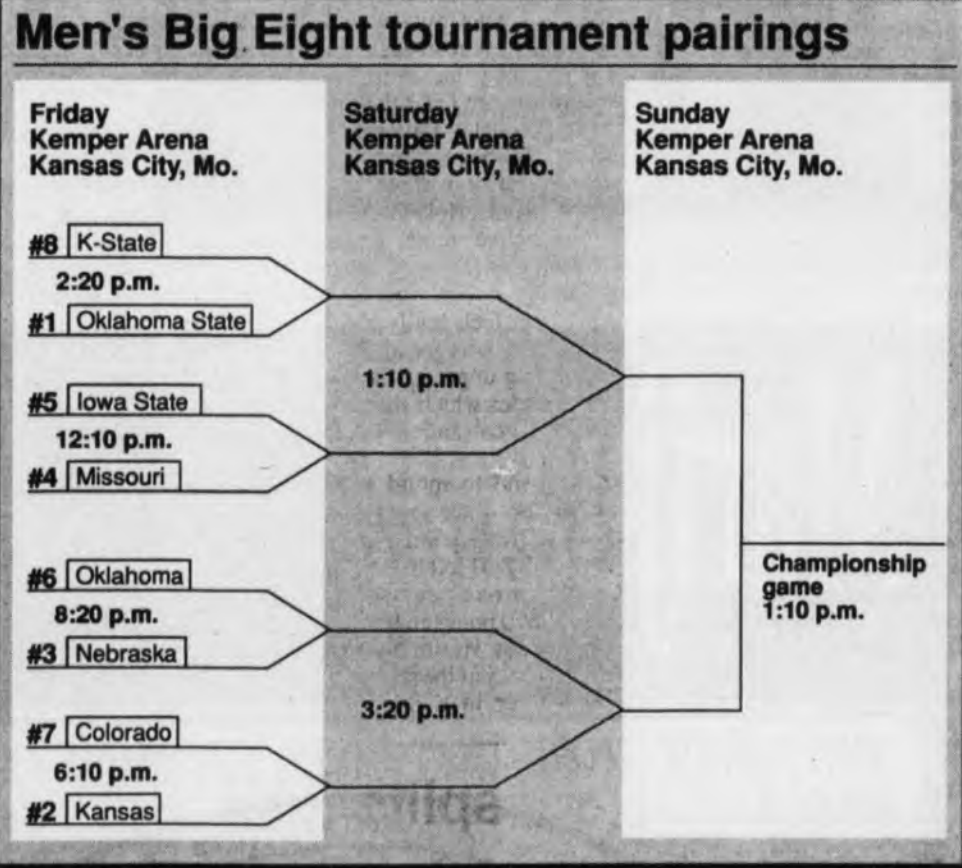

Jeff Wires is determined. Keith Amerson is a battler. Jean Derouillere is silky smooth. Maurice Brittan burns with intensity — ask the Bramlage chair he knocked to the floor during a time-out in the home loss to Missouri. And Steve Fritz has worn his heart on his sleeve in every game he's ever suited up for.

What a group of seniors.

If just one of them would have stepped forward and done a bit more down the stretch, maybe determination wouldn't be the only thing this team would be admired for right now.

But admiration for determination is better than nothing.

Altman, his coaches and players should hold their heads high for their effort this season.

Big 8 season concludes with upsets of KU, OSU

By the Associated Press

KANSAS CITY, Mo. — At the end, both failed. No. 12 Oklahoma State failed at Iowa State Saturday and then No. 10 Kansas turned around and failed Sunday at No. 15 Nebraska.

Split, therefore, the Big Eight regular season title right up the middle. Give half to the Cowboys. Give half to the Jayhawks.

Let everybody contemplate how pleasant it would be to own 100 percent of the championship. Both finished with identical 21-6 overall and 10-4 conference records and were unbeaten all year at home, but both failed in the clutch on their final road game.

Oklahoma State's hopes for the title in Eddie Sutton's first year as coach evaporated Saturday when Skip McCoy scored five straight points in the final 2:30 as Iowa State edged the Cowboys 68-67.

But Kansas, knowing a victory Sunday at Nebraska meant an outright title, missed eight straight free throws in the final decisive moments as the Huskers capped a storybook regular season of their own with an 85-75 victory.

And since Oklahoma State beat Nebraska twice and Kansas beat the Huskers only once, the Cowboys are the No. 1 seed in the Big Eight Tournament. The tournament begins Friday in Kansas City and ends Sunday with the champion getting the Big Eight's automatic bid to the NCAA tourney.

Everybody is through with the regular season except Missouri, which closes out the year at home Monday against Notre Dame.

In Saturday's other Big Eight action, Missouri scorched Colorado 76-51 at home as the Buffaloes shot an appalling 26 percent.

MU 76, CU 51

Sixty-one times Colorado put the ball in their air. Only 16 times did they connect. Making matters worse, they sank only four of 27 3-point attempts.

"I'm disgusted with our play today," said Colorado coach Joe Harrington. "But overall, basketball at CU has improved."

Missouri seems to be picking up some late-season momentum even though the probation-bound Tigers are barred from the NCAA tourney.

"I thought we played outstanding on defense," said Missouri coach Norm Stewart. "Our offense wasn't that efficient, but it didn't have to be."

Jamal Coleman had 15 rebounds as the Tigers led in that key statistic 51-38.

"Getting 15 boards is like scoring 30 points," Stewart said. Doug Smith led Missouri with 23 points and had 13 rebounds. Shaun Vandiver's 17 points led Colorado.

NU 85, KU 75

"We wanted to be champions without saying co-champions," said Roy Williams, who was looking for his first Big Eight title in three seasons at Kansas. "But Nebraska did a great job. We didn't do a good job of taking care of the basketball early."

The Jayhawks had 20 turnovers while Nebraska took a nine-point lead in the first half.

"I've never had a team with 20 turnovers in the first half," Williams said. "We might have been tight. We weren't in sync on offense."

Tony Farmer scored 18 points for the Huskers, who were picked last in the preseason poll but broke their own school record for victories in a season by two. Kansas got within one point twice in the second half but ruined itself at the free-throw line. While Kansas was missing eight in a row in a five-minute stretch, Nebraska was hitting seven of eight to take a 77-71 lead. Mark Randall led Kansas with 17 points.

ISU 68, OSU 67

Oklahoma State hadn't had even a share of a basketball title since 1965.

"We wanted to win the Big Eight title outright and put pressure on Kansas," said guard Sean Sutton. "I have to give Iowa State credit. They came back and won the game. They obviously didn't want us to win the title on their home floor."

"You've got to give this team credit," Iowa State coach Johnny Orr said. "We played some great teams and took some terrible beatings. But we came back in the toughest league in the country and won three or four last games. I'm proud of them."

Byron Houston led Oklahoma State with 24 points and Sutton scored 18.

Dreams.
Everyone has them. They fuel our intensity and cause people to burn with desire. It's due to dreams that many spend countless hours of "free time" doing things they could otherwise live without.

These individuals are athletes, and although the dreams and hard work apply to those in most other areas, it's through sports that the most fierce competitive natures emerge.

Yet, so very few reach their goals. But for those who competed in Ahearn Field House Friday and Saturday, they had endured the long road and had found themselves among the elite at the National Junior College Athletic Association's Indoor Track and Field Championships.

Last year's champions — Blinn College of Texas' men and the women from Barton County Community College of Great Bend — successfully defended team titles.

Manhattan High product Katie Williams of Barton County, who became a national champion Friday in the women's three-mile run, said she was thrilled just to be competing in the prestigious event. Williams also placed second in the two-mile run and sixth in the mile run on the way to being named the meet's MVP.

"I try not to take too many things for granted," Williams said. "I really appreciate getting this chance to compete."

"It's always fun to be included in something on the national level. That alone makes me feel privileged. I try to keep running in perspective and just be thankful to have a chance to do it."

Track athletes normally use the indoor season as a stepping stone for the outdoor season, yet when athletes reach the national meet, stakes tend to rise. Freshman distance runner Mike McClaran of Brevard College in North Carolina admitted feeling a sense of awe.

"This is the first time I've ever run at a national meet, and I was hoping just to place," McClaran said of his runner-up finish. "I'm very pleased that I ran the race that my coach and I had planned before the meet. Now I'm really looking forward to this upcoming outdoor season. This will really give me a good base for this spring."

Williams said she thought her effort at the meet will give her an advantage throughout the larger upcoming season.

As McClaran learned, success at the national level is contagious.

"This is definitely not the end," McClaran said.

Barton County Community College and Blinn Community College (Texas) won team titles Saturday.

teammates with a pleasant surprise. When asked to comment on Sams' play, Amerson had to laugh.

"I don't know where he came from today," Amerson said. "He came out and hit his first couple of shots and got a couple of rebounds, and then it seemed like he was just unstoppable."

"You play like you practice, and he's been practicing really hard. Pat's a good player and these past couple of weeks have been the hardest he's worked, and it really paid off for him."

When he was requested to speak to the media following the game, Sams was kidded by his teammates, who receive the bulk of the publicity.

"They were tripping a little bit, I guess," Sams said. "In high school it seemed like I got a little bit of publicity, so now it's a nice reward after I've been trying hard."

One of the top rated players in Florida in high school, Sams averaged 23.4 points and 6.6 rebounds per game in leading his team to a second-place finish in state competition his senior year.

Sams stressed that Altman had been an encouragement during times he'd seen less playing time. Sams said he had to exercise patience in waiting for the opportunity to contribute.

"I guess good things come to those who wait," Sams said. "I'm just a sophomore, and there are a lot of seniors ahead of me. I understand that, and they've helped me to mature a lot. I just stayed on my knees and prayed for an opportunity."

Victory

"It wasn't like 'here we go again' or anything like that," Amerson said of the team's attitude entering overtime. "We were pretty confident going into it. We played a great second half, so that got our confidence up."

Balanced scoring helped the 'Cats confound the Sooners defense. Starting guards Jean Derouillere and Wires led the way with 20 and 15 points, respectively, but four others joined them in double figures. Darryl King supplied 13 points and five rebounds, and Patrick Sams, who entered the contest with 10 points in Big Eight play, added a career high 14 in just 18 minutes.

A native of nearby Lawton, Okla., King encountered familiar faces on both sides, and the pressure of playing in the shadow of his brother Stacey, who ruled Lloyd Noble during his seasons as an all-American at OU. King connected on 6-of-9 from the field and blocked two shots to lift his season total to 37.

The 'Cats opened with a small lead, only to see it buried by a flurry of OU three-pointers. Brittan recorded his third foul and was sent to the bench with more than 7:00 left in the half. Without their big man and with the Sooners warming up on the perimeter, K-State fell to a 54-46 halftime deficit.

The 'Cats stayed close in the opening period by hitting 59.4 percent from the field.

"We were a little distressed by the first half. We usually don't shoot 60 percent, and we usually don't give up 54 points in a half," Altman said. Altman credited the team for regrouping in the second half and quickly cutting into the lead.

"The first five minutes of the second half are always important," Amerson said. "Even though we were losing, we weren't going to quit. We were going to keep on playing hard. So we came out and played pretty good the first few minutes and knew we were back in it."

While the Wildcats used a balanced scoring effort, Oklahoma looked primarily to the shooting of guard Brent Price, who hit 4-of-5 three-point attempts and added 12-of-13 free throws to finish with 32 points. Big Eight Freshman-of-the-Year Jeff Webster came off the bench to add 25 points.

percent of their shots, and Oklahoma State gradually increased its lead to 35 points with 5:50 left in the game.

Although K-State cut the final to 17 points, the Lady Cats were never in the flow of the game, and ended the season on a sour note for the three seniors.

"Being seniors and playing so hard and so well against Iowa State it made this game a big letdown," Miller said. "Our emotion took over a little too much."

"We know that we played hard. We really wanted to get to the championship because it was our last year. It was disappointing," Hazim said. "The game got frustrating when we were down by 30. We didn't want to go out that way."

Billy Allen, Scott City, talks to a crowd of about 200 people Saturday evening in Weber Arena from atop his horse. Allen, a speaker at the 9th Annual Horseman's Conference, demonstrated different moves and how to go about teaching the moves to a horse. Sessions on the health care of foals were also in Umberger Hall.

Care of foals takes center stage

MIKE MARTIN
Collegian Reporter

Different aspects of foal management were discussed by eight speakers at the 9th Annual Horseman's Conference Saturday.

The afternoon session in Umberger Hall focused on the general health care and the effects of exercise and nutrition on a foal, or young horse.

Gary Brandt, assistant professor of clinical sciences, discussed the recognition and management of stress on a newborn foal.

"Occasionally we are forced with a situation where we have an abnormal foal," he said.

He said K-State has an intensive care unit for abnormal foals, which offers two to three beds with heat lamps, 24-hour care and a foal team of more than 200 people.

Care for the abnormal foal can be expensive, costing hundreds of dollars, but it is very important the foal get the right treatment.

"There is a financial commitment in caring for these foals," Brandt said.

"It is important that the environment be conducive as possible to healing," he said.

Rick DeBowes, associate professor of clinical sciences, also discussed abnormalities in foals. He spoke about angular limb deformity, otherwise known as crooked legs.

"Crooked legs is an often underestimated and undertreated clinical problem that has been around for a long time," he said.

He listed five types of angular limb deformities and the different methods of fixing the problems, including inserting staples or screw and wires into the foals legs.

The evening session in Weber Arena featured three trainers from Kansas who all used horses to demonstrate their topics.

Baltics vote for freedom

By the Associated Press

RIGA, U.S.S.R. — Latvians and Estonians voted overwhelmingly for independence from the Soviet Union Sunday, officials said, after counting more than three-quarters of the ballots.

In Latvia, nearly complete vote totals showed 77 percent voted in favor of separation and 21 percent against, officials said.

In Estonia, 90 percent of rural residents and 77.8 percent of the city voters opted for independence, officials said. They could not give an overall figure immediately.

On Jan. 9, 91 percent of Lithuanian casting their ballots voted in favor of independence. The Lithuanian government scheduled the referendum after Kremlin forces imposed a crackdown in the Baltics that left more than 20 people dead.

The Sunday vote was also two weeks before President Mikhail Gorbachev's nationwide referendum on holding the Soviet Union and its 15 republics together.

Like the Lithuanian vote, the referendums in Latvia and Estonia are little more than a public opinion poll and carry no legal weight.

They do, however, represent a strong challenge to Gorbachev, who has branded illegal last year's independence declarations by the Baltic republics.

The voting serves to pre-empt Gorbachev's planned nationwide referendum, set for March 17, which is designed to test the national will in preserving the entire Soviet Union. The Baltics as well as Armenia, Georgia and Moldavia have said they won't participate.

Officials said the votes of ethnic Russians in the two republics would be key in giving weight to the referendums Sunday.

Film portrays changes of middle-age

Alice demonstrates Allen's overlooked directing abilities

ERIC MELIN
Collegian Reviewer

Woody Allen is a name that becomes synonymous with the word neurotic.

Almost every time he appears in a movie as an actor, as in the recent flop, "Scenes From a Marriage," he plays a somewhat neurotic character. It is often overlooked, however, that he is a truly gifted writer and director. With his newest film "Alice," he proves these are easily his best attributes.

"Alice" marks the first time Allen has not appeared in one of his own movies since the mid-1980s. Instead, a fairly well-known cast rounded out by the ever-familiar Mia Farrow is present. As in most recent Woody Allen films, this one centers around middle-aged infidelity. But once again, he has found a new way to approach it.

Alice Tate (Farrow) is "happily" married to her husband Doug (William Hurt). They live in a huge house with a maid, a cook, a babysitter and their two children. One day while picking the kids up at school, she runs into a man who gives her a "look." The conversation is only brief, but she can't stop thinking about him. Under the recommendation of her rich friends after a day of gossip, she sees Dr. Yang (Keye Luke).

Reviewer says ...

Yang, an all-knowing Oriental doctor, gives her some herbs to help her along with her natural feelings. These include a love potion, a potion of invisibility and one that brings back the spirit of her dead ex-boyfriend Eddie (Alec Baldwin). Alice explores her feelings for both men and decides to strike up a day-time relationship with the man, Joe Ruffilo (Joe Mantegna).

Despite the fantasy-like herbs the doctor gives her after a short period of amazement, Alice overlooks the fact that things like turning invisible don't happen every day. This is forsaken to further develop the characters who, like in most of Allen's films, are incredibly real.

Alice also has a number of dreams and hallucinations stemming from the herbs that add to a better understanding of her upbringing and background, and somehow never seem out of place. Flashbacks happen in the same room with the same people rather than using younger actors or makeup tricks, much like a play. The special effects aren't played up either — to concentrate on the dialogue.

In one scene, "Alice" makes fun of itself. It is, essentially, a story about a woman having an affair and feeling guilty about it. Alice, who keeps searching for a direction in her life, goes to her successful writer-friend Nancy Brill (Cybil Sheppard) with an idea for a script. She tells Nancy her dilemma without naming names. "We want blood and guts," Nancy says. "Where's the angle? Is she a whore?"

That's the charm of "Alice." It's a motion picture about characters with

Students dig opportunity to discover past

ANNE TATUM
Collegian Reporter

Digging in the dirt is not easy, but it can be an experience.

Every summer since the 1960s, K-State and the University of Kansas archeology departments have joined forces to dig into Kansas history. They have gone on digs in and around the Kansas City area.

Patricia O'Brien, professor of anthropology, said about 10 students from each school go for the six-week summer course called field school.

Students earn six credit hours.

"There is no major criteria that a student has to have to go to field school, except for maybe Introduction to Archeology," she said. "And if a person has not taken that course then we will tell them to read some textbooks."

O'Brien, whose specialty is archeology, said she strongly encourages anybody interested to enroll in field school.

No tests are given in this course, but students should have a basic understanding of each phase of an archeology dig, she said. The steps include excavation, collection, cleaning, stabilization, cataloging and analysis.

"If students ask the same questions at the end of the course that they did in the beginning of the course, then I know they haven't learned anything," O'Brien said.

Cindy Blaker, senior in anthropology, went to field school two years ago. She said she encourages those interested in pursuing a career in archeology to go.

"It's a must if you want to go into archeology. You need this experience," she said.

Blaker said the neatest thing she found was on the last day of field school.

"On the last day we found a house lodge," she said. "It was what would have been a Native-American house."

This summer, field school will be on the grounds of Fort Leavenworth at the Hopewell House.

Many of the sites have Native-American artifacts and stone, flint, bone, wood and pottery can be found.

Blaker said finding even small objects or pieces of items is exciting.

"Digging is like dipping into the past. When you find something, even a piece of pottery, it's exciting," she said.

But it isn't all fun. Kansas summers can be blistering and digging in 110-degree weather can be draining. Participants get dirty, and it can be long, hard work, Blaker said.

After a long day of digging, students spend the night on cots in an elementary school.

Aaron Longenecker, senior in anthropology at KU, said he enjoys the digs, despite the heat. He went to field school last summer and plans to go again this summer.

"It's interesting to learn how people of ancient times lived," he said.

Longenecker also said he thinks it is a good idea to combine the schools' programs.

Visits help high school students

ANNE TATUM
Collegian Reporter

About 140 high school seniors from northeast Kansas will be here today to tour campus.

Pam Barnes, admissions representative for the extreme northeast corner of the state, has organized the event to familiarize students with K-State. This is the fifth senior day this year.

Many students touring campus are still undecided as to which school they want to attend. However, they have narrowed their choices to a couple schools.

"Their decision to attend K-State will come as a result of senior day," she said.

Andrea Shelton, senior admissions representative, said the senior day she is coordinating is a little different.

"My students will be attending some career and leadership development workshops and listening to some speakers," she said. "In the afternoon we are having a get-together in Union Station."

Shelton will have about 80 students from the Wichita, Kansas City and St. Louis areas here on Wednesday.

Barnes said academics appointments are crucial to what decision they will make and how comfortable they feel asking professors questions.

Students are given the opportunity to interview professors and ask questions concerning class structure. How the students react to those interviews is important, Barnes said.

She said making the students feel welcome and comfortable is an important aspect of their decision-making process.

The students will also tour residence halls and several different buildings including Farrell Library, McCain Auditorium, the Chemistry/Biochemistry Building and the Veterinary Medicine Complex.

"Senior day is good because it gives potential students a chance to see the campus and familiarize themselves with K-State," Shelton said.

Veterans on Campus provides advice during readaptation

BETSY HIDALGO
Collegian Reporter

The newest student organization, Veterans on Campus, has begun its mission to advise veterans coming to K-State of their rights and help them with their needs.

"We are here to provide a re-entry cushion for them by helping the veterans find a place to live, where to buy cheap books, what teachers to take, and offer them a tour of campus," said Tim Kamenar, co-founder of VOC and a senior in secondary education.

The organization was developed as an attempt to start a social group plus provide education for veterans about their rights on federal and state levels, he said.

"We want to relate to them and share under-appreciation because we have similar experiences," Ron Zerrer, co-founder of VOC and graduate student in student personnel services, said. "At the first meeting, we spoke the same language."

The goals of VOC are to grow as an organization and to form objectives that help any veteran. VOC organizers want to focus on the veterans' needs, he said.

"We are a self-perpetuating organization and do not want to leave veterans from other wars out," Kamenar said.

The group wants to lobby for K-State to implement a law, which states that any person leaving active duty from the military service will receive in-state tuition for the state in which they served. The undergraduate program at K-State does not fol-

Speaker lectures about Indian plight

ULRIKE DAUER
Collegian Reporter

Karren Baird-Olson, criminology professor, opened Native American Heritage Month with a lecture about American Indians and the prison system Friday at the K-State Union.

The United States has one of the harshest criminal and justice systems in the world, Baird-Olson said. This land, while praising health and equality, simultaneously imprisons more people than Russia and South Africa.

Statistics obtained from the Criminal Justice Institute state clearly a disproportionate number of inmates in the federal prisons are Native American Indians, she said.

"Roughly more than 4 percent of the inmates in our federal prisons are Native Americans. That doesn't sound too horrendous until you stop to think that, of the total population in the United States, Native Americans make up only 0.7 percent," Baird-Olson said.

She said numbers vary from state to state. In Kansas, 1.4 percent of the inmate population are Native Americans, whereas at times, numbers are up to 30 percent in Montana. In Canada, with Native Americans making up 5 percent of the total population, more than 50 percent of the inmates are Native Americans.

Baird-Olson, who moved to the Fort Peck Assiniboine and Sioux Reservation in the mid-1970s, discovered about 48 percent, half of the population in the reservation, had at least been at one time either in jail or in prison.

"I knew these people, and I knew that they were not bad people. And I began to ask a lot of questions, 'cause we all know the stereotypes of the savage Indians, the primitive Indians," she said.

Baird-Olson said seven social institutions have played a role in the disproportionate number of Native Americans in federal and state prisons. The seven were as follows: low family income; lower education level; health care systems that were more harmful than helpful; media coverage of Native Americans; lack of understanding and tolerance of the traditional, holistically spiritual ways; unemployment; and treatment of Native Americans by the government, legal system and the Bureau of Indian Affairs.

Across the United States, the mean income of Indians is $13,680 compared to $19,920 for the general population.

For every $100 a U.S. family receives, an Indian family receives $69.

"Native Americans have been victims of both structural and interpersonal violence. We cannot forget that. Unless we intervene in some way, we will continue to see a growing rate of deviant behavior," Baird-Olson said.

"We cannot focus just on individuals. We have to look beyond that. We need to look at the structural changes we need to make."

"Just the last five to six years we are beginning to do cross-cultural research," Baird-Olson said.

Baird-Olson said it took so long because people argued it was primarily a class problem rather than caused by interactions with race.

"It's tied into our denial, but it's a very unpleasant part of our history," she said.

real depth. Farrow is terrific as Alice. She never seemed insecure about her life or her husband, for that matter, because she never questioned anything. She trusted so much that it gave her a false sense of security. Watching this ordinary woman cheat on her husband and dream about giving up her hoity-toity spoiled lifestyle and going to India to help Mother Teresa is a blast.

Allen has come through again with a funny, touching film that stands out in a world of typical bigger-than-life pictures. A cool jazz soundtrack keeps the whole production from being too grand, and some interesting camera techniques only enhance the story. Forget about "Scenes From A Mall" and be thankful that the real Woody Allen movie is here.

Foal

Billy Allen discussed how to get a horse to properly respond to the rider. "Spurs can be the greatest tool for teaching response if used right, but if used wrong, they are the worst thing you can have," Allen said.

He went on to demonstrate that after using spurs once to get a certain response from the horse, the trainer usually won't need them again.

"What we are striving for is communication between us and the horse," he said.

A demonstration of communication between a horse and rider came from trainer Bill James.

He demonstrated how a cut horse will get in front of a moving cow and force the cow to change its direction.

His 7-year-old horse was able to accomplish this without James using a rein or bit, bringing a round of applause from the more than 200 people in attendance.

"We try to get the horse to think for itself," James said.

people are thinking about having children. We don't want to just be a voice. We want to interact with our community, and this is a great way to do it."

Darnell Vargo, a freshman in elementary education at Highland Community College, said the information available at the fair is useful.

"The brochures from the hospital are important so you know what you are doing when the time comes," she said.

Davenport said the fair is an annual event, and the people attending can use the information to benefit themselves.

"Between education and promotion, we really feel like we reach a lot of people," she said.

should go, he said, adding it takes about 60 days for him to know whether or not a horse has the "cow sense" to be a cut horse.

All three trainers agreed that concentration is a big part of training a horse.

"You need to concentrate, we ride with our hands, feet and minds. Our hands are actually extensions of our minds," Allen said.

Building a training program that you like and can be happy with was stressed by trainer Terry Champagne.

She also said it was important to have a realistic analysis of your horse, that some will be good athletically and others won't.

"You will have to accept that," she said.

She also said you should respect and recognize your horse.

"I don't believe in misusing or abusing the horses, but you should put them in a position that they have to do what we want them to do," Champagne said.

"I am very proud of what they can do," she said.

low this law, but the graduate program offers the in-state tuition for these veterans, he said.

The group would like to sponsor a military film festival, which would be open to the public. VOC would comment on how the military movies are not truthful and then try to educate the public on what the military is really like, Zerrer said.

"The image of the military is that they are all duffers," he said. "This is not true because 98 percent of the men and women enlisted have graduated from high school. The military is a different lifestyle, and it is the exceptional individual who stays in it."

Both Zerrer and Kamenar are veterans of the Army and both currently belong to the National Guard. Zerrer is also a veteran of the Navy.

"A veteran is defined as a person who has joined a branch of the armed forces and has served at least 180 days on active duty," said Lorene Dahm, veterans coordinator. "I expect the definition of a veteran will be redefined as a result of the Gulf war."

VOC is not pro-war or anti-war because each side has such a powerful meaning often misconceived, Kamenar said.

"We are not pro-war, we are pro-veteran," Zerrer said.

Usually, the cattle prices are low when a rancher finds he needs to quit and sell the cattle.

"Wait to get out then," he said. "Do it when the prices are high."

Genho said a cattle rancher should find the limiting factor and take steps to improve the situation.

"I know of only three ways to increase profitability: produce more, spend less or sell more," he said.

"We don't want to gut the future of Kansas," he said referring to the regents' budget.

House Majority Leader Donna Whiteman, the chamber's guest speaker Saturday, said there are several reasons for the budget crunch this year.

"The revenues anticipated are $27.7 million less than what we expected, and the federal government has passed on the cost of a veterans program, as well as a Medicaid program, that we had not anticipated," she said.

The passing off of federal programs is becoming a trend Kansas will have to learn to deal with, she said.

The Senate has debated and defeated an amendment to the state constitution to change the classification of taxable property.

"The amendment has strong points, and it's time the full House addressed the classification issue," Glasscock said.

Whiteman said there are some tough choices to make this Legislative session about more services or lower taxes and it's impossible to have both.

"The more input we have from the people, the more we can do for you," she said.

operation, he thinks of these ways. In the past, he suggested farmers should increase production, but now they must spend less.

He said beef producers should be concerned with the price being too high.

"A potential exists to lose some of our customers to poultry," he said. "We don't know the cost of producing our product. It's a responsibility on every ranch to know how much we are spending."

"I wanted to be the best cow/calf operator in the country," he said. "I began with an end in mind."

the export market for domestic beef. The market in Japan will increase greatly when a quota system is removed from beef exports to that country.

"The Japanese say they'll double their consumption in the next 10 years. We think we will triple our exports," he said. "We're gradually changing from a domestic-only market to an international, global market."

Smith said by the year 2000, domestic producers could be exporting 10-12 percent of their product instead of the current 5 percent.

Other speakers at the event concentrated on topics of current interest to those involved in the cattle industry. Melvin Hunt, professor of animal sciences and industry, talked about lowfat beef products.

Hunt said 44 percent of all beef is sold in the form of ground beef, more than 3 billion pounds per year. This led to research projects concentrating on replacing fat in ground beef.

He said simply removing fat from ground beef is not practical, because some of the taste is lost.

"People will prefer ground beef that has 20 percent fat," he said. "But for some, it may just have too much fat."

Hunt said in a consumer poll, 87 percent said they would try a lowfat ground beef product if one was available.

Many commercial and research exhibits were set up at the event. An open house at the Beef Research Unit featured research trials involving current production activities.

Manhattan firefighter Steve Doughty peers into the interior of a garage at 1015 Pierre St. through a hole cut by fellow firefighter Terry Scott Monday afternoon.

Doughty sprays the inside of a melted trash barrel after firefighter Dan Boeding (left) cut holes through the bottom. The owner of the garage, Anthony Coltharp, said he thinks the fire started in the barrels.

Blazes cause about $3,000 damage; authorities conduct investigation

Manhattan firefighters extinguished two garage fires Monday.

Anthony Coltharp, owner of a garage at 1015 Pierre St., said fire trucks arrived at scene as his wife, Valerie, was reporting the fire to a 911 operator.

"We called in, but the trucks were driving by and showed up as my wife was talking to them," Coltharp said.

Battalion Chief Steve Burnett of the Manhattan Fire Department said one of the department's trucks was conducting a training exercise when the crew saw smoke and went to the scene.

Coltharp said he thought the fire started in trash barrels standing next to the garage.

"I have no doubt that it did," he said. "I just think something got flipped in it."

Burnett said the fire did appear to begin in the trash cans, but the exact determination of the fire's cause would be made by the fire marshal.

Coltharp said there were no signs of a fire when he arrived home at 3:30 p.m.

"It was fine when I got home at 3:30, and a half hour later it was burning."

Valerie Coltharp said her 5-year-old daughter, Mandy, first noticed the garage fire. Mandy was playing between the Coltharp house and a neighbor's house, she said.

"My daughter was playing, and she said 'the garage is on fire,'" ■ See FIRES, Page 8

K-State, KCT await merger decision

and DAN SCOTT
Staff Reporters

The impending merger of the Kansas College of Technology and K-State is now at the mercy of the Legislature.

Enabling legislation and official word on how the merger will be funded has been stuck in state committees since the beginning of the session in January.

Considerable work has been done by both administrations since a regents' task force recommended the merger in May of 1990. Both administrations say the biggest hurdle ahead of them right now is getting the OK from the state.

"At this juncture, I just hope the Legislature acts quickly," said Robert Krause, vice president for institutional advancement.

"We're probably focusing now on going down to the end of the session. I doubt the Legislature will act independently on anything before it ends," he said.

The current session is scheduled to close in May, barring any extensions.

"It would be nowhere short of a miracle for us to get accomplished in the time frame what we originally hoped to do," said Jerry Cole, vice president for academic affairs at KCT.

Cole said the two schools would just have to roll with the punches.

"It looks to me like the student center we were hoping to have done by fall '92 will be delayed a whole year," he said. "We would have been hard pressed to get it done had the go-ahead been given in April, but by now we have passed the window of possibility."

By the end of the first year, Krause said the student dormitory and the cafeteria are to be built. The marketing program and the administrative details are also due at the same time.

While the institutions wait, the K-State College of Engineering is phasing out its engineering technology program, said Donald Rathbone, dean of the College of Engineering. The phase-out is set up in a three-year plan.

Rathbone said the administrative details will involve setting up a system to transfer KCT records to K-State. Transferring back records is not a high priority at this point.

Laboratory facilities and additions to the technology center are scheduled for completion by the second year, Krause said.

After three years, KCT, currently a two-year program, should be ready for third- and fourth-year technology students, he said.

Committee reviews financial crisis

Student Publications problems still exist

ERWIN SEBA
Staff Reporter

The Student Activities and Social Services Committee of Student Senate began consideration Monday night of two proposals to solve the financial and equipment problems of Student Publications Inc.

The first proposal recommends an increase in the line-item fee, which funds Student Publications, and an additional fee to pay for the replacement ment of computer equipment used in producing the Collegian, the Royal Purple and the Campus Directory.

Under this proposal, which was recommended by an ad-hoc committee assigned to study Student Publications' financial and equipment problems, the per semester fee for full-time students would increase from $4.80 to $9.73. Part-time students, who pay $2.40, would be required to pay half of the full-time student fee.

The second proposal, put forward by Student Body President Todd Heitschmidt would increase the cost of the Royal Purple and Campus Directory to the amount necessary for each to be self-sustaining.

The $4.80 full-time line-item fee would be used to pay $1.92 into an escrow account controlled by the Student Governing Association for equipment purchases and $2.88 to the Collegian.

Heitschmidt said SGA would issue certificates of participation to purchase new computer equipment for Student Publications as quickly as possible.

SGA would continue to control the equipment for up to five years as Student Publications paid off the certificates of participation. Also, SGA would pay Student Publications $104,375, which is the equivalent of buying $12,500 subscriptions to the Collegian at 5 cents per day for 167 publication days.

Linda Puntney, assistant director of Student Publications and Royal Purple adviser, asked the committee to not accept a proposal that would

As originally proposed, Heitschmidt's plan would raise the cost of the Royal Purple to at least $21.16.

Puntney gave the committee examples of other universities that have increased the price of the yearbook above $20 and watched sales of the yearbooks decline to the point where yearbooks consider ceasing publication.

The committee agreed to continue consideration of the two proposals at its next meeting.

Protests erupt in Iraq; 10 POWs return

Republican Guard turns tanks on demonstrators

By the Associated Press

SAFWAN, Iraq — Iraq's Republican Guard launched a fierce crackdown on protesters demanding the overthrow of Saddam Hussein and the establishment of an Islamic republic in Iraq, witnesses said Monday.

The Guard was reported to be turning some of its remaining tanks and guns on the demonstrators, who are apparently disgusted with Saddam's handling of the Persian Gulf War and sense he may be vulnerable.

There were reports of protesters killing government officials, including the mayor of Basra, a governor and a son of Saddam.

Witnesses said demonstrations had erupted in at least eight Iraqi cities, stretching from Iraq's second-largest city, Basra, to the holy city of Kerbala in central Iraq. They said in some places the Iraqi troops were shooting women and children.

"The special forces are destroying everything in front of them. If anybody shouts from a building, they knock it down," said Maher Hakawati, a Jordanian photographer who came to Kuwait from Basra.

Hakawati said he saw Republican Guard tanks moving through the streets of the southern Iraqi port town.

Many people in Basra appeared to have taken guns from police stations and rumors that Saddam fled the country sparked celebrations in the city, he said.

Gunmen riddled portraits of the Iraqi president with bullets, he said.

Iran's official Islamic Republic News Agency, monitored in Nicosia, Cyprus, reported five explosions at midday in Basra. It said refugees fleeing the violence were streaming into Iran across the border at Shalamchah.

It quoted refugees as saying Saddam's eldest son, Uday, was killed in the battle at Basra, along with a provincial governor and the mayor.

Refugees reaching this town just north of Kuwait, most of them Kuwaitis trying to return home, said demonstrators were marching in Nasiriyah, Shatra, Suq ash Shuyukh, Imara, Samawah and Kut, mostly in southern Iraq.

The refugees identified the holy city of Kerbala as the northernmost town wracked by protest. In the city, south of Baghdad, protesters slashed X's across portraits of Saddam and flung mud at them, said two men who left the town on Saturday.

Witnesses said rioters looted government warehouses before setting them alight and attacked prisons, government offices or vehicles and the offices of Saddam's ruling Arab Baath Socialist Party in numerous towns.

The Baath governor of Nasiriyah was reportedly gunned down by demonstrators and police fought pitched battles with them in the streets, refugees said.

"There was a lot of death. The police were killing the opposition, and there were many injured on both sides," said Ali Yacoub, a 32-year-old Kuwaiti policeman sprung from a jail in Nasiriyah on Sunday after the opposition battered down the doors. Yacoub said he had been held there with about 500 other Kuwaitis since November.

Refugees said many of the rioters didn't know how long they could maintain control of government buildings seized during demonstrations.

"Many said they did not have the ammunition to continue, they also have no gas," said Yacoub.

Reliable sources said soldiers anxious to flee southern Iraq are exchanging their weapons for transportation.

The same sources said Iraq has fired its general director of security, Abdul Rahman Aldour, charging him with negligence in the exercise of his duties.

The witnesses here said demonstrators in Basra have started carrying portraits of Mohammad Bakr Al-Hakim, a prominent Shiite clergyman that runs an opposition group from Iran.

Refugees said the uprising was not confined to Shiites; they said many people are simply tired of Saddam.

"They want a new president. He is a tyrant, a bloodsucker, a war monger," said Abu Mohammed, a 34-year-old truck driver.

6 Americans released after Sunday's cease-fire; list includes lone female soldier reported as MIA

By the Associated Press

Ten ex-POWs began their long journey home Monday from Baghdad, freed by the Iraqis as an initial gesture after Sunday's cease-fire meeting between allied commander Gen. H. Norman Schwarzkopf and Iraqi generals.

The six released Americans included the only female allied soldier listed as missing in action — Army Spc. Melissa Rathbun-Nealy, 20, of Grand Rapids, Mich.

She and Spc. David Lockett, 23, of Fort Bliss, Texas, both transportation specialists, apparently were delivering equipment to front-line positions near the Kuwaiti border in Saudi Arabia when captured by Iraqi troops.

The freed prisoners, clad in yellow jumpsuits bearing the letters "PW," were turned over to Red Cross officers in Baghdad by Iraqi officers.

Although some looked thin and haggard, Red Cross official Angelo Gnaedinger told reporters in the Iraqi capital that the 10 were in satisfactory good health.

"There she is. ... She looks so good," Rathbun-Nealy's father, Lee Rathbun, said in Michigan as he watched a CNN TV report on the release. "My God, there she is."

After a lunch of burgers, cola and chocolates, they departed by road westward. Late Monday, they arrived in Jordan, where they were to be flown eastward to the gulf emirate of Bahrain, to be examined aboard a U.S. Navy hospital ship there.

The Red Cross in Geneva identified the other Americans freed as Navy Lt. Jeffrey Norton Zaun, 28, of Cherry Hill, N.J.; Navy Lt. Robert Wetzel, 30, of Virginia Beach, Va.; Air Force Maj. Thomas E. Griffith, 34, of Goldsboro, N.C.; and Navy Lt. Lawrence Randolph Slade, 26, also of Virginia Beach.

In January, in the early days of the war, Zaun was brought before an Iraqi television camera and made a stilted, clearly coerced statement critical of the allied offensive against Iraq.

At that time, he looked bloodied and bruised from apparent beatings. On Monday, he showed no outward sign of injury.

The U.S. military reciprocated Monday's prisoner release by announcing that 300 Iraqi prisoners held by the allies would be freed Tuesday or Wednesday.

Rathbun-Nealy, Lockett and Wetzel had been listed by the U.S. command as missing in action. At least six Americans remain as prisoners, and 35 are still listed as missing in action.

The White House announced President Bush will meet one-on-one with allied leaders in the coming weeks to develop a blueprint for long-term stability in the Persian Gulf.

Freedom votes encourage struggle

MOSCOW (AP) — Baltic leaders said Monday the overwhelming pro-independence votes in Latvia and Estonia should encourage their people to continue struggling against the Kremlin's bloody crackdown.

In Sunday's referendums, nearly 78 percent of voters in Estonia and 74 percent in Latvia called for independence from the Soviet Union, according to official results released Monday.

"Hopefully the referendum result will provide courage and serve as an example to all democratic forces which, within the past two or three months, have had to beat a temporary retreat in the Soviet Union," Estonian Foreign Minister Lennart Meri told reporters in Tallinn, the Estonian capital.

Tribal rivalries result in battles

JOHANNESBURG, South Africa (AP) — Tribal rivalries broke out in violence at a workers' hostel in the black township of Soweto, where at least 24 people died in hand-to-hand battles between Zulus and Xhosas, police said Monday.

There were 15 injuries in the fighting. The battle probably was tied to the murder of a Zulu found Friday in the hostel, police said. Another factor may have been some hostel dwellers wearing pro-ANC T-shirts, the Star newspaper of Johannesburg said.

It quoted a hostel resident as saying an argument broke out between Zulus and Xhosas Sunday, after a Zulu demanded T-shirts bearing the African National Congress logo be banned from the hostel.

Zulus comprise the largest of South Africa's tribes and are the main support for the Inkatha Freedom Party, the ANC's bitter rival. Most Xhosas support the ANC.

Indian bones, artifacts discovered

SYLVAN GROVE (AP) — Lowell Fischer didn't realize the piece of metal he pried off the teeth of his earth scraper was an archaeological discovery.

He glanced at the stars and eagle etched onto the bent metal plate and continued widening the gravel pit about four miles west of Sylvan Grove.

Then fellow Lincoln County Highway Department worker Harvey Rees moved some dirt and exposed a leg bone.

Sheriff Don Panzer contacted the Kansas State Historical Society and Feb. 23, archaeologist Randall Thies and lab technician Rick Parker arrived.

The skeletal remains, believed to be that of a young Indian warrior, were carefully excavated and moved along with several artifacts surrounding the body to a laboratory in Topeka.

There, the bones and artifacts will be cleaned and studied. Later, a burial board will decide where the bones and burial goods will be reburied.

Senator proposes tax relief option

TOPEKA (AP) — Sen. Marge Petty, D-Topeka, told a legislative panel Monday that cars in Kansas provide a way of delivering property tax relief.

She presented her proposal to eliminate property taxes on motor vehicles to the Senate Assessment and Taxation Committee, but warned lawmakers that the measure is only one part of a property tax relief package. The bill does not raise the money to provide pay for the relief.

Petty said the state would have to give counties about $220 million so the local units of government do not lose money when the tax is eliminated on vehicles for personal use.

Petty offered an amendment to her bill to keep commercial vehicles on the tax rolls. If commercial vehicles were included in the tax relief plan, the total cost would be $306 million.

Law-enactment proposal endorsed

TOPEKA — A House committee endorsed Monday a proposal to allow ordinary citizens to enact laws on their own, but rejected a plan to allow them to change the constitution without the involvement of the Legislature.

The Federal and State Affairs Committee sent to the full House for debate three measures that would create a public initiative and referendum system. They are more restrictive than proposals drafted by Gov. Joan Finney's administration.

The committee endorsed the concept of Finney's proposal to allow citizens to put proposed laws on the ballot directly by gathering signatures on petitions. It also endorsed a version of her plan to allow the Legislature to put bills to a binding public vote.

It did not accept the governor's plan to allow voters to put proposed constitutional amendments directly on the ballot. Instead, it endorsed a plan under which a proposed amendment would go to the Legislature after voter approval.

Generally, the committee's versions of all three measures are more restrictive than those of Finney's. A public initiative system cannot be created without changing the state's constitution.

The committee endorsed the two initiative proposals on 12-9 votes.

If two-thirds of the members of both houses adopt the proposed amendments, they will go on the November 1992 general election ballot.

Court marshal proceedings delayed

Court marshal proceedings against Sgt. John Pruner were delayed Monday morning until April 3 at the defense's request, according to a Fort Riley press release.

Military judge Raymond Cole granted the delay over the objection of the prosecution.

Pruner faces military charges of desertion, missing the movement of his unit and absent without leave.

The Fort Riley post commander has convened the general court marshal to hear Pruner's case.

Concert to feature student musicians

DAVID PRITCHARD
Collegian Reporter

One student, whose work will be featured in a student composers concert at 11:30 a.m. today in All Faiths Chapel, won't be able to attend the premiere performance of his composition.

William Featherston, freshman in music composition, wrote a piece for trumpet and piano for the concert, but he has been called away from his life as a student and an Army reservist to serve active duty in Saudi Arabia.

Jason Schafer, senior in piano performance, said he thinks his Sonata for cello and piano is interesting because it is dark sounding.

"Sonata for cello and piano has a dark romantic texture," Schafer said. "The darker emotions are more interesting and mysterious. I wrote it for cello because it's such a mellow sounding instrument."

Schafer has been composing for four years and has won the regional Music Teachers National Association composition contest. A brass quintet, titled "Hallucinations," was selected as one of the top five pieces in the nation by the MTNA.

A song cycle, titled "Songs of the Heart," by Amy Kickhafer, senior in music education, will also be featured.

"Songs of the Heart" contains four songs and includes poems from four 19th-century lady poets.

"The poems aren't very well known, but I chose them because

HIV fears topic of lecture

Beverly Barbo will talk about the acceptance of her son's homosexuality and his death as a result of his struggle with AIDS at 7 tonight in the Union Forum Hall.

Barbo, whose son Tim died after testing positive with AIDS, has traveled to many universities to deliver speeches regarding the personal and human aspects of AIDS.

Barbo's presentation will try and accomplish three objectives concerning AIDS and homosexuality, said the Rev. Don Fallon, K-State coordinator of religious activities and a member of the K-State communicable disease committee.

The areas to be covered include creating a deeper understanding of the HIV infection for students, bringing an awareness to the community of the need to have compassion for those suffering from AIDS and trying to understand and accept those with homosexual orientations.

"I feel that students here at K-State have learned the facts about AIDS," Fallon said. "Now, we need to clear up some of the myths and fears about how the disease is transmitted."

Barbo's book titled "The Walking Wounded," deals with not only sharing the family's acceptance of her son's homosexuality, but also their struggle with the medical, spiritual and social aspects of Tim's death.

"In her past visits to K-State, Beverly touched the lives of each and every person who heard her speak," Fallon said. "Her talk will enable students to communicate more openly about the dangers of AIDS."

Barbo is a board member of Kansas AIDS Network.

EDITORIAL

Youth tired of bogus call to change world

Fridays are usually a pretty good day for me. "Why?" you ask. Well, that's the day my hometown newspaper arrives at the homestead. I usually sit around and go through it looking for people I know and the things they've done. It's usually a lot of fun in a Norman Rockwell-sort-of-way, especially the loose dog report.

But last Friday as I sat reading, an interesting item crossed my eyes. The editorial page had a short item about the high school newspaper and journalism class. Usually, I don't read small town newspaper editorials. They're usually so localized in what they talk about that they don't often make sense to me.

This one, however, I read. It seems the school newspaper wanted to do a story on the firing of a volleyball coach. The administration basically came in and told the young journalists the story was off limits. They didn't know what the situation was and weren't going to get a chance to find out.

The editorial went on to criticize the administration for the clamp down. I'm pretty much in agreement with them on that point. Censorship in any way, shape or form is bad news, including in a 2A high school somewhere in the vast expanse of western Kansas.

But this situation has shown me a problem beyond the question of free press. Somewhere along the line, the powers-that-be have decided to give us information on a need-to-know basis. A don't-rock-the-boat mentality, if you will.

That wouldn't be so bad, if they weren't so damn hypocritical about it. But these powers aren't merely content with keeping us in the dark, they have to criticize us for being there.

You've seen the headlines and stories. "Today's college students woefully unprepared for real world," "50 percent of high school students can't locate U.S. on map," and "Youth of today concerned only with material possessions." Basically, if you believe the hype, the youth of today are going to be the downfall of western civilization as we know it.

As much as I hate to admit it, some of the arguments are true. I've run across high school students whose intelligence level was slightly below that of a circus clown. I have friends here at K-State who care only about making money and buying cars.

Shawn
Bruce

Collegian Columnist

The blame, however, doesn't lie on their shoulders or mine; it lies on those in charge. Those are the people who expect the youth to go out and pick up trash by the side of the road without questioning what we can do to stop it. People like the Kansas Board of Regents, for example, expect students to be prepared for college after coming out of a high school where the newspaper is nothing more than a public relations tool for those in charge. "Change the world," they say. Just don't make any trouble doing it.

I remember going to the Statehouse in Topeka last year to attend a rally for enrollment adjustments. For years, I'd heard young people need to take more of an interest in the workings of the political world. So I and about 100 other K-State students went to take part.

We were asked to leave. We were interfering and getting in the way, they said. The legislators didn't like the way we were conducting our business. They said we didn't know the situation, and they knew what was best.

One of the results of that fiasco was K-State didn't get any money. I don't think we really had anything to do with that. I think it was decided long before we ever went to Topeka. Even our "poor behavior and judgment" had no effect.

But the ultimate cost was shown this spring when another trip to Topeka was planned. It was canceled due to lack of participation. Those in charge seem to think it's because we're "shiftless white, ignorant, middle-class kids." I think it's because we're tired.

We've seen the results of our attempts basically with no tangible reward. We've heard one too many times "it's none of your business." Finally, we just give up. Maybe 20 years down the line, we'll find ourselves telling 18-year-olds they "couldn't possibly begin to understand the situation."

So in the end, it's just a high school journalism class in a town of 2,000 people. Maybe I'm making too big a deal out of it. Hey, it doesn't affect you or me. We just have to go to class, get our diploma and "stay the course." High school newspapers all over the world aren't fallen apart yet. But there are cracks in the foundation.

I talked to one of the journalists on that paper about the situation. She was handling it pretty well. The class decided to send letters to the Kansas Senate, supporting a current bill proposal that would return true freedom of the press to high schools in Kansas.

But that's where the ultimate irony and sadness of this, and all situations like it, comes to bear. Although I didn't say so, I know the letters won't make a damn bit of difference. Bitter and cynical is no way to go through life.

Alternative certification bill deserves reading, passage

A bill currently proposed in the Legislature would allow applicants with a bachelor's or higher degree to obtain a teaching certificate by completing a practical internship in Kansas' schools.

The bill would allow professionals to become teachers in the elementary, middle or high schools without having to spend another two years at a university, as they do presently.

Applicants would have to complete basic teaching preparatory classes before interning in the classroom. The applicants would also have to complete six additional semester hours of teaching classes before finishing the program.

An interning teacher would have to obtain an emergency teaching certificate for one year. After successfully completing the first year of the program, a recommendation from a supervisory team would be required before obtaining a certificate for the second year.

The interning teacher would enter classrooms under direct supervision after orientation to the school's policies. The mentor teacher, the building principal and a faculty member would work with and supervise the applicant during the internship.

The bill would not adversely affect students currently in education, nor the College of Education. In fact, it would be an extra source of students for the college.

Professionals seeking a second career might choose teaching more often if the two years of college work were dropped. The participants would pay fees to intern, but they would also be paid by the school while they are interning. This is another advantage to the program.

The bill should be passed this session to present those professionals looking toward teaching careers the opportunity for alternative certification.

Another perspective

Black author Shelby Steele made an excellent point during his lecture at Wichita State University last week: it's time whites and blacks alike stopped seeing blacks as victims of centuries of oppression and act accordingly. As Steele contends, that approach to solving problems of black Americans has become counterproductive.

Steele's controversial stance is not a denial or revision of the unhappy history of black America. Nor is his stance a ruse to allow white America to escape responsibility for slavery and the more than 100 years of second-class citizenship that followed emancipation.

Indeed, as Steele noted during his lecture last week, "Victimization is the sort of magic that made being black powerful" during the civil rights movement of the late 1950s and the 1960s. By raising consciousness of the plight of black America, the rhetoric of victimization helped create many of the opportunities that blacks now enjoy, and was useful for a time.

Steele's stance, which many black and white civil rights activists have not received kindly, is recognition that the time has come for blacks to rely on other forms of power to achieve their objectives of equality and wealth. By continuing to rely on the rhetoric of victimization, blacks — and whites sympathetic to their social and economic goals — perpetrate the untruth that blacks lack the capacity to compete with whites on equal terms.

As Steele noted, blacks for centuries have been told they're inferior to whites, a view for which there's no legitimate basis. The focus of victimization causes blacks and whites alike to wonder if it's true, and that's why the usefulness of that strategy is at an end. Steele deserves credit for having the courage to point this out.

Soap opera nut comes out of closet

The time has come to confess. I, Karin Dell'Antonia, an educated and discriminating TV viewer, was a closet soap-opera watcher. Yes, I was into watching a world where mysterious siblings can turn up at random, often looking exactly like another character who recently bit the dust. A world where adultery is the most common feature in any relationship, and one's parents can change from day to day and year to year.

The disease started off small. When I was very young, I was forced by vicious classmates to watch Luke woo and wed Laura on "General Hospital." I fought for a while, but soon found myself watching with vague interest. The next thing I knew, I was hooked.

Soon I could chatter knowledgeably about Luke, Laura, Scorpio and all the rest. If videocassette recorders had been around, I would have been a goner. But summer ended, and school interfered with watching anything but an improbable half-hour show titled "The Edge of Night." It featured the evil doings of a chick named Raven and has long since been canceled, probably without ever finishing Raven's current love triangle.

And so it went off, as childhood diseases will. I wasn't at home during the day at all anymore. Time went on. I got summer jobs. I couldn't work the new VCR. And when I was sick in high school, the invention of cable allowed me to avoid soap operas entirely.

I could scan the channels for reruns of "The Dick Van Dyke Show" and "Gilligan's Island." Once, in a horrible bout with bronchial pneumonia and too sick to even reach the remote control, I watched MTV for four hours. Unfortunately, it was the red-letter day when they showed nothing but home music videos of Madonna's "True Blue" entered by viewers in some sort of contest. They played it over and over; I must have dozed off.

To this day, I know every word of that mindless little ditty, and I can never hear it without images of beaches and beauty salons entering my head. To be honest, I can't remember exactly why. I think I fused a significant number of brain cells that day. But I didn't watch soaps — not one.

In college, my resolve weakened. I blame my roommates. They lured me into it. We'd eat lunch in the living room and watch "Days," or we'd meet in the K-State Union and have to catch the "The Young and the Restless." If they couldn't be home and I could, they'd ask, "What happened on 'Another

Karin Dell'Antonia

Collegian Columnist

World?" I felt obligated. Really. I just couldn't let them down. Semester after semester, it only got worse.

It built up, crept up on me without my ever seeing its coming. It reached its worst level one summer when I took classes and didn't work. If I planted myself in the living room to watch "Days," it was easy to find myself sitting through "Another World." Once that became a habit, it was easy just to leave the television on while I puttered around, doing other things, not really watching. But, one day I discovered I was watching "Santa Barbara" all the way through. By this time, there was no escape.

Most of us know or can imagine how boring a summer in Manhattan can be, so I felt I had an excuse. But I had to face the facts. I was sitting in front of the television for up to three hours a day. School started, and I thought I'd be able to kick the habit. But no, more was in store for me.

I got a roommate who still watched "General Hospital." I guess she never kicked that childhood habit. It conflicted with "Santa Barbara," and once you become familiar with two shows on at the same time, you might as well give yourself up for lost. I thought since I had only watched "Santa Barbara" for a week or two (it was late in the summer by the time my habit progressed that far), I could give it up.

But I learned something about soap operas. They never let you go. It has been at least 10 years since I watched "General Hospital," but some of the same characters are still there. Luke just came back, only now he's someone else. The writers know about people like me. They count on me coming back eventually. I've watched "The Young and the Restless" about three times a year for three years. The same storyline has been developing the whole time. (Nina and her slimy husband, with Cricket trying to save her and Nina and Phillip's baby, in case you're wondering.) So here I am, able to carry on an intelligent (?) conversation about the daily lives Jack and Jennifer, John and Charlene, Hope, Bo, Carly, Cricket, Felicia, Cass, Emilio, Eve, Scorpio, Stone ... (Where do they get these names? I met a three-year-old named Kayla the other day. I guess we know what her mom was doing during pregnancy). Did she tell about the rape, is the split personality back, how goes Jake's/Nick's murder trial, what about the jewels and is he still dead? Of course it gets confusing at times. You can watch Victor in a wheelchair for weeks, unable to move or speak, miss a day or two, tune in and he's standing up and mashing on a chick who was seeing someone else the day before.

The whole thing is an education in and of itself. How to act when your cheating husband meets your ex-lover, the father of your child, looking good in a wheelchair or on the witness stand. How to hold a conversation without having to say hello or goodbye. Enduring a shipwreck without damaging your mascara, pretending to be blind, stealing your neighbor's child — these are all in a day's work for the soap opera heroine. Truly, this is the stuff I need to know before I hit the real world.

I'm getting better — in fact, I'm almost cured. I weaned myself gradually, finally cutting down to half an episode of "Days" every other day. Then I completely lost patience with that ongoing Jennifer and Jack romance thing. I didn't want to watch. They kept having the same conversation. I discovered you could keep up by watching five minutes of soap opera commercials a day.

What really did my addiction in was an episode of "General Hospital" my roommate had on. It featured the worst acting I've ever seen, and one of those not-quite-real-looking outdoor scenes. It was something about a boat wreck, and it was awful. Truly awful. I couldn't stop laughing. It reminded me of an old episode of "Batman."

"Holy yatch fires, Scorpianman!" "It is an awful scene of carnage, police-extra boy. Fetch some blankets and hot liquids."

I'm cured. Tune in next week for "What my life would be like as a soap opera." It should be a thrilling saga. I've got all the viewing experience I need.

Internships proposed for teacher certification

Bill intended to lessen instructor shortage

KIMBERLY KOHLS
Staff Reporter

A bill has been introduced in the Kansas Legislature that would allow an alternative for aspiring teachers to gain certification.

The bill, proposed by Sen. Dave Kerr, R-Hutchinson, would allow prospective teachers with a college degree to earn a certificate through on-the-job, two-year internships.

Presently, anyone wanting a certificate has to spend two years in education classes. This is two years the person could be learning on the job, Kerr said.

"Many people have valuable experiences and talents that would be beneficial to students in the schools," he said. "These people could be able to teach without spending two extra years in school."

The bill is needed for many reasons, Kerr said. There is a shortage of teachers, especially computer science, science and language teachers in many parts of the state.

The State Department of Education, however, reported a surplus of elementary teachers and no serious shortages at the secondary level. At the start of the 1990-91 school year, there were 17 teacher vacancies in the state of Kansas.

Because of the current teacher surplus, Michael Perl, associate professor in the College of Education, said the bill is not needed.

"I would not be opposed to it when it is needed," he said. "The bill is the best one to come through. But we really don't need an alternative certification bill at this time because we have the teachers we need."

Alternative certification programs are used in 18 other states with good results, Kerr said.

"New Jersey has found that the quality of the teachers is excellent, especially in their core areas," he said. "They also have a good retention rate."

Allowing a person to do an internship to obtain certification may also encourage people to choose teaching as a profession, Kerr said.

The bill is not aimed at students presently in college, but at professionals who want to switch to teaching from other professions, Kerr said. The bill would have little effect on K-State and other colleges, Kerr said.

The bill would require a certification applicant to complete nine semester hours of professional development classes, which must be completed prior to entering the classroom. The required classes are adolescent psychology, foundations of education and classroom management and methodology.

The applicant would also have to pass the national teacher examination core battery with a composite score at, or higher than, the national mean score before starting the internship.

Each internship would be supervised by a mentor teacher, a principal and a faculty member from a teacher education college.

Before a person could enter the program, he or she would have to receive an offer from a Kansas school, so few people would be going through the alternative program, Perl said.

The applicant would be paid by the district where he is employed. The intern, however, would have to pay a fee for the internship and classes needed to complete the program.

At the end of each school year, a required report to the governor and Legislature would evaluate the effectiveness of the alternate certification program. The report would include information about the quality of the teachers granted certificates under this program.

The report would also compare the state's cost of providing the alternative program to the cost of traditional teacher preparation programs and the retention rate of teachers granted certification under both programs.

House reviews property tax bill

By the Associated Press

TOPEKA — A bill designed to strengthen the limits the state puts on city, county and township property tax levies received the House's tentative approval Monday.

The measure would extend a 1990 tax lid law, which was set to expire July 1, through 1995 and eliminate provisions some legislators saw as large loopholes.

Supporters see it as a way to make sure any money the state raises to allow an across-the-board cut in property taxes is used for that purpose.

Representatives gave first-round approval to the measure on a voice vote after some complained the measure was too strict or the state has no business telling local governments how much to spend.

Supporters of the measure beat back two amendments designed to make the lid less restrictive and defeated two other attempts to effectively kill the measure.

KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN
SPORTS

Randolph competes in 2 sports

BILL LANG
Sports Reporter

For sophomore Thomas Randolph, free time is a rare commodity. Randolph is attempting a Bo Jackson-like athletic double, minus the baseball.

During the fall, he plays defensive back for the Wildcat football team, and during the spring, he runs sprints for the track team.

Randolph admits that track is his better sport.

"I love football, but I'm good at track," Randolph said. "I originally came to K-State on a track scholarship, but I wanted to play football and the football coaches encouraged me to go out and play, and the rest is history."

Last year, Randolph admitted that all the time and the cross training slowed him a little, but with the year's experience, said he feels he can improve in both areas.

"Well, this year is a lot easier than last year," he said. "Last year I was just a freshman coming out of high school, and I was trying to do two sports. I think the cross training was slowing me down just a little bit."

"Right now, football training just consists of weight training and running," he said. "I get a little weight training in, but I get all my running with track."

K-State track coach John Capriotti agrees with Randolph's athletic double.

"I think that football has been good for Thomas," Capriotti said. "He's a strong kid, and you need that in sprints.

"Last year, he did get a little lost in the training, and he wasn't as developed as he is this year," he said. "The strength and the speed drills and the working on the reflexes in the football area have really improved him in the track area."

Capriotti also said track has helped immensely on the football field. Capriotti said as a safety or a defensive back, speed is a must, and with Randolph's speed increasing daily because of track, he becomes more valuable.

For Capriotti, Randolph has become a bargain.

"We originally got Thomas on a track scholarship, but he was wanting to play football, and we let him," Capriotti said. "Then (K-State football) coach (Bill) Snyder picked up the scholarship, and right now we just have a very good athlete for free. A very good athlete."

Randolph has set a few goals for this year. One will be fulfilled this weekend at the NCAA Indoor Track and Field Championships in Indianapolis.

Randolph has qualified for nationals in the 55-meter dash with a time of 6.20. But he said he is also hoping to improve in the other areas.

"One of the goals that I have for football is hoping the team can make it to a bowl game before I graduate," he said. "For the outdoor track season, I hope to qualify for the 200 and the 4-by-100."

With the commitment to two sports, Randolph admits it gets tiring at times.

"I don't have much leisure time, and my girlfriend understands that," he said. "But I have a few relaxing moments."

Thomas Randolph celebrates after returning a blocked punt for a touchdown during the 1990 football season. He also competes on the track.

Bonds, Leyland engage in verbal war

By the Associated Press

BRADENTON, Fla. — Barry Bonds' unhappiness over his contract boiled over Monday into an obscenity-laced, on-field shouting match, with Pittsburgh Pirates manager Jim Leyland telling the National League MVP: "If you don't want to be here, get the hell out of here."

Leyland said, "I don't give a damn what his problems are, he's not going to run this camp. ... He can just go home."

The incident apparently resulted from Bonds' second straight loss in salary arbitration and the club's refusal to offer him a multi-year contract worth $4 million-plus a season.

He recently said he wouldn't resign with Pittsburgh after 1992 "if they offered me $100 million."

Leyland's outburst came as Bonds and instructor Bill Virdon, a former major league player and manager, yelled at each other and traded ugly glances during a routine fly ball drill.

"One player's not going to run this club," Leyland said, his voice echoing over the Pirates' four practice fields. "If you don't want to be here, get the hell out of here. Let's get the ... show over with or go home. "If guys don't want to be here, if guys aren't happy with their money, don't take it out on everybody else."

Leyland was at his angriest when Bonds seemed to question his authority, with the manager yelling, "I'm the manager of this team. That's who I am."

Bonds and publicist Jim Lachimia shouted at each other when Bonds asked several photographers to quit taking pictures of him.

Bonds maintains a cool relationship with most teammates, except for Bobby Bonilla. He has repeatedly cursed TV cameramen for shooting his picture and has declined all media interviews.

Bonds said he didn't care if the incident further damaged his public image. The executives of several opposing clubs reportedly told Pirates general manager Larry Doughty this winter they wouldn't trade for Bonds because of his moodiness and attitude.

"They can write anything they want to write," he said. "I'm just going to play baseball."

Arkansas falls to No. 5 after weekend loss

By the Associated Press

Arkansas said farewell to the Southwest Conference and No. 3 in the Associated Press college basketball poll.

The Razorbacks fell to No. 5 in the poll, the lowest they've been all season, after a 99-86 loss to Texas the night before. Arkansas leaves the SWC for the Southeastern Conference next season.

"It was sad to be playing here for the last time," Arkansas coach Nolan Richardson said at Austin, Texas. "I've promoted the Southwest Conference in basketball. The higher-ups make decisions about where we go."

The top two stayed the same: UNLV and Ohio State.

UNLV (27-0) got all 62 first-place votes and 1,550 points after ending its regular season undefeated with a 104-83 victory over Fullerton State Saturday. Indiana State and Alcorn State, both in 1979, were the last teams to go undefeated in the regular season.

Ohio State (25-1) beat Michigan State 65-64 on a buzzer-beater and had 1,488 points. Indiana (25-4) moved from No. 5 to No. 3 after beating Wisconsin 74-61, getting 1,363 points, and Syracuse (26-4) was No. 4 with 1,347 points after a 62-58 victory over Georgetown.

After Arkansas, the Top Ten consisted of Duke (25-6), North Carolina (22-5), Utah (26-2), Arizona (24-6) and Kentucky (22-6).

North Carolina fell from No. 4 to No. 7 after losing to Duke 83-77 Sunday. Kentucky moved into the Top Ten from 13th last week with a 114-93 victory over Auburn to end its season. The Wildcats are on NCAA probation and ineligible for postseason play.

The Second Ten consisted of New Mexico State, Kansas, Nebraska, Oklahoma State, East Tennessee State, LSU, UCLA, Mississippi State, Princeton and St. John's. Mississippi State moved from No. 23 to No. 18 after beating LSU 76-63.

Seton Hall, Southern Mississippi, Texas, Alabama and DePaul round out the top 25.

'Cats could surprise at Big 8 tournament

Eric Brown

Sports Reporter

Well, it's finally time for the rookie sportswriter to come out of his proverbial shell.

Hopefully, the K-State men's basketball team will come with him.

Although taking the eighth seed with them to the Big Eight Tournament this weekend, the team does exhibit the qualities necessary to beat any of the teams in the Big Eight.

In a year of intense parity, K-State has been dealt many hard knocks during the course of the season. Some have been earned, but many have come as uncontrollable breaks. Examples would be loose balls falling the wrong way and judgment calls siding with the opposition.

The Big Eight season got underway with the 'Cats at a promising 7-3 record after showing all but unlimited potential during their seizing of the BMA Holiday Classic Tournament in Kansas City's Kemper Arena.

Unfortunately, the blooming flowers began to wilt from that point on, as the sunbeams of victory seldom shined upon the 'Cats in January and February.

Yet the fight continued, as K-State has been competitive in almost every game this season — a bright point considering the potent arsenal of weapons displayed by every Big Eight team. In 11 of the Wildcats' 14 losses, they had an opportunity to pull the game out late in regulation.

Coach Dana Altman's long-awaited, yet highly evasive, first conference triumph, however, finally came after five disheartening Big Eight defeats. The success carried over into the total domination of the Oklahoma Sooners, 95-70.

Unfortunately, moments like those were not found in the games that followed, as K-State dropped its next six gutwrenching games.

This year's 'Cats team is one of my favorites of all time. Sure, its current record is only 13-14, but considering the obstacles they've faced, that says nothing about the fight they've possessed during this rugged season.

It's thrilling to me just to watch them compete through the Big Eight portion of the season.

Yet to see the clutches of doom applied during last Saturday's game, I had to refocus to notice it was the 'Cats with the grip-of-death on the Sooners, not the other way around.

A gleam of light now appears out of the darkness, and as Oklahoma coach Billy Tubbs recently said about his own team's play, let's hope it's not a freight train getting ready to explode through.

A new season begins Friday, and K-State is not placed in all that terrible of a position. They open against Oklahoma State. Although the Cowboys sit atop the conference, they are but 6-6 in games on courts other than their own. A semifinal matchup would be with Iowa State or Missouri. There are worse fates for eighth-seeded teams.

K-State, over the course of the last few games, has shown the ability to play more as a team.

If extra incentive is necessary, K-State leads the Big Eight with 20 NCAA Tournament appearances. The University of Kansas, a virtual lock for the tournament this season, is second with 19.

The tournament is there for the taking. There is still time to prove some things, and K-State has a team capable of bringing home the crown. Kemper was nice enough to the 'Cats in December. Maybe a repeat is in order.

Sports Editor,

Wednesday is the annual clash between K-State and Wichita State in baseball, and ICAT is asking the students to help lead the 'Cats to victory.

Last year, we had the largest crowd in state history for a college baseball game. Unfortunately, WSU broke that record about two weeks later.

ICAT is asking the students and community to help us get that record back. A local radio station will be helping us give away gifts from local businesses and other door prizes.

The weather is supposed to be good, and the game should be great.

I know that everyone is watching their budgets before departing for spring break, but in case you forgot, all K-State baseball games are free with a valid student ID.

With all that in mind, get out and show the Shockers what Purple Pride is all about.

Proposed increase in cigarette tax may fund 3rd year of MOE program

HOPE SWARTZ
Collegian Reporter

A proposed increase in the cigarette sales tax may keep the third year of the Margin of Excellence from going up in smoke.

Pending on the Kansas Senate's calendar is a bill that would increase the tax on cigarettes by 9 cents per pack. The author of the bill, Sen. Dick Bond, R-Overland Park, said the money raised by the tax, estimated at $18 million, would be used to fund the MOE.

The MOE is a funding program designed to bring Kansas Board of Regents universities in line with peer institutions in key areas, including faculty salaries.

"I think it's clear we are probably not going to find, in the general fund, money to fund the margin," Bond said. "The general fund is currently $58 million short. We need some other taxing vehicle to fund it."

A similar bill, which would have raised the cigarette tax to fund higher education, passed the Senate last year but failed in the House of Representatives. Bond said there is more resistance to new taxes this year.

The bill's co-sponsor, Sen. Fred Kerr, R-Hutchinson, said he didn't want to bring the bill up until after it was decided there needed to be tax increases.

"At this point in the session, I am one of the many senators who is trying to avoid new taxes," Kerr said. "It's too early to say whether we are going to be able to avoid tax increases."

Kerr said Gov. Joan Finney's proposal to tax services would also benefit education.

"When you increase a tax that big, it increases education," Kerr said. "In general terms, over half of the state budget goes to public education."

Neither senator said he was able to judge how the bill might do in the Senate.

"I have a strong commitment to the Margin and the funding of regents institutions," Bond said. "I'm thoroughly optimistic about this bill."

The Missouri Legislature has also proposed a cigarette sales tax increase to fund higher education, so the increase in Kansas would not have as negative of an effect, Bond said. There is also some interest in changing the tax to 5 cents, which would match the Missouri proposal.

But Kerr said the Senate would like no new taxes across the board. "It would be inconsistent to raise one tax for one item, such as the MOE, when other items are being cut," Kerr said.

Rep. Kent Glasscock, R-Manhattan, said although he currently can't predict passage of the proposed increase in the House either, he supports it.

"I have great hopes for it," he said. "It would help K-State and all the regents schools. I'm a strong advocate of the idea. I'm working hard to find any way to fund the Margin of Excellence."

Bond said the bill is the last hope for MOE funding.

"This may be the only alternative to fund the Margin in 1991. I don't foresee another funding option," Bond said. "This is the only game in town."

Botanic Garden receives facelift

DAVE McCULLAGH
Collegian Reporter

The K-State Botanic Garden on Denison Avenue near the Dairy Barn will receive a facelift from the K-State Botanic Garden Society.

The original garden was destroyed during the construction of Bluemont Hall in the late 70s. The Conservatory was saved, however, and now sits along Denison Avenue where it was transplanted in 1978.

The Conservatory houses tropical rain forest plants, plants from Hawaii and also a section of cacti.

"We have over 2,000 visitors per year to the Conservatory," said Paul Jennings, head of the horticulture department.

The Conservatory will be the focal point of the Botanic Garden under construction.

The rose garden section is almost done with only a few final touches needed, Jennings said.

"The rose garden is in its final stages. Forty different cultivars of roses were donated to the garden by rose companies," Jennings said.

The garden will have the same design as the old site near Dickens Hall.

This "formal garden" design dates back to the 1930s.

All the money for the garden is donated by supporters.

"It's a long-term project," Jennings said. "When we get money and have space to build, we move along."

Members of the Garden Society work to increase donations. Jennings said most members are alumni, but some are not.

The next step for the garden will be the construction of walkways.

Another project is a rock garden which will be built next to the greenhouses.

"The rock garden is planned and the money has already been donated, but the construction on Throckmorton may hold it up," Jennings said.

Jennings said the garden will be an important teaching tool, not only to horticulture, but also many other departments.

"People don't realize it's like a classroom," Jennings said. "Just because it doesn't have walls doesn't mean it's not considered a teaching resource."

Foreign students plan spring break

ANNE TATUM
Collegian Reporter

International students are busy planning their spring break activities.

Jerina Ah-Tive, sophomore in accounting, from Mahe, Seychelles, an island off the coast of Africa, said her plans for spring break were still up in the air.

"I might be going to Texas to visit friends, but I don't know yet," she said. "I might have friends coming here."

Ah-Tive is going to K-State as part of an exchange program, so she has a host family in Manhattan she spends some time with during the holidays and school breaks.

Last year Ah-Tive stayed in Edwards Hall.

One residence hall is kept open during breaks, and students are charged for every day they stay there.

Thomas Krueger, a graduate student from Wiesbaden, Germany, also said he was unsure about his plans.

"I'll decide what I'm doing for spring break when it starts on Friday," he said. "It depends on my schedule."

Krueger said last year he was forced to stay in Manhattan during the break because of his master's work. He had two papers due immediately after break.

"Some friends asked me to go to Florida and New Orleans, but I couldn't go," Krueger said.

Dabbas went to Weston, Mo., and hit the slopes at Snow Creek her junior year, and last year she went to Dallas for a couple of days with her husband.

Ishwinder Singh Brara, senior in electrical engineering and a native of New Delhi, India, is going to St. Louis. He said he only wants to see one thing — The St. Louis Gateway Arch.

Brara said he has always wanted to see it because of a toy model his parents brought back from St. Louis when he was a child.

"It's not too far from here. I want to see it while it is near," he said.

Now you can afford to dream in color.

If you thought that finding a color Macintosh® system you could afford was just a dream, then the new, affordable Macintosh LC is a dream come true.

The Macintosh LC is rich in color. Unlike many computers that can display only 16 colors at once, the Macintosh LC expands your palette to 256 colors. It also comes with a microphone and new sound-input technology that lets you personalize your work by adding voice or other sounds.

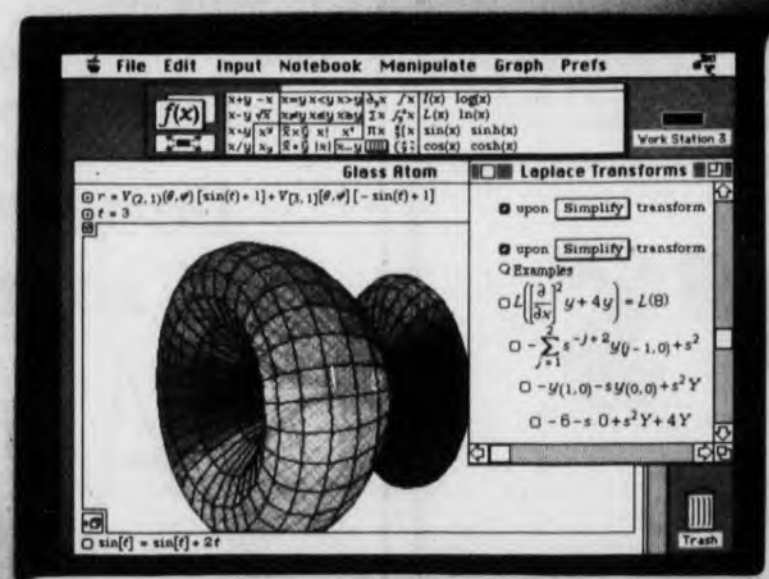

Like every Macintosh computer, the LC is easy to set up and easy to master. And it runs thousands of available applications that all work in the same, consistent way—so once you've learned one program, you're well on your way to learning them all. The Macintosh LC even lets you share information with someone who uses a different type of computer—thanks to the versatile Apple® SuperDrive™, which can read from and write to Macintosh, MS-DOS, OS/2, and Apple II floppy disks.

Take a look at the Macintosh LC and see what it gives you. Then pinch yourself.

It's better than a dream—it's a Macintosh.

Skiwear fashions give flavor to spring travels

March slopes require variety of clothing

KIMBERLY KOHLS
Staff Reporter

Sunglasses, sweatshirts and sweaters are musts when traveling to the Rocky Mountains for spring break this year.

"On warm, spring days people can usually ski with a sweater, sweatshirt or a pullover," said Jean Kranzler, a buyer with Ski Depot Sports in Winter Park, Colo.

Lightweight ski pants and shells are also good for spring skiing. Long-sleeve T-shirts are popular on the slopes, he said.

"Purple and jewel tones were good colors this past year," Kranzler said.

People buying ski clothing in Manhattan are seeing bright colors and prints, said Jamie Johnson, sales clerk at Aggie Ski and Sport in Aggieville. The store specializes in ski-wear and accessories.

"There are some really cool prints like jigsaw, festive, and block prints," Johnson said. "Geometric prints in bright colors are popular."

Johnson said over the last month she has seen many students coming in to buy clothing and accessories for their spring breaks.

Because the temperature in the mountains during the spring varies, having versatile clothing is essential.

"March is the wettest month in the mountains. It will be 24 degrees and blizzarding one day, and the next day it will be 55 degrees and sunny," Kranzler said. "So a water-proof shell is the best."

Stretch pants are popular with women. They are flattering and comfortable to wear when just sitting around not skiing, Johnson said. Big pull-over jackets with drawstring waists are often worn with the stretch pants.

Lightweight wind pants with a pull-over jacket are popular with the men. People also like to buy the jackets because they can wear them after they get home from skiing, Johnson said.

Since the slopes are filled with college-age tourists over spring break, Kranzler said it is easy to tell who are Colorado natives and who aren't, Kranzler said.

"Tourists often wear bright, obnoxious colors," he said. "Day-glow is popular with tourists."

"You can peg a tourist," Kranzler said. "They usually don't realize how bright the sun is, and they don't have sunglasses."

Sun Cloud and Oakley are popular brands of sunglasses.

"Sunglasses and sunscreen are two of the most important things to have up here. The reflection from the sun off of the snow is very, very bright," Kranzler said.

"One of the funniest things that spring breakers do is wear loud, wild boxer shorts over their ski pants," he said. "They also buy a spring break 1991 long-sleeve T-shirt and wear it all week. It's kind of funny."

Fires

Valerie Coltharp said. The Coltharps normally keep two cars in the garage at night, but hadn't put them away when the fire occurred.

"He'd told me to put the van away when I got home. I'm glad I didn't," Valerie Coltharp said.

Burnett said the fire caused an estimated $2,000 in damage to garage and its contents.

The second fire was in a garage behind an unoccupied house at 504 Laramie St.

Steve Beier, 613 North 5th St., said he called the fire in at about 6:30 p.m. after two boys told him the garage was on fire.

Pat Herrera, the owner, said he had nothing stored in the garage, and the electricity to the building had been disconnected.

"I've been trying to sell it for over a year," he said. "(I) haven't had much luck. This is the last thing I need."

Herrera, who had no insurance on the garage, said he had no idea what the cost of damages are.

Burnett said the fire at 504 Laramie caused an estimated $1,000 in damage to the building. The cause is still under investigation, he said.

According a Riley County Police Department report, two juveniles were detained for suspected arson and later released to their parents.

"The goal after five years is to double the present enrollment," Krause said.

KCT now has an enrollment of about 400 full-time students.

To meet this goal, Krause said the aeronautical center will have to be completed by the fall of 1992. The center will be an important tool for recruiting new technology students.

"Without that facility, people will have to lower their expectations," Krause said.

The ability to do this will also depend on how and when the Legislature approves the merger, Rathbone said.

"KCT has some potential (in the aeronautical field)," Rathbone said. "It has a tremendous runway, has large hangers and other facilities.

What it needs is another facility."

KCT is capable of landing anything from the smallest to the largest planes on its expansive runway. This is rare to find in a teaching program, Rathbone said.

Regardless of how many merger plans have reached fulfillment, KCT will be under the same structure as a college of K-State as of July 1991. This arrangement allows for an administration comprised of a dean and an associate dean for academic affairs.

KCT currently has five administrative positions.

"The CEO, or dean, roughly translates to the current president, and the associate dean is basically my job as vice president for academic affairs," Cole said.

they said what I wanted to say," Kickhafer said.

Kickhafer placed second in 1989 in the divisional state Kansas Music Teachers Association composition contest with her composition "The Child." She has also been commissioned to write for the Woodbine Centennial Celebration.

"I feel like composing music is like English composition," she said. "Usually I pick an image or topic to write about and just go from there. Writing is a great diversion."

Patricia Russell, graduate student in music theory and composition, said she uses anything that may spark an idea for her compositions, which include a Sonata for saxophone and piano. Russell has been composing for four years.

"You have to work within guidelines. I try to think of a poem or piece of literature and base my composition around that," she said. "One time I used a magazine cover that was a bunch of different colors. Each movement of the piece was a different color."

Russell's composition, titled "Sensation in Five," was selected as one of seven national finalists in the 1989 Music Educators National Conference composition contest.

Uprisings continue in gulf

LaCrosse coach 1 of 9 Fort Riley soldiers killed

From Staff and Wire Reports

K-State lacrosse coach Donaldson Tillar was among nine soldiers from the 1st Infantry Division killed Feb. 27 when a helicopter crashed in the Persian Gulf area.

Tillar was a 1st lieutenant with the division's 1st Aviation Regiment, Company D, from Miller School, Va. He was 25.

Maj. Larry Kinsland, Department of the Army spokesman, said no details on the crash have been released. He said the crash was caused by hostile fire.

Maj. Nancy Burt, Army spokeswoman, said she had no details on the crash's location.

Burt said the soldiers were listed as killed in action.

"It was in the Desert Storm theater of operations," she said. "I don't know if it was in Saudi Arabia, Kuwait or Iraq."

All the soldiers were with the 4th Battalion of the 1st Division's 1st Aviation Regiment, Burt said. Some were with Company D, some with Company E, one with Headquarters and Headquarters Company and one with Service Company.

Burt said the name of one of the soldiers had not yet been released by the Defense Department.

She identified the other seven as:

Warrant Officer George Swartzendruber, 26, a pilot, whose home of record was San Diego, Calif.;

Sgt. Jason C. Carr, 24, a tactical transport helicopter repairman, of Halifax, Va.;

Sgt. Cheryl L. O'Brien, 24, an avionics mechanic, of Racine, Wis.;

Sgt. 1st Class Gary E. Streeter, 40, of Kingman, Ariz.;

Sgt. Lee A. Belas, 22, a voice interceptor, of Port Orchard, Va.;

Staff Sgt. Jonathan H. Kamm, 25, a tactical transport helicopter repairman, of Mason, Ohio; Warrant Officer John K. Morgan, 28, a pilot, of Bellevue, Washington.

Burt said she did not know which of the soldiers were at the controls at the time of the crash. Tillar, Swartzendruber, Morgan and the soldier, whose name had not been released, all were pilots, but only two would have been in the pilot seats, she said.

A total of 15 soldiers with the Big Red One have been killed in action during Operation Desert Storm. An additional death occurred in a non-combat situation, Maj. Sam Rizzio, Fort Riley public affairs, said in a statement released Tuesday.

The soldiers killed in action prior to the helicopter crash included: Spec. Melford R. Collins, 34, of Uhlend, Texas; Spec. Kenneth J. Perry, 23, of Lake Waccamaw, N.C.; Pfc. Robert L. Daugherty, 20, Hollywood, Fla.; Spec. Steven Trautman, 21, Ustonia, Mo.; Pfc. Mark Miller, 20, Cannelton, Ind.; and Sgt. David Douthit, 24, Tacoma, Wash., the statement said.

Pfc. Rueben G. Kirk, 19, Dunlow, W. Va., died in a non-combat situation, it said.

David Frese contributed to this report.

Iraqis pledge to annul annexation, return property

By the Associated Press

With rapid-fire prisoner releases and proclamations, Iraq struggled to clear away the fallout of its Gulf war defeat Tuesday. But an anti-Saddam uprising was reported sweeping city after city, in what a dissident spokesman promised would be a long, violent battle.

The Iraqis turned over 35 prisoners of war, including 15 Americans, to the Red Cross in Baghdad, and said they were the last allied captives. Bad weather delayed a transfer of the ex-POWs out of Iraq in exchange for Iraqi prisoners.

The Iraqis formally annulled their annexation of Kuwait and pledged to return looted Kuwaiti property.

The Kurdish opposition claimed it seized a major city in the north, just days after violent protests against President Saddam Hussein began spreading through Iraq's southern cities. American military sources said Iraqi army units were choosing sides in bloody local showdowns.

Some Iraqi soldiers returning to their homeland have joined with other anti-Saddam elements in protests and violence in at least a dozen southern cities in recent days. The upheaval reportedly was led by fundamentalists among the Shiite Muslims.

Tank units of Saddam's trusted Republican Guard were in the southern city of Basra, exchanging machine-gun fire with elements of the regular army, said U.S. military officials in Saudi Arabia. The Pentagon later reported Basra had quieted down.

Both the U.S. officers and sources in the Kurdish opposition movement said Iraqi military units appeared to be reorganizing and choosing sides, both in the south and in Kurdistan.

In Syria, Jalal Talabani, anti-Saddam leader of the Patriotic Union of Kurdistan,

Uprising in Iraq

Uprisings in Iraq against Saddam Hussein have been reported in seven Iraqi cities. American experts think Republican Guard troops, still loyal to Hussein, will be able to quell the rebellions.

Associated Press Reports GREGORY A. BRANSON/Collegian claimed that the northern provincial capital of Erbil and nearby towns were seized by Kurdish guerrillas.

Opposition sources in both Syria and Iran said two important Shiite Muslim holy cities, Najaf and Karbala fell to the control of anti-Saddam rioters Monday. Twenty-two protesters were killed in Najaf, those sources said. Such reports could not be independently verified.

"The fight to liberate Iraq will be a long, violent battle," said Hoshyar Zebari, a spokesman for another Kurdish group, the Kurdistan Democratic Party.

Loyalist military units appeared to be mobilizing Tuesday to move on the southern insurrection, Pentagon officials said.

They said they expected the army eventually to crush what they described as an unorganized uprising.

"Saddam may be sowing the seeds of his own destruction in the long term," said Rear Adm. Mike McConnell.

Baghdad Radio Tuesday accused the U.S.-led alliance of a conspiracy to foment the unrest. Bush has called on the Iraqi people to overthrow Saddam, but his spokesman, Marlin Fitzwater, said Tuesday, "We don't intend to get involved in Iraq's internal affairs."

In Kuwait City, the new Kuwaiti martial-law regime put a 10 p.m.-4 a.m. curfew into effect Tuesday.

The liberated Kuwaiti capital remained dangerous. Seven Kuwaiti soldiers manning checkpoints were shot and killed by unidentified passing motorists Saturday night through Monday night, the U.S. military reported.

Sheik Ahmed Al-Sabah, a leader of the Kuwaiti resistance under Iraqi occupation and a nephew of Kuwait's ruling emir, told The Associated Press that at least 10,000 Palestinians and other foreigners will be expelled from Kuwait for allegedly collaborating with the Iraqis.

Officials and news organizations reported that 28 Western journalists have disappeared while traveling in southern Iraq to report on the civil unrest. Four are newsmen from U.S. organizations.

On Monday, the Iraqis moved quickly to meet the allies' demands for immediate prisoner releases, freeing six Americans and four other captives as an initial gesture.

Unless confronted with AIDS, young people have a sense of immortality.

Beverly Barbo, lecturer and author of the book "The Walking Wounded," spoke to more than 100 people Tuesday night about her son Tim's homosexuality and eventual AIDS-related death.

"I am here to tell you our story, so that you will be responsible; so that your family won't have to watch you die like I watched my son Tim die," Barbo said. "I am hoping to bring a different perspective on the sexuality issue, to let you know what it is like for a family to deal first with a child's homosexuality and too often the death sentence of AIDS."

The presentation provided a deeper understanding of the HIV virus, support and compassion for those who are carrying the disease and an understanding for those of different sexual orientations.

Barbo said she delivers awareness lectures to blast the typical stereotypes surrounding AIDS.

Patients often experience rejection after being honest about their homosexuality, and some families alienate a son or daughter simply because of the AIDS issue, Barbo said. It is not dangerous to be near a person with AIDS because it is only transmitted through sexual activity or a needle.

With all the information available, people can learn how to protect themselves from the AIDS virus. Individuals are responsible for their own sexual behavior, no matter what their orientation, Barbo said.

Ballard's, KU find settlement terms

Store admits to illegal trademark use

LORI STAUFFER
Staff Reporter

Ballard's Sporting Goods in Lawrence and the University of Kansas reached an out-of-court settlement on various licensing violations, including service mark infringement.

The sporting goods store admitted to illegally producing unlicensed garments bearing various KU trademarks.

The store owner also admitted to contract printing, or allowing outside screen shops to use KU names and logos on garments supplied by Ballard's, said Jim Young, director of university services at the Collegiate Licensing Company.

"The university was not asked if its trademark could be used. There were a number of quality problems that were not acceptable to the university," he said.

John Fairman, K-State vice president of institutional advancement, said with a collegiate license, universities can ensure quality control in trademarks, logos and the material the artwork is placed on.

The company making the product submits material and the artwork to make sure they meet the standards set by the university and the licensing agency.

The university in turn receives 7.5 percent of the cost of making the product.

In the settlement, Ballard's agreed to turn over several hundred unlicensed garments to KU and pay restitution, Young said. KU donated the garments to a local charity.

The undisclosed monetary settlement included compensation for lost royalty revenues and reparations damage to KU's reputation.

"The university has built a reputation for the Jayhawk," Young said. "The university and our company feels that reputation has been tarnished. We want other companies to realize that inferior levels of quality will not be accepted."

Sonny Ballard, owner of Ballard's Sporting Goods, said he never agreed to part of the settlement.

"We did agree to pay back royalties, but I wouldn't agree to handing over the garments, too," Ballard said. "We printed up some garments before we got licensed, and we kept track of the number we sold. We agreed to pay back royalties on those, which we did. But we are not going to pay royalties and give them the garments, too. I don't remember anything about that."

Young said Ballard's vice president, Steve Ballard, did agree to the settlement.

"As far as I know, the university has already received the garments and given them to charity," he said. "What I have been told by Steve Ballard is the garments were taken off the floor, boxed up and turned over to the university."

Fairman said the settlement should

Bush popularity trouble for democrats

WASHINGTON (AP) — Twenty-one months from Election Day, the Democrats are looking at an incumbent Republican president who is commander in chief of a striking war victory and soaring around 90 percent in approval ratings.

About the only solace Democrats have is that Bush's popularity will likely go down.

"George Bush is in as good a shape as anybody I've seen the year before an election campaign," said Robert Beckel, who learned about popular incumbents as manager of Walter Mondale's 1984 challenge to Ronald Reagan.

There is a conspicuous reluctance among big-name Democrats to gear up for a challenge to Bush in 1992.

Indians say city council claim racist

WICHITA (AP) — It is racist to claim taxpayers might be "scalped" by downtown revitalization costs, local American Indians say.

Some Indian group members have told City Council members and critics of the $375 million downtown plan they do not like the way development opponents have made a target of the Keeper of the Plains statue.

And they are particularly upset over the "Save our Scalps" slogan adopted by one opposition group.

"I can't perceive it as anything but a racial slur," said Truman Ware, chairman of the board of the Mid-America All Indian Center Monday.

City Council member Rip Gooch, a strong development supporter, said he agreed.

"I think it's a very slanderous approach," he said.

Hearing scheduled for Kansas man

BARTLESVILLE, Okla. (AP) — A preliminary hearing has been scheduled for March 18 for a Coffeyville man charged with first-degree manslaughter in a weekend shooting.

Devlin Fields, 26, of Coffeyville was charged Monday in Washington County District Court in the shooting death of Charles Gosvenor, 36, of Collinsville, Okla. He was pronounced dead at 3:15 a.m. Sunday after being taken to Jane Phillips Medical Center in Bartlesville, Okla.

Fields was arrested Sunday at his home and was returned to Bartlesville after waiving extradition Monday. He was later released on bond.

Bartlesville Police Chief Tom Holland said Gosvenor was shot after an argument outside a nightclub on the south edge of Bartlesville early Sunday.

Spokesman apologizes to Indians

LAWRENCE (AP) — A police spokesman apologized Tuesday for an article he wrote that many Indian leaders said was cavalier about the unexplained deaths of three Indian students and was based on negative stereotypes.

"I would like to say publicly that it was never my intention to alienate, ridicule, or make light of the victims of recent tragic deaths of Native Americans," said Chris Mulvenon of the Lawrence Police Department.

"I am completely sorry and wholeheartedly regret any perceptions of insensitivity that my article satirizing media responsibility may have caused," he said. His column appeared in the latest issue of a statewide police magazine.

But some Indian leaders said his apology was not enough.

"Apologies at this point, while appreciated, are not going to solve the problem," said Daniel Wildcat, president of the Lawrence Indian Center.

"How can we expect to be safe if attitudes of racism exist within the police force?" asked a statement from the Haskell Indian Junior College student senate. "Why must we be an isolated community in Lawrence? Why can't we walk the streets of Lawrence without fear for our lives?"

Astrophysician to lecture for series

The Computing and Information Science Seminar series will present Cliff Stoll, professor of planetary science for the Harvard-Smithsonian center for astrophysics, for a lecture at 4 p.m. March 7 in Throckmorton 132.

Stoll will lecture "Stalking the Wily Hacker" for about an hour and answer questions from the audience.

Maarten Van Swaay, associate professor of computing and information sciences, said Stoll tracked a West German computer hacker, who broke into over forty military computers around the world, for a year.

The hacker was a spy passing information to the KGB, the Soviet Union intelligence agency. The hacker was recently convicted of espionage.

Van Swaay said Stoll will address the techniques the hacker used to crack into the computers, as well as his method of catching the criminal. He will also explain the holes in our current systems and how you trace someone across the worldwide computer networks.

Poverty of women topic of lecture

The poverty of women will be the topic of a lecture sponsored by the Women's Studies Program at 4 p.m. today in the K-State Union 212.

Dorothy Miller, assistant professor of women's studies at Wichita State University, will speak on "The Theory of Women's Poverty," said Mary Rakowsky, K-State secretary of the Women's Studies Program.

Rakowsky said Miller has written a book titled "Women and Social Welfare: A Feminist Analysis."

Miller is one of several speakers the Women's Studies Program brings to K-State.

The K-State Women's Studies Program is an academic program that offers a secondary major in the college of Arts and Sciences. Currently, there are about 15 students in the program.

K-State alumnus develops project

Construction graduate remembers, honors veterans with war memorial

LAURA BIRRELL
Collegian Reporter

The K-State Association of General Contractors was largely responsible for the building of the K-State Vietnam Veterans Memorial.

When Greg Covington was named president of the Association of General Contractors, he said he had heard rumors of the memorial project and asked Bill Arck, adviser to the Vietnam Veterans Memorial Committee, how the project was coming along.

Arck said he was excited about the student group expressing interest in the project.

Covington said the K-State Association of General Contractors was usually placed in the top four out of 133 student contractor associations in the nation, and he saw the memorial as a good opportunity for the students of the group to receive recognition.

But, he said, the memorial project also had a special value to him personally.

"When I was 17," he said, "I was drafted in the last draft battery and my birthday was drawn 5th. Just a few weeks before I was due to take my physical, they abolished the draft. This left me feeling like I owed something — because friends of mine had gone, but I hadn't."

"I wanted to do something really meaningful for those who died for our country," Covington said. "These people are more important than words of brick and the memorial was way overdue."

Arck named Covington construction manager of the project. Covington was not only president of the student organization, but he also had 13 years prior experience in the field of construction work.

Covington had worked construction for 13 years before he decided to continue his education.

"I felt that I would reach a plateau in my work and never advance," he said about returning to college. "I would have a sensation of success, but not real success."

"It's a hard decision to give up everything and go to college, but it's the single most important decision I made in my life and it was worth it."

"I feel that Greg is one of the reasons the memorial is the quality it is," Arck said. "He was very good at paying attention to detail, and his prior work experience and skills enhanced the beauty of the memorial. Greg was a very key person to the work on the memorial."

Since Covington was the construction manager, he was at the site of the memorial during most of the time it took to construct it.

Covington said this wasn't always easy because he was taking 19 hours of classes at the same time he was coordinating the construction.

Adding to schedule problems, the project fell behind schedule due to an excessive amount of rain.

This meant everyone had to go into high gear, Covington said. People were working as early as 6 a.m. and as late as 2 a.m.

"My course work started to suffer and I had to miss classes," Covington said.

Greg Covington, former K-State student, was president of the K-State Association of General Contractors, which played a large part in building the K-State Vietnam Veterans Memorial. Covington said helping with the memorial was a way for him to do something special for those who died.

son said. "But, even if working on this project set me back in school, I would do it again."

But, Covington said he wasn't the only one dedicating his time. There were 50 people who volunteered their time and work, and all were forced to work on a low budget. This meant everyone had to get involved and go to the community for supplies, Covington said. Many community businesses donated supplies and equipment needed for the memorial.

"This project could not have been completed if it had not been for the teamwork of everyone working together," Covington said.

He said the project offered the students an opportunity to get involved in a big project.

"We gained knowledge from this project that we never could have learned in class," Covington said. "We had to deal with the problems and accomplishments we will be dealing with in real life."

He said the memorial was the largest project taken on by the group.

"And, I think the ones who did not participate will regret it," Covington said. "Those of us that did work on the memorial are very proud to have been a part of it."

Dean addresses age-related issues

RYAN HAYTER
Collegian Reporter

The importance in addressing age-related issues has increased since the world's population is getting older.

"In the history of the world, two-thirds of the people who have ever reached the age of 65 and older are alive today," said Marvin Kaiser, dean of the College of Arts and Sciences.

Kaiser, while speaking to an audience at the International Activities Luncheon in the K-State Union Thursday, said our country views aging as a problem.

"We have created a policy of program structure where to reach a certain age, you are to quietly lay down and accept your place," he said.

He said to be successful in addressing the aging revolution, we are going to have to rethink our views.

"Aging is inexorably happening. The world is growing older," he said. "Never again will countries be young."

The aging phenomena is as important an issue in developing countries as in developed countries, he said.

"Of people that are 60 years of age and older, 54 to 56 percent live in developing countries now," Kaiser said. "By 2020, it is estimated that up to 74 percent of this age group will be living on that side of the equation."

The phenomena is more of a problem in developing areas due to a lack of resources and insufficient time to prepare.

Kaiser said the slow-aging revolution in our country has given us plenty of time for preparation, but the aging trends in developing countries can occur in a span of only two generations.

China is estimated to have 400 million people 65 years old or older by 2020. Kaiser attributed this to the one-child-per-family policy.

"The less children you have in a society, proportionally, the more older people you will have," he said.

Kaiser said aging is principally a woman's issue in this country, and throughout the world, because women tend to outlive men.

Women of France outlive men of that country by an average of eight years.

Between the time of 1 A.D. and the 1900s, the average life expectancy for humans grew to 43 years, an increase of 10 years. Between 1900 and 1991, life expectancy increased by 32 years in the United States.

By 2010, one-third of the population of the U.S. will be between the ages of 50 and 74.

Kaiser said, "Now we are looking at the contributions that older people make to their families, communities and the economic sector."

Individuals create reality by escaping it

My friend Dave, a graduate student at the University of Kansas, sent me a letter the other day. In it he wrote that he "create(s) reality by escaping it."

I found this a particularly provoking statement, especially taken in the context of my own recent discovery that my life is a part of a great cosmic motion picture, the plot of which I am apparently in no position to understand.

I feel like I'm living in a movie. But I don't believe I'm the main character in this movie. What purpose do I achieve in this everyday existence of mine? I must be a part of a larger scheme, a complex plot line full of unseen action and development — unseen, at least, by me.

I think the subject of this movie must be life. But with a subject so large, what chance can there be that I am the movie's main character? I am central to the movie only inasmuch as I am my own audience. I am one of billions of characters in this movie, one of billions of people who have lived and who have, in the act of living, made their brief appearances before the camera.

Yet, despite my small part in it, my life is affected by the cinematic complexity of the movie as a whole. My range of sensation and experience seems at least worthy of a footnote in the script, if only to me. But I haven't seen the script, so I can't be sure how I fit into it.

And since I haven't seen the script, since I can't pull out of myself and view my position from a point that might begin to explain the meaning of my life in the larger context of this motion picture, I am handicapped in my performance. I don't always understand the events of my everyday existence. I feel awkward and out of place. I am baffled by my interactions with others, yet they feel too significant in this unseen scheme to disregard.

This life takes on the dream-like logic of a Kafka novel (or perhaps, the dream-like logic of a movie adaptation of a Kafka novel). The connectedness of significant events fails. Although life continues, its purpose is unsure. Time moves forward, but the announcement of the meaning of life we long for seems postponed by the digressions of everyday existence.

The other day, for instance, while I walked down to Aggieville from my dormitory along Manhattan Avenue, a carload of people came by. A girl in the passenger seat hung out the window, yelled something at me that I couldn't understand, and seemed to point at my shoes.

Eric Becker

Collegian Columnist

The experience was beyond my comprehension. I didn't recognize the girl or the car. And although there are some things I'm not sure of, although I lack confidence in some aspects of my life, I've never doubted the adequacy of my shoes.

I know sometimes I tend to search for meaning where there may be none. But it seems possible to me that even meaningless events may take on profound significances.

Sometimes I wonder as well if the things that are truly important might be as simple as my shoes. Maybe I miss the things I should see because I look too hard, and because I ignore the everyday furnishings around me that make life — more so than any introspection — the thing it really is.

I know that not everything I do is worthy of film. It's possible that I haven't even yet appeared on camera; my life up to now may have been no more than mere preparation for my moment on the screen. For no matter how historically important or insignificant an individual life turns out to be, it is only an instant in the unfolding plot of the main feature that I feel we all inhabit.

I think that my friend Dave is right: we create reality by escaping it. It is my continuing search for a metaphoric expression of my situation, my willingness to see some things as symbols for other things, that serves as my escape. I continue to search for meaning where there may be none. But I refuse to accept the possibility that life on earth is an accident, and that it has no spiritual or moral implications.

For me, reality is tied to this search for meaning. I don't doubt that reality exists, but I form it myself as best I can to keep it manageable and to make it something that I can in some way accept. I describe my life as a cosmic motion picture (or as a part of one, anyhow) to put it in terms I can understand.

And I expect in some fashion the director of this show will someday yell "Cut," and with that my part will be played. I have to believe someday all of this is going to make sense within the master plan of a script I haven't yet been able to read.

But for now, I am lost within my own reality. Maybe most of us are. For now, I have only the relationship between the disjointed scenes of my life to ground me in the reality of my motion picture. Here and there, I impose a meaning when I can, but in truth I feel awash in a world where I can believe in everything, but where very little of anything has a universal meaning. This movie is beyond me.

I seem to remember having read that Andy Warhol once said something about everyone in the world being a movie star for 15 minutes. Without the context, I can't be sure of what he meant. But maybe it was something like what I've been trying to say. No matter how entangled the plot of this cosmic motion picture seems to become, I suppose we can take comfort in the fact that, since we're not allowed access to the script, no one can expect us to remember our lines.

Parties must set priorities

As a new Legislature takes its seat in the Statehouse and a new governor moves into her office down the hall, the state of Kansas must determine where its priorities lie.

The state is confronted with issues from every direction: property tax relief, funding the state budget, building highways and far down the line is education.

The state should consider education its top priority.

Education should be emphasized because it is the core of any society. If people have no education, they cannot read, write, add, subtract or perform a difficult task.

Without these essential skills, people will not have jobs. People will not contribute to the state economy. People will be dependent on the state for their welfare.

And the state will not focus its attention on education unless the educated speak up.

The Kansas Board of Regents needs to present the state a cost-efficient educational system. It is impractical to have excessive multiple programs at colleges and universities across the state. The money allocated for six programs could be concentrated on one or two programs, and thus save money.

The University administration needs to send a clear signal to the regents and the Legislature that academics is our top priority. Emphasis should be put on helping our depressed library, continuing to attract quality faculty and restraining the emphasis on athletics and an art museum.

The real key to the whole puzzle lies with the students. The students need to reverse the message — that we don't care about reduced funding — we have sent to the Legislature. Students need to follow the lead of student action groups such as ASK and travel to Topeka to speak their piece.

At the same time, we need to register to vote in Riley County and prove that we have voting power behind our words. Cast your ballots in favor of representatives that support education.

The state will not shift its emphasis to education unless the regents, K-State and students work together to secure a message of vital importance to the Statehouse.

Register now

Editor,

I am concerned about the apparent separation between Manhattan residents and K-State students. Are K-State students not residing in Manhattan? The American Heritage Dictionary defines residency as being "committed to live and work in a specific place, often for a certain length of time."

Think about it. We students live in Manhattan for at least nine months out of the year, and we live here for at least four years. We rent property here, we work here, we attend churches here and we use the libraries and parks here. We volunteer our time in this community, we pay parking fines to this city and we are protected by the Manhattan fire and police departments. And, most importantly, we spend a tremendous amount of money here.

Yet although K-State students make such a large cultural and economic impact on Manhattan, we don't claim our right to a political impact on Manhattan as well. We have no voice on Manhattan affairs. There are 19,000 students at K-State and only about 30,000 year-round citizens of Manhattan. We need and deserve to have our say in the affairs of the Manhattan community. Local issues such as rental inspection, traffic lights and parking regulations will affect us more during our college years than will the business of our respective hometowns.

So, what can we as students do to influence local politics? One step has already been taken — a student has joined the field of candidates for the city commission. Tuesday, Craig Raborn, senior in geography, made it past the primary election. That makes him the first student in more than a decade to be in the general election. The real test, though, will be in the general election April 2. Without student support, Raborn's campaign will be an uphill battle.

I urge every off-campus student (that's 14,000 of you) to stop in the Student Government Services office in the K-State Union before March 18 and either register or transfer your voter registration to Manhattan for this election. It's as simple as writing your name and address, and it can really make a difference. Raborn needs your votes, and you can't vote April 2 if you don't register before you leave for spring break. So make a small sacrifice today; quit agonizing over the crossword puzzle and go register to vote. We will all benefit for it.

Letter uninformed

Editor,

In his highly uninformed letter to the editor of March 1, Kirk Voska writes that he is "sick and tired of listening to those mealy-mouthed peace protesters" who think that the Persian Gulf War is wrong. Voska dwells on the obvious (people die in wars) but provides no new insight on the war. He then offers "a little history lesson for those with extremely short memories" by reminding his readers that Iraq invaded Kuwait. Was anyone disputing this? He does not, however, provide even the most basic chronology of events leading up to the war, such as Saddam Hussein's meeting with the U.S. Ambassador to Kuwait July 25, in which she told him that an Iraqi invasion of Kuwait would be "an inter-Arab conflict" and would not concern the United States. Nor does Voska mention that five days before the Iraqi invasion CIA Director William Webster warned George Bush that an invasion was likely, or that three days later Bush withdrew his investments from Kuwait. Nor does he mention that after the invasion the Bush administration repeatedly issued ultimatums and threats each time it looked like the PLO or the Soviet, Jordanian, Algerian or French governments might negotiate a non-military solution to the conflict.

Voska is quite right to point out the brutal occupation and destruction of Kuwait by Saddam's troops. The readers can draw their own conclusions, but in the light of U.S. indifference and even encouragement prior to Aug. 2, one also has to wonder whether both the "liberation" of Kuwait, which has killed 100,000 Iraqis, and the initial invasion itself could not have been avoided in the first place. None of this concerns Voska, however, since he is too busy calling demonstrators names, as if they were the ones who had started the war.

As for those "mealy-mouthed protesters" who have so annoyed Voska by chalking anti-war messages on the sidewalks, they were perfectly within their rights to do so. As last Thursday's Collegian indicated, there are currently no regulations against writing on sidewalks. In fact, the protesters in question checked this out months ago, and re-checked it after they were harassed by K-State Police, just to make sure.

Finally, if Voska has so many ideas about what is the "right" way to conduct a peace demonstration, perhaps he ought to organize his own.

Views ill-timed

Editor,

Ambrose Bierce once defined a critic as a person who boasts himself hard to please because nobody tries to please him.

I am grossly offended by Brad Seaborn's pseudo-intellectual cynicism. What is the point of his carefully researched death statistics, other than to confirm we all ultimately die from one cause or another? Is he annoyed the same science and technology he uses to disprove the existence of God has made it possible to minimize death in wartime? Does he really believe the "naive populace" regards war as a Super Bowl with bullets, an event we can look forward to provided the casualties are kept to an acceptable minimum on our side?

High technology is a double-edged sword, which may have minimized coalition casualties, but at the same time, reigned death and destruction on thousands of Iraqis. Seaborn apparently found these deaths too insignificant to factor into his cost per thousand.

Gen. George Patton was notorious for spewing out flamboyant garbage, a characteristic Seaborn obviously admires and imitates. It was the good general, not the populace, who loved war and used it to feed his unbridled ego.

Seaborn's factitious, shallow views are, as usual, ill-timed, tunneled and tasteless.

Union celebrates 35th Anniversary

Barracks grows to $23 million facility

ANDREW CAPPS
Collegian Reporter

This week marks the 35th anniversary of the K-State Union. The "living room" of the University will celebrate its 35th birthday with special activities and discounts Friday.

A pictorial display showing each stage of growth in the Union will be set up on the first floor outside the Stateroom March 4-11. Most activities will be Wednesday, including a vocal concert performance by Anna Buckland, copy center supervisor and vocalist. Buckland will perform in the Union Courtyard at noon.

March 4-11 will be filled with discounts on selected days, including reduced-rate copies in the copy center; brownies and birthday cake for 35 cents; 35-cent Willie Mug refills at Union Station; and 35 cents off large juice bar drinks in the Stateroom.

Candy bars and popcorn will be sold for 35 cents at the information counter and the bookstore will have a 35-percent-off sale on selected titles and apparel. Bowling games will be 60 cents in the recreation area.

The date the idea of building a student union first came about was 1938 when students voted to contribute to the construction of a union.

The students voted to impose a student union fee of $5 per semester. The fees began to be imposed in 1941, and construction was to begin soon after.

Legislative bickering, legal challenges, material shortages and high construction costs due to World War II and the Korean conflict caused delays in construction.

In 1947, an army surplus barracks was brought to campus to serve as a temporary student union. It was located on the present site of the faculty parking lot south of the Union.

After 15 years of paying a union construction fee, the new student union opened March 8, 1956.

The Union building consisted of 110,000 square feet and cost $1.65 million, $65,000 of which had been collected from fees paid since 1941.

By 1959, the Union had proved to be so popular that a $900,000 addition was begun. This 40,000-square-foot addition, completed in 1963, increased cafeteria seating, office space, ballroom area and completed the previously unfinished third floor—all with no student fee increase.

In 1968, plans for another addition were approved. The $2.8-million project would increase the building's size by almost two-thirds.

By 1970, Forum Hall, the two-level bookstore, the enclosed area housing Student Governing Association offices, the three-story courtyard, additional dining and meeting rooms and the expanded recreation area were finished.

With this addition, the Union, now at its present area of 263,000 square feet, cost a total of $5.4 million and today has a replacement value of more than $23 million.

"It is a challenge for us to stay up with what the students need," said Lorinda Sultzer, Union promotions and marketing coordinator. "We have grown along with the student's needs; we are here because they are here."

The Union provides outside the classroom education, a place for students to share experiences and relax, and extracurricular activities, Jack Thoman, business manager said.

The addition of the Union Station provides an alternative place for students to gather. The facility provides a non-alcoholic, smoke-free bar with a disc jockey and dance floor.

It is the first facility of its kind among Big Eight schools and one of only six in the nation.

In 1986, the New York Times ranked the K-State Union among the top 10 student unions in the nation.

Student funding addressed by finance administrator

Schellhardt explains K-Staters' role in provision of state budget

CINDY BRIGGS
Collegian Reporter

Competing with noisy passers-by that frequently accompany lunchtime in the Union, Tom Schellhardt, associate vice president for administration and finance, provided a perspective on K-State funding and its relationship with students Tuesday afternoon in the Union Courtyard.

"If this is a reflection of what's going on down at the state Legislature, we are in a world of hurt," he said as he smiled at an audience of no more than 10 people.

Schellhardt was invited to speak by the Union Program Council as part of their Issues and Ideas series.

To explain what each student's tuition buys, Schellhardt broke down the current year state budget of $150 million. He said of the $150 million, $30 million comes from the student's tuition.

Our state Legislature hasn't put higher education where it should be. Higher education is the most important thing and the governor has said that over and over, but where's her party? The democrats have control of the House right now and one of their committees recommended to cut this out.

—Todd Heitschmidt
Student body president

The federal government provides $6.5 million for research and extension, and $1.5 million comes from fees charged by the College of Veterinary Medicine. Kansas he said, provides the remaining $112 million.

"So when we're talking about the state general use budget we're looking at a pot of $150 million, of which $30 million is your tuition dollars, and for the most part the rest is state support," he said.

Schellhardt said since the state this year is having financial problems they are looking at increased revenue primarily from tuition and fees. The Kansas Board of Regents has approved a tuition increase for fiscal year 1992 of three percent for in-state and 10 percent for out-of-state students.

This will generate $2 million for K-State, but Schellhardt said it is still not enough to fund the third year of the Margin of Excellence.

The Legislature on the other hand, because it is searching for extra revenue, has proposed a tuition increase of 10 percent for in-state and 20 percent for out-of-state students, Schellhardt said.

Although only the regents can increase tuition, Schellhardt said the Legislature can decrease state support so an increase by the Board of Regents is necessary to make up the difference.

Schellhardt provided a breakdown of where the money coming into K-State goes.

"For every dollar that comes into the University for University support, 75 cents goes into either instruction or library support."

Of the remaining 25 cents, Schellhardt said 12 cents goes towards utilities as well as the physical plant, and 5 cents supports student services such as the registrar and the admissions office. The rest, he said goes to institutional support, for example the president's office.

As far as how the general base budget breaks down, Schellhardt said the $30 million brought in through student tuition and the revenue brought in from the Veterinary Hospital goes towards instruction and academic support, while the federal government's contribution of $6.5 million goes toward research.

Of the $112 million the state provides, $43.5 million goes into research and extension services and the remaining $68.5 million goes to instruction and library support.

Schellhardt said if the base budget is cut, there will be no third year of the MOE. He said at this stage the Administration is not sure where cuts will be made.

The Legislature will not make its decision on whether or not to cut K-State's budget until the end of April.

Student Body President Todd Heitschmidt, in closing the presentation, said the solution to preventing cuts in higher education is through student vote in state elections.

He said the Student Advisory Committee, which represents students from all six regents schools, has the largest voting block in the state with 80,000 constituents. The problem, he said, is the legislators know students don't vote while their other constituents do.

"Our state Legislature hasn't put higher education where it should be," Heitschmidt said. "Higher education is the most important thing and the governor has said that over and over, but where's her party? The democrats have control of the House right now and one of their committees recommended to cut this out."

He said the recent regents approval of the engineering fee for K-State engineering students may soon be a trend throughout campus.

He said the College of Arts and Sciences is currently considering such a fee. One problem he said he sees with the fee is the revenue created at one time was going back to the state's general base budget.

Therefore, the state could claim it as part of the support they give to K-State, thus allowing them the opportunity to cut back on the amount they currently give. In turn, the students would be paying an indirect tuition increase.

This, however, is no longer the case, he said, and as it stands now the revenue from the fee will come back to the College of Engineering.

Heitschmidt said he would like to see more funding for faculty, an increase in student wages, and 100 percent funding for a graduate teaching assistant fee-waiver. He said he has yet to see this go through the Legislative subcommittees.

"We're hopeful, we're hopeful," Schellhardt said as Heitschmidt finished his speech.

'Cats, Shockers to meet on field

BILL LANG
Sports Reporter

It's mid-term time for the K-State baseball team. The test is against fourth-ranked Wichita State.

The contest, scheduled for 7 tonight at Frank Myers Field, is a game which could answer a lot of questions for Wildcat coach Mike Clark.

"This will let us know where we stand with our team," he said. "It will let us know what we need to work on offensively, defensively and with pitching."

Offensively for the 'Cats — playing in all nine games — Chris Hmielewski is the leading batsman. Hmielewski is currently batting .542 with 13 hits in 24 at bats, two homers and 12 RBIs.

Clark said the offense is solid for this early in the season, but the pitching needs to improve if the Wildcats are going to be a better team.

"We did OK against Colorado State," Clark said of the two-game split with the Rams last Sunday. "But we had some breakdowns with our pitching, and that kind of hurt us. Offensively, we did a good job. We scored nine runs one game and had 16 overall."

Clark said that early in the season one should expect to have some breakdowns with pitching. He said the overall performance was one he was pleased with. "As a staff we're doing pretty good," he said. "We need to work on some mechanics, but we're doing pretty good."

Wichita State, on the other hand, comes in with a perfect record of 9-0 and is considered by most to have one of the better pitching staffs in the country. This is something that has not gone unnoticed by Clark.

"Well, they're ranked fourth in one poll," he said. "Their pitching is one of the best four-man rotations in the country. That's why they're where they are."

"We're talking, these guys will be drafted in the first 10 rounds of the amateur draft in June. I feel that we can do a good job, though. We're a good team and we're getting better. I think we'll be ready for them."

For as much as Clark praised the Shockers, Wichita State coach Gene Stephenson was a little cautious of his team doing so well and coming face-to-face with K-State.

"We're doing all right," he said. "Our pitching is all right, but we're a little short on offense."

"We haven't really played the top quality teams like K-State has. K-State will be one of those teams we have to worry about. They are known for getting out of the blocks fast. And I'm sure they will be ready for us."

Wildcat second baseman Van Torian gobbles up a grounder during baseball practice at Frank Myers Field Tuesday afternoon. This is Torian's first year with the team. Torian and his teammates take on nationally ranked Wichita State at 7 tonight at Frank Myers.

New 2nd baseman adjusting

DAVID SVOBODA
Sports Editor

Those familiar with K-State baseball probably don't need a scorecard to rattle off the Wildcat starting lineup in 1991.

Of the eight position players, seven return from the 1990 squad, and six of the seven logged extensive playing time as starters last season.

The guy playing second base might need a bit of an introduction, however. Wearing No. 20 this season for the Wildcats is a junior transfer from Indian Hills (Iowa) Community College.

His name is Van Torian, and the number he wears was worn proudly for an entire career by a pretty fair defensive second baseman: Frank White, formerly of the Kansas City Royals.

Torian's coach, Mike Clark, said his new second sacker might evoke comparisons with White for good reason.

"He turns the double play quicker than anybody I've seen at second base," Clark said of the product of Kansas City, Mo.'s, Bishop Hogan High School.

That Clark is making that statement right now is saying something, because Torian was an everyday shortstop prior to the transition for the 1991 season.

There was a hurdle in Torian's way at shortstop at K-State in the form of All-America candidate Craig Wilson. So Torian worked hard with K-State assistant Phil Morgan and former Wildcat second baseman and now-coach Jeff Troll to make the transition a smooth one.

"In making the adjustment, I had a lot of help from Coach Morgan and Jeff," Torian said. "And I'm really comfortable there. I've been comfortable for a while now, really."

That comfort zone is one Torian reached quicker than Clark might have anticipated.

"He made the transition probably about as well as any kid I've ever seen," Clark said. "Jeff made the same transition, so he was a big help. But the way Van made the transition was so quick that it really is impressive."

Clark said Troll's input in the transition was invaluable.

"Jeff can relate to some of the problems Van was having early on," Clark said. "And as a result, they worked together really well."

Torian landed at K-State as Troll's replacement as the second baseman after a recruiting process initiated in April 1990. Torian's juno coach, Rick Matthews, is a friend of Clark's, and a strong recommendation from Matthews and another from a Texas Rangers scout opened Clark's eyes.

After three scouting visits, Torian became a Wildcat.

"The first time I watched him, he was a little inconsistent," Clark remembered. "The second time, I was a bit more impressed."

"And by the third time, we had talked to Rick and he said nothing but good things about Van, and we knew then that he was a solid Division I player."

It was Torian's desire to play at a Division I school and in the Big Eight in particular that narrowed his choices to K-State and Nebraska, though national champion Georgia and perennial power Arkansas also showed interest.

"It came down to choosing between going to Nebraska or coming here," Torian said. "And this was close to home and the program is on the rise in the Big Eight."

Torian hopes for a continued rise in those team fortunes and for continuing improvement in his own fortunes as a player. Clark and Torian agree that the only thing separating Torian from an excellent chance at a career in baseball after his days at K-State are done is his bat.

"Nobody works harder than he does at his stroke," Clark said of Torian, who is fifth on the team in hitting through nine games with a .409 average.

Clark said that consistency — in the field and at the plate — will be the true test of Torian's worth.

"Jeff Troll was so consistent game after game after game," Clark said. "That will be the key for Van. If he can be that kind of player, he has a chance to play after he leaves Kansas State. He's got a great future at second base."

Torian likes where he stands at the moment.

"I realize that I'm playing next to one of the best shortstops in the nation now," he said of Wilson. "And I also realize that I need to become a better hitter if I want to play any further, and I do."

"But I don't think coming in here and getting comfortable was really all that tough. It was a challenge to move, and that was difficult, but now we're playing games, and that's what we're here to do."

Sports Briefly

Saberhagen kept out of workout

HAINES CITY, Fla. (AP) — Bret Saberhagen, a two-time American League Cy Young Award winner, was kept out of the Kansas City Royals' workout Tuesday with back spasms.

Saberhagen was scheduled to start the Royals' exhibition opener Friday against Cincinnati, but now he will not pitch until March 12.

"It's just a matter of letting it rest a little bit and calm down," Saberhagen said. Tom Gordon will start in Saberhagen's place against the Reds. Luis Aquino and Jeff Montgomery are also scheduled to throw against Cincinnati.

Utility infielder Bill Pecota injured his left big toe Tuesday when he fouled a Mark Gubicza pitch off of it in batting practice. X-rays were negative, but trainer Nick Swartz said a hole was drilled through Pecota's toe nail to drain the blood.

And rookie pitcher Carlos Maldonado, who made four relief pitches for the Royals at the end of last season, agreed to a one-year contract.

Emporia State wins District 10

EMPORIA (AP) — Andy Uphoff and Sean Robbins combined for 57 points Tuesday night lifting Emporia State to the NAIA District 10 championship with a 109-89 victory over Fort Hays State.

The Hornets (18-13 overall) led 52-37 at halftime after shooting 12 of 28 (64 percent) from the field. The Hornets shot 65 percent for the game.

Uphoff scored 29 points by going 9 of 14 from the field and 11 of 13 from the free throw line, while Robbins had 28 points after shooting 10 of 11 from the floor and 5 of 6 from the line.

James McCallop notched 16 points, Eddie Williams added 14 and Howard Bonser 13 for the Hornets.

The Tigers (18-12) were led by Damian Evans with 22 points and Mark Willey with 19. Also scoring in double figures for the Tigers were Jay Sawyer with 15 points and Jerome Carson adding 14.

O'Neal may miss NCAA

BATON ROUGE, La. (AP) — What looked to be a promising postseason for LSU now hinges on the fractured leg of Shaquille O'Neal.

O'Neal, the nation's leading rebounder, is out of this week's Southeastern Conference tournament and could even miss the NCAA tournament if the injury fails to heal in time.

"The doctors feel it's a situation that will have to be re-evaluated next week," LSU assistant coach Craig Carse said Tuesday. "He's walking on it, but it will be a while before he can run and do the other things. The feeling is that this time next week, they will re-evaluate again, and we believe it will be fine."

"We feel real good about the NCAA."

Coach Dale Brown was unavailable for comment Tuesday, but said earlier, "If he has not healed 100 percent by NCAA tournament time, he will not play."

The 7-foot-1 center, the SEC's player of the year who averages 28 points, 14.5 rebounds and 5.1 blocked shots per game, suffered a hairline fracture of his left leg during LSU's game Feb. 27 against Florida.

Conference coaches ready for tourney

By the Associated Press

KANSAS CITY, Mo. — Iowa State meets Missouri Friday in the first round of the Big Eight Tournament, but is that right?

Iowa State coach Johnny Orr isn't sure it is. Missouri is on NCAA probation and barred from the NCAA Tournament, and the winner of the Big Eight Tournament gets the Big Eight's automatic bid to the NCAA.

If Missouri wins, the Big Eight loses its automatic bid. That still would probably not keep the Big Eight's top three teams — Nebraska, Kansas and Oklahoma State — from getting an at-large bid. But Orr points out Kentucky, also on probation and barred from the NCAA Tournament, is not being allowed to compete in the Southeastern Conference Tournament.

"I don't see that in our league," Orr said. "I guess that's too far to think ahead for us."

One of the co-winners of the 1990-91 Big Eight championship seems decidedly more disappointed than the other.

"We're thrilled. We're very excited," Oklahoma State coach Eddie Sutton said.

But Kansas, which lost at Nebraska Sunday and blew its chance for the outright title, plays a different tune.

The title, said coach Roy Williams, "means a lot to our players."

But an outright championship would have meant more.

"Sunday's game put a little damper on our enthusiasm," Williams added.

Sutton's Oklahoma State team lost by one point Saturday at Iowa State, leaving a clear path to the title for the Jayhawks.

"The night before when they found out Oklahoma State had lost and we were assured at least of being co-champs, they were excited," Williams said of his players. "But losing Sunday dampened that. It did for me, too. But when I look back after the season, I will be very proud of what these kids have accomplished."

Kansas and Oklahoma State each finished 21-6 overall and 10-4 in the Big Eight, the first champions with four conference losses since Missouri in 1980-81. Sutton, who played for Henry Iba during the glory days of Oklahoma State basketball, coached the Cowboys in his first year to their first league title since 1965.

"We came in here a year ago, and we weren't sure how quickly we could elevate this program back to the level we'd like to see it," Sutton said. "It's happened quicker than most people thought."

There were no titles for Colorado. But the Buffs are resurgent in every sense and Joe Harrington, with a 15-12 mark, is the winningest first-year coach in Colorado history.

"We haven't fallen short of my expectations," Harrington said. "What I expected was we would have a winning record, not end up in the cellar, and change the attitude of Colorado basketball. I think we've done that. I think we've taken a giant step forward in a lot of areas. I'm not at all disappointed in what's gone on this year."

Familiar 'Play Ball' chant heralds start of season

Bill Lang

Sports Reporter

Are you sitting at home and you just don't know what to do? Well, take heed, spring-time sports junkies. You know what's right around the corner, don't you?

It's time to ... PLAY BALL! Spring training started this past week in major league baseball, and this year should prove to be an interesting one. Believe me, I am a baseball junkie. I'd still rather go to a game in the middle of May than have a date with say ... Kim Basinger or Elle McPherson.

To start with, what the hell is Jim Palmer doing attempting a comeback? For those of you who don't remember him, let me rattle your brains.

He pitched for the Baltimore Orioles from 1971 to 1985. He was inducted into the Major League Baseball Hall of Fame in the summer of 1990 and somewhere in between, he managed to pose for "Jockey" underwear. Now you remember him, don't you?

Ken Griffey Sr., another of those

Grecian Formula players will be playing a little bit of outfield and a little bit of first base for the Seattle Mariners if he's able to recover from injuries sustained in a recent automobile crash.

He'll also have some parental duties as his son, Ken Griffey Jr., roams the outfield for the same team and attempts to become the second coming of Willie Mays.

An aging backstop is still around. Bob Boone will be joining the Mariners. Maybe the trainer should invest in some Geritol. Boone will be joining in the father-son baseball team. He will be joining his son Bret. Maybe the Mariners should think about having a father-son baseball camp and see if they could fill the roster with the talented ones.

But why are these guys still hanging around? Well, for one reason — and it's the main one — that stands above all the others. It's money.

The average salary — this includes the guys who ride the pine — is $600,000. Not bad for maybe, say, 81 days — out of 162 — at the office. That would come out to about $7,400 for those 81 days.

Somebody like Nolan Ryan might have a reason for staying around. He can — and will — contribute to a young team. He still can fire the ball around the 95-mph range. Not bad for a 42-year-old arm.

Granted, some provide guidance, and leadership helps direct young teams to greatness.

But baseball is a way of life for these guys, and it's tough to leave it. So for the most part, these aging veteran superstars just hang around for the extra paycheck and the cheers.

It's time Major League Baseball gave up this fiasco. Some have gone through so many operations that sometime soon they should be naming the All-Star Scar Squad.

Why not take a chance on a Double A or Triple A player and see what he can do? Dave Justice, of the Atlanta Braves, is a prime example.

He came in and replaced an aging All-Star in Dale Murphy. Justice responded with a phenomenal season and will be the main cog of the Braves' offense this season — all that for a salary of $300,000.

It's time to bring in the youth movement for the bargain price. Let's get these geezers out of baseball — unless they show they can contribute. I'm not going to argue with Nolan Ryan's fastball.

This would bring some excitement to the game and turn it into the game it was meant to be — and not the pocket-filler it has turned into for the players.

Student collects albums for years

ERIN BURKE

Collegian Reporter

Shadow Stevens right here in Manhattan? No, it's Ed Leboeuf, obsessed record collector and junior in pre-law.

Leboeuf said he was 14 when he began collecting records, most of which were on the Top 100 chart. He continued collecting singles and albums until about 1988.

"I thought it would be neat to have this really big record collection," Leboeuf said.

Although he had no favorite artists, Leboeuf said he collected Prince, Michael Jackson and Elton John the most. Other than those, he would just collect records he liked.

Whenever he heard a new song on the radio, he would head straight for Reflections, a record store a block from his house in Arizona.

"They knew me down there," Leboeuf said.

If the record wasn't in, he would wait for the delivery truck at the record store, Leboeuf said. His record collection became an addiction.

The record collection surpassed big and went to huge as it totaled about 2,500 records, Leboeuf said.

He could play every record front and back, without repeating a song for 65 days, he said.

In 1988, this story of an obsessed record collector came to a close. Leboeuf said he began to realize there was more to life than a large record collection.

"I could have gone to college on the money I've spent on records," Leboeuf said.

He said he didn't come to this realization until after he figured out the hundreds and thousands of dollars he had spent on something so impractical as records.

Leboeuf sold the records for 25 cents each at a flea market in Abilene, he said. He made about $300, which helped pay for his first semester at K-State.

"I kept about 500 records that I really liked," Leboeuf said. He said he still gets the intrinsic value when he listens to the music.

Senior citizens experience college

Program provides opportunity for elderly to attend college classes, live on campus

LORI STAUFFER
Staff Reporter

Senior citizens all over the country each summer have the opportunity to go to college.

Through the Elderhostel program, anyone more than 60 years of age can attend classes, live in residence halls and experience college life again, said Pam Evans, area coordinator of the program.

"People have come from all over the country to attend these sessions," she said. "Last year, there were some from New Jersey, Colorado, California, Florida and Texas. And, we've had some from western Kansas attend. They come to get the experience of college and they come to learn something new."

The Elderhostel program has been offered at K-State since 1980. The international program has its base in Boston, and is offered in the United States and Canada, as well as in many countries overseas, Evans said.

Students will be offered six non-credit courses in two one-week sessions. Evans said there will be no homework and no tests.

Course content must be college-level that would be available for undergraduate credit. Evans said the only regulation institutions must meet is the courses are not to be related to aging. Otherwise, she said, the classes offered are up to the individual institutions.

"We take into consideration which instructors are available and what would be of interest to that age group," she said.

Evans said 98 percent of the classes taught across the country are taught by university professors and many of the instructors come back to teach year after year.

Gus Van Der Hoeven, professor of horticulture, will be instructing a class in landscape design for the third year.

"As an extension specialist, I am able to reach out to people and touch their lives," he said. "Elderhostel allows me to seize the opportunity to reach outside of the state. It is a challenge to teach them something useful and represent the state and the university."

Van Der Hoeven said he prefers being called a catalyst rather than a teacher because he wants encourage people to learn about the industry and take that knowledge into changing their own environment.

"I want to be able to teach them how to take a dull home landscape and turn it into something unique they can enjoy," he said. "It is difficult to do it in four classes at two and a half hours a day but at least I can make them sensitive to the industry."

K-State will offer two sessions in the program. The first will be May 26 through June 1, the second will be June 2-8.

In the first session, the class Too Many Pests vs. Too Much Pesticide will look at pest management and provide alternatives to pesticides.

The second course, Dreams — What Do They Mean, will examine the significance of dreams in everyday society, applications of dream interpretation and how different cultures view dreams.

The third class offered in the first session will be an art class, Everyone Can Draw, where students will learn 20 specific techniques in drawing and how to communicate in art what they see.

The second session will offer courses like the Golden Days of Radio, where the students will listen to radio programs from the 1930s and 1940s, including news programs and radio soaps.

Students will be able to examine their personality types and study the nine ways of viewing reality in the course Enneagram — a Window on the Self.

The final course offered is Enhancing Living Environments through Landscape Design taught by Van Der Hoeven.

Student monies could fund additions for Farrell Library

ANNE TATUM
Collegian Reporter

If a private donor who will make a substantial contribution to the Farrell Library addition can't be found, the K-State student body may be asked to help.

Student Body President Todd Heitschmidt said there has been some talk about putting student monies into the project.

"We have (the students) to pick up where the alumni and state fall behind," he said.

Heitschmidt said the administration would like between $2 and $5 million from a private donor. He said he wasn't aware of any alumni coming forward with this sum.

Dean of Libraries Brice Hobrock said there are no current plans to approach the Student Governing Association for a portion of the money needed for the addition.

"I'm not aware that we are asking (SGA) at the present time," he said. "We have to have a private donor first."

Hobrock said a study done by the Kansas Board of Regents and President Jon Wefald on the addition has been completed. The next task is to locate the money to fund the project.

"We will look at getting funds from a private donor, the students and the state," he said.

To find the extent of student commitment to the Farrell addition, SGA will conduct a random telephone survey of the student body within a week, Heitschmidt said.

One of the questions from the survey reads as follows: "A library expansion costing $28 million has been proposed. Do you approve or disapprove of the suggestion that students share in the total cost (along with the state and alumni)?"

The survey then asks how much the student feels the student body should contribute. Choices range from 1-percent share of $280,000 to 15-percent share of $4.2 million.

"It's an academic priority and not committed by the students," Heitschmidt said. "It may go to election if the money doesn't come from alumni and the state."

Heitschmidt said he hopes to get this project underway while he is still in office. He said locating a private donor was vital.

"It would be the best of all worlds to get started right away," he said.

Conference focuses on funding; perseverance key to research

JENNIE DILLON
Collegian Reporter

Federal funding for research projects was the topic of a conference Monday and Tuesday at the K-State Union.

"Research Horizons: Trends in the Social and Behavioral Sciences" focused on current trends in the research field and ways to prepare and acquire federal grants.

Speakers included Rep. Jim Slattery, R-Kan., and Howard Silver, Executive Director of the Consortium of Social Science Associations.

"We've dealt with everything from program priorities of funding agencies ... to nitty-gritty stuff about how to prepare a proposal," Robert Lowman, associate vice-provost for research said.

General and panel discussions with funding group representatives, were included in the conference. College faculty and administrators from a 12-state area attended.

"There was some discussion about how to go about writing an application," said Ronald Abeles of the National Institute on Aging. "Usually, people are sending in something that is for a particular project."

Abeles, who deals with the Behavioral and Social Research Program, said a good idea must be expressed clearly.

"You have to be able to show how your idea fits into the big picture."

About 20 to 25 percent of the applications submitted are accepted. The process of gaining federal grants takes about six to nine months, Abeles said.

"For aging, it's a growth industry," he said. "The budget (for aging) has gone up tremendously, about 75 percent over the last five years."

Although funding is tighter than it has been in the past, growth in aging research is climbing. Most of the growth concerns Alzheimer's disease, which causes some 150,000 deaths per year.

"The United States is a very rich place in terms of support for research," Abeles said. "The key is not to give up."

Graduating seniors will miss unique work at Bramlage

JEFF STURDY
Collegian Reporter

Many of the student supervisors who work at Bramlage Coliseum will be leaving after this semester.

"We are very sorry to see them go," said Jim Muller, assistant director of Bramlage. "We're proud of every one of these kids, they have made the program what it is today."

Muller said all the supervisors have been there since the facility opened three years ago and have worked their way up.

"They really care about the program and would like to see it continue," Muller said.

Muller said supervisors have a lot of responsibilities. They hire employees, make work schedules and supervise activities.

Bob Basset, graduate student in veterinary medicine, works as a security supervisor.

"I started as a security person when Bramlage opened," Basset said. "I have been a supervisor for about two years now."

Basset said there is a lot of responsibility involved with being a supervisor. He is in charge of scheduling security persons to work, where to station them in the building, checking them in and out of work and many other subtle duties.

"For basketball games, we have people stationed at all the back doors, locker rooms and also around the floor," Basset said. "Our main concern is to protect the players, coaches and referees, as well as maintain order in the stands."

For most men's basketball games, Basset is in charge of 15-18 student security people. For the Bad Company concert, there were 60 student security people, and 80 for the Motley Crue concert last year.

"It's a fun, but challenging position," Basset said. "I get to see some exciting events."

Carol Dewese, graduate student in nuclear engineering, has worked at Bramlage since it opened and is currently an usher supervisor.

"I have not had any big problems, but I have carried chickens out the last few years when we play KU, which was an experience," Dewese said.

"For concerts, we really have tight crowd control at the beginning of the concert, things then usually stay under control," she said.

"It's a place where we try to do a good job and have fun. It's more than a job. It really becomes part of your life. It's like family. The management is really great to work with."

Greg Skaggs, senior in milling science, is also an usher supervisor.

Skaggs said he has gained valuable experience in dealing with people.

"It's been an interesting experience building up a new program," Skaggs said. "The people are good to work for."

Muller said that Beth Boyle, senior in psychology, and Leigha Bailey, graduate student in English, are also usher supervisors who have done an outstanding job and will be missed.

Stores offer computer buyers advice

LAURA BIRRELL
Collegian Reporter

Many students buy computers, thinking they will make life much easier, but do not know how to care for them or what to do when something goes wrong.

Tom Maier, computer buyer and head of the computer department in the K-State Union Bookstore, said computer dealers should support the machines they sell and help new owners with any questions they have. The Union Bookstore provides these services.

"If you have problems after buying the computer, we will go to your house, for no charge, and help you," he said. "We will also go to your home and help you set up your computer. When you buy a computer and more than three or four things go wrong with it, the company will usually replace the computer."

Charles Hattrup, service manager of Midwest Appliance, said people should take simple precautions to protect computers.

"One of the things people should watch for in care of the computer is static electricity," he said. "You should ground yourself before touching your computer, and keep foreign things out of your keyboard."

Robert Satterlee, Connecting Point Computer Center service manager, offered other helpful hints for computer maintenance.

"You should keep your computer in a room with average temperature," he said. "Dust covers help keep dust out of your computer."

Another dust cover for your keyboard, called a keyboard skin, is helpful if you spill pop or coffee while working on the computer, he said. Keyboard skins allow you to type, but keep liquid out of the keyboard.

Computer owners should also clean their printers and invest in dust covers for printers, Satterlee said.

"Dust from paper and the round holes from the paper tracking can mess up your printer," he said. "You may want to bring your printer in for a professional cleaning once in a while."

"You can also check your hardware with a diagnostic program," Satterlee said. "Hardware management is very important. If you get a disc that speeds your hard-drive up, it will save wear and tear on your hard-drive."

He said it is important to buy a surge protector to guard against sudden surges of electricity and lighting strikes. It is important to get one that is UL tested and has a warranty covering appliances it is to protect.

Satterlee said if your computer is telling you something is wrong, pay attention to it.

"If your screen comes up with an odd warning code, do not play with the machine or use it," he said. "One problem can lead to another, so it is important to get professional help."

KSDB supports Heritage month

DJs play Native American music

STACY HILBURN
Collegian Reporter

To support and increase awareness about Native American Heritage Month, KSDB-FM will be playing Native American music throughout the month of March.

Bruce Arvizu, sophomore in fine arts, is a member of the planning committee for the month. He originated the idea for the music and will be playing it himself, since he is also a disc jockey for the station.

Arvizu said the music will be diverse — the songs will range from traditional to rock. The majority of the traditional songs will be flute-oriented, but there will also be some drumming and chants.

Thurman Williams, sophomore in mechanical engineering and student co-chairman of NAHM, said the music is not that different from what most students already listen to.

"My friends really like the rock music," Williams said, "but there are mixed feelings about the traditional."

Jim Johnson, senior in journalism and music director for the station, said students will probably appreciate the music. Even if it's not something they are used to, students are open-minded, Johnson said.

Arvizu and Williams said the flute music is soothing.

"You can chill-out and relax to it," Arvizu said.

The music will be provided by the station and its employees. Johnson said he has 30 albums of his own that can be used.

Cheryl May, head of news services and faculty-staff co-chairman of NAHM, said any new experience is educational.

KG&E, KPL await approval

Merger could reduce rates, eliminate duplicate facilities

JIM STRUBER
Consumer Reporter

The shareholders of the Kansas Power and Light Co. and Kansas Gas and Electric Co. will decide at special meetings in Topeka and Wichita on March 19 whether to merge the two companies.

Lyle Koerper, manager of corporate communications at KG&E, said the shareholders of both companies have been mailed their proxy statements, and KG&E is urging its shareholders to approve the merger.

"There are good reasons to approve this; note the rate reductions," Koerper said.

John Hayes Jr., KPL chairman of the board, president, and chief executive officer, has stated in a KPL news release the KPL-KG&E merger will achieve at least $140 million in cost savings in the first five years.

"These savings will more than cover the cost of the merger, as well as the proposed $15-million rate reduction for KG&E customers," Hayes said.

Richard Kready, director of investor relations at KPL, said if the merger is approved, KG&E will be a wholly owned subsidiary of KPL. He said there would be an immediate rate reduction for KPL customers if the merger is approved, because there would be reductions in expenses.

"If there isn't a rate reduction, rates will certainly remain steady for the foreseeable (future)," Kready said.

According to the release, internal studies produced by the two utility companies conclude that the KPL-KG&E merger will result in cost savings and, therefore, create benefits to Kansas utility customers in a variety of ways. Among the savings that will be achieved are the following:

■ The merged companies will save about $76 million through normal attrition of duplicate personnel functions, such as meter reading, billing and customer service.

■ Combined operations of electric generation, such as consolidated fuel, maintenance and central dispatching services, will account for about $33 million in cost savings.

■ The merged companies will save about $5 million by eliminating duplicate facilities, such as offices and warehouses.

■ The merged companies will save about $4.5 million by eliminating duplicate vehicles. A single service vehicle can be used for combined gas and electric operations.

■ Other reduced overheads include such things as saving about $639,000 in audit fees; $2.7 million in risk-management insurance costs; and $10.7 million through inventory consolidation — during the first five years.

"This merger won't happen overnight," Kready said.

Stephen Dukas, assistant professor of finance, said public utilities are considered natural monopolies because of economies of scale. Monopolies are the most efficient form of public utility operation, but regulation is important.

"As long as the regulators ensure management acts in the public welfare, I don't see any difficulty," he said. "They are limited to a normal profit defined by government."

Dukas said one of many theories concerning mergers is that the value of the combined company is more than the two separate companies.

"Apart from a more detailed analysis of the companies, I can't speculate on the accuracy of their claims," he said. "It seems to be consistent with efficiency theories for corporate mergers. This is apparently what these people are arguing."

Arts endowment helps pay for architectural conference

DARLA GOODMAN
Collegian Reporter

A $45,000 grant from the National Endowment for the Arts is helping the K-State chapter of the American Society of Landscape Architects organize the 1991 LABASH conference March 7-10.

The grant made it possible for conference planners to bring powerful national and international speakers to K-State, arrange for 10 hours of satellite TV coverage, produce a film on the prairie and arrange a tour of the prairie for visiting students, said Tony Barnes, professor of landscape architecture.

"Remember the Future: Orchestrating Our Resources of Knowledge to Design the Sustainable Landscape" is the theme for the conference, which is bringing about 250 students to campus from across the United States and Canada, not counting the K-State students, said Doug Pickert, senior in landscape architecture.

Tony Pagel, senior in landscape architecture, said the planning for the conference began about a year and a half ago, when K-State's proposal for hosting the conference was accepted.

Since then, about six committees have been working to put the conference together. As the event approaches, about 100 members of the department have become involved in one way or another, said Scott Fears, senior in architecture.

Pagel said he worked with Bert Biles, program development officer in the office of research and sponsored programs, to develop the idea for the grant, which is the largest to be awarded in Kansas this year and one of the largest ever awarded by the design arts division of the NEA.

"He gave us the idea that we had a pretty good product to sell with the environmental conference," Pagel said.

"The notion of making a student conference available nationally, live via satellite—I thought would be a sure winner, and it is," Biles said. "It's really a fantastic opportunity for K-State to showcase the college of architecture."

Pickert said many of the conference speakers and workshops will focus on the principle designers who try to maintain land stewardship. This means designers should create plans that fit with the land and can support themselves in the future without unnatural maintenance.

"This requires fields of knowledge beyond our own," Pickert said.

Landscape architects call on experts in many fields, such as biology and agriculture, to tell them how to best do this, he said.

The idea behind the film is to dispel some of the myths about the prairie—that it is flat and boring. A lot of people around the country don't realize that the prairie is an important ecosystem and worth preserving.

—Mike Hoch
Senior in landscape architecture

Fears said two of the conference speakers will be open to the public. Wes Jackson of the Land Institute in Salina will speak about sustainable agriculture that takes less resources to maintain. He will present his speech, "People, Land and Community: The Movement from an Extractive to a Renewable Economy," at 10:05 a.m. Friday in McCain Auditorium.

J. Baird Callicott will present "The Land Ethic" on the writings of Aldo Leopold at 2:45 p.m. Saturday in McCain Auditorium.

Other topics include the establishment of a visitors education center in the only rain forest owned by the United States, ways landscape architects can communicate with small communities and help preserve their heritage.

Another topic will be the Biosphere II project near Tucson, Ariz., which is an experimental 3-acre greenhouse that houses more than 2,500 plants and animals and eight people who have no contact with the outside world. The project is totally self-sufficient and recyclable.

The satellite coverage of the conference will be from 10 a.m.-3 p.m. Friday and from 11 a.m.-4 p.m. Saturday. There is no charge to tune in to the telecast, Pickert said. However, the equipment to receive the satellite broadcast is usually only available at universities.

He said there are also plans to make videotapes of the speakers that will be sold at cost after the conference.

For the conference, Mike Hoch, senior in landscape architecture, has been working on a 20-minute film showing the diversity of the prairie.

The video, titled "Prairie Mosaic: The Kansas Flint Hills," will be shown at 12:30 p.m. Friday in the Union Big Eight Room.

"The idea behind the film is to dispel some of the myths about the prairie—that it is flat and boring," Hoch said. "A lot of people around the country don't realize that the prairie is an important ecosystem and worth preserving."

The conference will also include a job fair with company displays and interview possibilities and fun activities, such as a banquet, a "moose hunt" for prizes and Aggieville entertainment.

Fears, who is the coordinator for the conference, said he has learned a lot about how to pull people together to accomplish a big project.

"The coordination of people and activities and making sure things get done at the time we need them done has been a tough job," he said.

K-State was the host of the conference in 1979, Fears said. The first conference was first held 21 years ago in Guelph, Ontario.

David Campbell, senior in landscape architecture and president of ASLA, had heard that the 1979 conference was a big success.

"I'd been told that it kind of set the trend, and that's what we were trying to do: set the trend for the next decade," he said.

Now you can afford to dream in color.

If you thought that finding a color Macintosh® system you could afford was just a dream, then the new, affordable Macintosh LC is a dream come true.

The Macintosh LC is rich in color. Unlike many computers that can display only 16 colors at once, the Macintosh LC expands your palette to 256 colors. It also comes with a microphone and new sound-input technology that lets you personalize your work by adding voice or other sounds.

Like every Macintosh computer, the LC is easy to set up and easy to master. And it runs thousands of available applications that all work in the same, consistent way—so once you've learned one program, you're well on your way to learning them all. The Macintosh LC even lets you share information with someone who uses a different type of computer—thanks to the versatile Apple® SuperDrive™, which can read from and write to Macintosh, MS-DOS, OS/2, and Apple II floppy disks.

Take a look at the Macintosh LC and see what it gives you. Then pinch yourself.

It's better than a dream—it's a Macintosh.

Apple introduces the Macintosh LC.

Sorority provides funds for families

ADPis support McDonald House

BETSY HIDALGO
Collegian Reporter

The Alpha Delta Pis and the Topeka Ronald McDonald House work to provide a home away from home for families with children who are ill or injured.

"We raise money to help support the Ronald McDonald House in Topeka because it is important to provide homes for children and families while a loved one is in the hospital," said Kelly Bramble, philanthropy chairperson for ADPi and a sophomore in industrial engineering.

The house is better than hotels or motels in several ways, said Beth Fager, member of the board of directors for the Topeka Ronald McDonald House.

The house consists of eight bedrooms and eight families can stay comfortably. There is a family living area, kitchen, dining room and two sets of kitchen supplies, so two families can prepare dinner at the same time.

There is donated food, as well as storage for food the families bring. Each family has a mailbox and a storage room.

Also, each family is responsible for one daily task while staying at the house.

"The daily task is good and so is the home-like atmosphere because this helps the family become more relaxed during this sometimes difficult time," she said.

The cost to stay at the Topeka house is $8 per night, but families are not turned away if they are unable to pay. The family pays what they can, Fager said.

"Weekends are normally full because people from out of town stay here so they can visit their children in neighboring hospitals who are in for long-term treatment," Fager said.

The Topeka house serves all of the hospitals in Topeka including the Menninger Children's Hospital, Kansas Neurological Institute, Stormont-Vail and Saint Francis, she said.

There are 135 Ronald McDonald houses countrywide. People in a community have to initiate the idea of building a house. An interest group is formed on the basis of need in the community. A needs survey is completed by the group and is sent to the national headquarters to be evaluated.

"Manhattan probably won't get a Ronald McDonald house because people do not travel across the nation to come to its hospitals," Bramble said.

Members of the community, owners and operators of the McDonald's restaurants in the area, and community representatives from the hospitals make up the board of directors.

"The franchises of the McDonald's are very involved," Fager said. "McDonald's contributes some money, but the service has to be community supported."

The ADPi annual softball tournament is a fund-raiser for the Ronald McDonald house in Topeka. Contributions go directly to the house in Topeka.

"The money that the girls raise is greatly appreciated because national headquarters does not give us money, it all has to be donated or raised through fund-raisers," Fager said. "The money donated by the ADPi's went to the renovating and furnishing of the house. Last year, we put the money in the operating account."

Students tutor area children

ARLOAH FAIRCHILD
Collegian Reporter

Helping students help themselves is what Youth Education Service Tutoring Project is trying to accomplish with its latest project.

This project sends K-State students to area schools to tutor children who are having problems in classes.

"The program was started last year by the Kansas Board of Regents to fulfill the needs of some students and provide some funds for college students," said Gail Edson, student coordinator for YES. "It has been very successful and expanded into four towns around the area."

"We have tutoring in Manhattan, Oenega, Topeka and Junction City. And the students that travel to other towns receive a travel bonus.

"All tutoring is done at the school and usually during school hours," Edson said. "The tutor is in a classroom area with a teacher present or available for help."

She said K-State currently has 12 student tutors, but they are still looking for more.

"The YES program requires that the tutors be a full time student at K-State and have a 3.0 GPA, although the GPA is flexible," Edson said. "I won't automatically not hire them if they don't have a 3.0 GPA."

She said the student tutors aren't all education majors.

"We have had students who are majoring in marketing, electrical engineering and social work as tutors," Edson said.

Michelle Dutton, junior in marketing, said, "I decided to be a YES tutor because I came from a family of educators and learned the importance of education. I wanted to help the students who don't get the special help because the teachers are busy."

"I didn't expect the students to accept me at first or want me to be there but they were very open to me from the start."

Dutton said French Middle School, where she tutors, has an unfinished-homework box and she helps the students finish the work that is in the box.

"Most of the time the students just need to be motivated to do the homework," Dutton said.

Carolyn Farris, sophomore in elementary education, works at the Manhattan Middle School.

"I like working with that age of kids," Farris said. "I wasn't too sure at first, because I had never tutored students middle-school age before, and I didn't know for sure what they were studying."

"One experience that was new for me was being called 'babe' by 10-year-olds. It kind of threw me when one of the students hollered, 'Yo, babe! I need some help.'"

"I tutor during a study hall time so I face all types of subjects each time, and I like that," Farris said.

Farris said the tutoring experience has helped her decide what age children she'd like to teach later in life.

"It's been a great experience," she said.

Ballard's

not affect K-State's relationship with the local business.

"We're hopeful that the relationships we have established with Ballard's will move ahead," he said. "We do not want to take any action at this time."

K-State, Fairman said, did not have contract licensing with the Collegiate Licensing Company until seven years ago. At that time, the University did not require certain businesses, which had prior arrangements with K-State, to follow many of the guidelines set by the licensing company.

K-State, in lieu of the license, worked with the company to guarantee quality of products.

Fairman said the licensing of Ballard's Sporting Goods to sell K-State products will improve the trust between the two.

"It will take away the doubt," he said. "In the long range, the licensing will strengthen the relationship with Ballard's."

Fairman said the percentage now received from license arrangement is used for student scholarships.

Barbo

"I don't remember choosing to be heterosexual. Tim did not choose to be a homosexual," Barbo said. "Who would choose to have your religion call you sinful, the law call you illegal?" Barbo said.

She said homosexuals do not choose to have their parents stop calling them — although this often happens.

When Barbo addresses any group, whether medical, religious, community, social/support, education or corporate, she stresses that homosexuals come from families and are human beings who love and are loved.

"Gays are a part of everyday living. There is nothing very exciting or unusual about them," Barbo said. "They are just the ordinary couple next door except they happen to be homosexual."

"I knew very early that Tim was going to have a problem with his sexuality. He was just simply different. I don't like to stereotype because many gay men are masculine, and many lesbians are feminine. However, this was the case for Tim," Barbo said.

Tim's best friends were girls, she said. He liked to play with dolls and she would stick a GI Joe doll in with his toys to make it look better. She said she felt it was important to create the appropriate male image early in life.

"Wherever our family lived, we were pillars of the church. We certainly looked like we had it all together," Barbo said. "Tim never fit in; he never belonged. He was never fully accepted, and he never found a place for himself."

"Meaningless relationships soon were very tiring for Tim, and he got tired of life in the fast lane," she said. "He started praying for a Christian partner, someone that he could spend his life with. I truly believe that God allowed Tim and Tom to find each other."

"Some people cannot put Christianity and homosexuality in the same sentence because they think of homosexuality only in the terms of sex and lust — never love, caring and commitment," Barbo said.

"As parents of a homosexual we felt guilty, but in reality Tim was a call to accept and love," she said. "Sometimes we did not accept him but we never failed to love him."

Records

Prince albums were favorites he kept. They might be collectors items someday, Leboeuf said.

The majority of his collection were singles, and Leboeuf said he thinks he got out of the music business at the right time because by the summer of 1988, singles began to die out.

Jenna Johnston, Musicland employee, said their store stopped carrying singles completely around Christmas of 1989. It was the decision of the record companies, not the stores who carried the singles, she said.

Leboeuf said he doesn't have any of his records at his apartment because he doesn't have a record player, but he listens to them sometimes when he goes home.

"Each one has some personal value," Leboeuf said.

Student Senate to review raise

Rec Services requests $3 fee increase

CINDY BRIGGS
Collegian Reporter

Recreational Services asked the Student Senate Finance Committee Sunday night for a $3 activity fee increase effective fall of 1991.

Senate policy requires Rec Services come before the committee for fee review only once every three years, said Finance Committee Chairman Craig Uhrich, senior in nuclear engineering.

He said once the bill goes to Senate, and if Senate votes in favor of it, it will go to the Kansas Board of Regents for the final decision.

"Right now, there are two separate $3 fees, and what they are wanting to do is combine the two fees and increase it to $9," Uhrich said.

Raydon Robel, director of recreational services, said they are requesting the additional $3 so they can bring the facility into the 1990s. The additional revenue from the fee increase will go toward rising operational costs that have occurred through repairing and replacing equipment.

It will also support staff salaries and increased wages because of the new minimum-wage requirements that take effect the end of April.

At the present time, the fee increase will not be used to expand Rec Services because of a lack of space available for expansion, Robel said.

Currently, K-State students pay a $3 Rec Services line item from their student activity fee, along with a $3 operational fee, which began when the complex opened.

Robel said although they are separate fees, they are put into one operational budget. By combining the two current fees along with the increase, Robel said students will have a clearer idea on the total amount they are paying for the services.

Uhrich said the Finance Committee sent a bill to the Senate Executive Board Monday approving an increase, but the board sent it back to committee for revisions.

"The bill my committee sent to exec approved a $3 increase and suggested we give them an extra dollar if they would take over Sports Club Council," Uhrich said.

Presently, Sports Club Council is under the supervision of the Student Senate and must come before the Senate for funding and special allocations. Uhrich said Rec Services has a better understanding of the needs of Sports Club Council and would be more accommodating to them than Senate.

Robel said he didn't agree entirely with the Finance Committee bill. He said there is a lot that much Rec Services needs to look into before they take on this added responsibility.

"We reviewed it in Rec Services Council last night," he said. "It is our concern that if Rec Services decides to take over Sports Club, then we need to view the Sports Club setup as far as funding, staffing, rules and policies. Our recommendation was that a committee be formed next year to look into it."

Faculty salaries rank lowest

K-State at bottom of Big Eight, land-grant universities

WADE RAMSEY
Collegian Reporter

K-State faculty salaries rank low when compared to other Big Eight and land-grant universities.

K-State ranks last among Big Eight institutions and 41st among the nation's 50 land-grant universities, according to a report prepared for the Faculty Senate. K-State has ranked eighth among Big Eight schools for the past five years.

"This report confirms what we've been saying for the last year and a half," said President Jon Wefald. "We are in a very precarious situation."

The annual salary status report cites two concerns. First, salaries are far from competitive; and second, salaries for new faculty are rising rapidly, making new faculty salaries close to the level of faculty members that have been at K-State for 10 or more years.

The result is a compression of salary levels, and older faculty members feel unrewarded for remaining at K-State.

"K-State has become a training center for junior faculty who accept positions at K-State and, when experience is gained, leave for higher paying positions elsewhere," the report said. "The University has lost — and is continuing to lose — some of its most distinguished faculty at the upper ranks. K-State cannot afford to lose talent and experience at this rate and replace it with untried and inexperienced personnel."

According to the report, failure by the Kansas Legislature to fund the last year of the Margin of Excellence has wiped out the gains of the first two years.

Prior to MOE funding, K-State ranked 41 of 50 in land-grant universities. During the second year of funding, K-State climbed to 37 of 50, Wefald said.

"With the third year of MOE funded, we could have gotten up to number 28 or 29. Now, we've fallen to 41," Wefald said. "If the trend continues, we could fall to 48 of 50."

Barbara Hetrick, associate professor of plant pathology and chairwoman of the subcommittee that prepared the report, expressed frustration at the Legislature's lack of support.

"Given the financial climate in the state, it's difficult to get funding," she said. "The state's money is going so many places that there just isn't enough to go around."

The report is only a small part of funding problems at K-State, Wefald said.

"The salary problem is only a fraction of the larger problem. We don't have basic operating funds," he said. "The problem is only exacerbated by the failure of the 1990 Legislature to fund higher education in the state."

"The best thing students can do is to call their local legislators. Then get their parents to call," he said.

Nadeem Kafity, freshman in architecture, speaks during an interview in Denison Hall about living in Kuwait during the invasion by Iraq.

Student experiences war

Iraqi invasion catches Kafity at home; soldiers loot family's new business

CHRISTINE SPLICHAL
Collegian Reporter

The day Iraq invaded Kuwait the roar of a huge plane woke Nadeem Kafity, known as "Metalhead Ned" by his friends.

"It was like thunder," said Kafity, freshman in architecture. "I was really scared. Then my Mom ran into the room saying, 'Iraq has invaded!'"

Kafity was in Kuwait with his family during the Iraqi invasion. He holds a Jordanian passport although he was born and lived in Kuwait. He said he is considered a Jordanian because both his parents are citizens of Jordan.

Kafity attended K-State in the spring of 1990 and planned to return to school in the fall. He went home to Al-Salmih, Kuwait for summer break to visit his family.

He said everything changed in Kuwait after the invasion Aug. 2. "My father went to work that morning in a place next to Kuwait City," Kafity said. "He didn't know what was going on. His partner called him from Hungary and asked what he was doing there. My father said he was opening the office. His partner then told him Iraq had invaded Kuwait."

Kafity said his father was a safety manager for Kafco, a Kuwaiti aviation fuel corporation. A month before the invasion, Kafity's father invested half of the family's money in a new business, which was open only one month before closing because of the invasion.

See related story/Page 5

"When the Iraqi soldiers came, they started looting and stealing. They stole a jeep, computers, the fax machine, telephones, the air conditioner, the fridge and a desk from the business — everything," Kafity said. "They wiped it out. This was very common."

"When they first came, the poor people of Kuwait also started to steal," he said. "It was total chaos."

"After like a month, you get used to it. They changed the names of the streets and the license plates on cars," Kafity said.

Kafity's 16-year-old brother, a junior in high school, was sent to a school renamed Saddam Hussein. Kafity said the Iraqis closed four or five schools and only reopened one. They told students they could attend school this year but not next year.

One day, three soldiers and a man with a broken hand came to Kafity's home, he said. The soldiers asked the family their nationality, and after the family replied Jordanians, the soldiers said they were friends.

"When they got to my room, they saw my guitar, computer and posters. They had never seen these things before," Kafity said.

After asking for one of his tapes, the soldier asked for his brother's walkman radio.

"My brother said, 'No, I'm sorry.'"

"Mom freaked out," Kafity said. "She said, 'Take it, he's just a little boy' — my brother is not a little boy."

"I just stood there watching. They gave the walkman to the soldier. Mom was so afraid; they just wanted the soldiers to get the hell out," he said.

"We started to have problems — all of our money was in the bank," Kafity said. "They opened the bank for a couple days, and at first, it was easy to get money. Then it got harder."

He said, after awhile, the Iraqis banned the use of Kuwaiti money, and only Iraqi money could be used. Then a black market opened, which exchanged Kuwaiti money

Bush declares war's end

By the Associated Press

WASHINGTON — President Bush marked a triumphant end to the war in the Persian Gulf Wednesday night, but said, "Our commitment to peace in the Middle East does not end with the liberation of Kuwait."

He said the time has come to put an end to the Arab-Israeli conflict.

In a speech prepared for a joint session of Congress, Bush said, "As president, I can report to the nation: aggression is defeated. The war is over."

Bush said the U.S. forces in the Gulf fought with honor and valor.

The end of the 42-day war with Iraq signals the beginning of a troop withdrawal from the Gulf. The White House said the president will personally greet some of the returning forces, either in communities around the country or at military bases.

Bush said his first priority at home was to end the recession and "get our economy rolling again." He called on Congress to enact a new anti-crime bill, civil rights legislation, and initiatives dealing with education, energy and transportation.

Albanians seek refuge in Italy

VIENNA, Austria (AP) — Albanians crowded onto ships sailing for Italy Wednesday, and police fired over the heads of thousands of others who mobbed Tirana's embassy row seeking exit visas to leave the Balkan nation.

The crowds had gathered outside the French, German, Greek, Polish and Czechoslovak missions, drawn by spurious rumors of wholesale visa giveaways. Police fired warning shots and doused people with water cannons. Some in the crowd threw rocks at police officers.

In Durres, Albania's main port, thousands of people ignored police warning shots Wednesday and boarded the 11,000-ton ship, Tirana, which they forced to sail for Italy, the state news agency ATA said.

It said a total of 15 ships headed for Italy, which is 50 miles away across the Adriatic Sea, and some carried children without their parents.

Judge denies bond for Bakker

CHARLOTTE (AP) — A federal judge denied bond Wednesday for Jim Bakker, saying the PTL founder might flee while awaiting resentencing on fraud and conspiracy charges.

U.S. District Judge Graham Mullen said he found prosecutors' arguments that Bakker posed a danger to the community unpersuasive. But the judge said Bakker's attorneys did not prove he did not pose a flight risk.

Abilene escapee captured in Utah

SALT LAKE CITY (AP) — A Kansas jail escapee, whose flight went unnoticed for eight days, was captured after burglarizing a Utah Highway Patrol office, officials said.

Herbert Ross Montanye was arrested Monday, 12 days after he fled into the eastern Utah desert following a car chase in a stolen vehicle he and fellow escapee Steven Baker were driving.

Baker, a convicted drug dealer, was found by officers on horseback and arrested, but he vanished after posting $10,000 cash bail, authorities said.

Montanye was nabbed in the attic of a Green River, Utah, motel where detectives had tracked him following the burglary at a nearby UHP office, Emery County Sheriff Lamar Guymon said.

Montanye and Baker had been at the Dickinson County Jail in Abilene, when they used smuggled hacksaw blades to cut a hole through a steel cell wall under a bunk Feb. 18.

First Kansans to return next week

TOPEKA (AP) — The first Kansas National Guard members to return from the Persian Gulf are scheduled to arrive home next week, Gov. Joan Finney announced Wednesday.

Finney and Adjutant Gen. James Rueger said Defense Department officials told them about 300 guardsmen are scheduled to return at 3 p.m. March 14 at Forbes Field, south of Topeka.

Rueger said he and other military officials will meet Friday to plan a celebration to mark their return. There are about 16,000 Kansans stationed in the Middle East.

"I know that for these guardsmen, their families and caring Kansans across this state, the days we've been without them have been very long," Finney said during a Statehouse news conference.

K-State, police to conduct survey

The Riley County police department and K-State Department of Criminology will conduct a random survey of area businesses starting March 7. The survey will continue every Thursday until the end of March.

Li. Bana Kyle, Riley County police department training officer, said the random survey will cover five regions in Manhattan, Ogden and the North and South regions of the county.

Kyle said a K-State intern will be contacting several businesses to determine the communities perception of the services provided by the department. The results will be made available to the Riley County Law Board at a later date.

"The last survey was generalized and included information from many people," Kyle said. "This survey is specifically for the business community."

Jeffery Hooper, senior in sociology and criminal and police department intern, said he is conducting the survey for internship requirements. He expects to target about 100 businesses in Riley County.

"The survey will evaluate how well they do their job, and the basic attitude of Riley County businesses toward the service provided by the police department," Hooper said.

Hooper said the final results of the survey will be finished in May.

"If anyone is interested in the results and would like a copy of the research they should contact the police department in May," Hooper said.

Kyle said each questionnaire will require about five minutes to complete and all contacts will be made by telephone.

House may not pass governor's proposal

Initiative, referendum Finney's top priority

CHRISSE VENDEL
Collegian Reporter

Gov. Joan Finney's initiative and referendum proposal, which she made a key part of her campaign last fall, may have trouble gaining the needed two-thirds majority it needs to pass the Kansas Legislature.

House Majority Leader Donna Whiteman, D-Hutchinson, said supporters of Finney's initiative and referendum proposal said it will dilute the power of elected officials and give Kansans more clout in the voting booth.

But Rep. Kent Glasscock, R-Manhattan, said opponents claim it will only cause an increase in attempts by special interest groups to influence legislators by mounting massive public relations campaigns among voters.

Gary Reser, legislative liaison for the governor's office, said a three-part package on the proposal was passed Monday by the Kansas House Federal and State Affairs Committee and will probably be debated on the House floor within two weeks.

The committee made several restrictive modifications to the package before it was finally passed, he said.

Under an initiative system, people would be able to collect signatures to place proposed constitutional amendments or laws on the ballot, Reser said. They would be voted on during presidential election years.

To create an initiative, the Kansas constitution must be changed. That means a two-thirds majority of the Legislature must vote to adopt the initiative proposals, he said. If that happens, then the proposals would be put on the voting ballot for the people to decide.

Referendum would allow the Legislature to put up issues for public approval.

Committee modifications of the governor's package include raising the number of petition signatures required for a statutory amendment from 5 percent of actual voters in the last gubernatorial election to five percent of registered voters, Reser said. For a constitutional amendment, 8 percent of registered voters will be required.

The committee also shortened the signature collection period from one year to six months, he said.

Whiteman said the majority of Democrats in the House support Finney, but 84 votes out of 125 will be needed for it to pass.

"It will take a lot of input from citizens who want it," Whiteman said.

Rep. Sheila Hochhauser, D-Manhattan, said many people have misgivings because of possible abuse, but she would support the package if it is drafted very carefully.

"I'll have to see the format before I decide to support it fully, but I do favor the modifications," she said.

Finney has made it clear the initiative and referendum package is one of her top priorities and has repeatedly vowed to veto any spending bills until her package is passed by legislators.

Hochhauser said there has been talk of overriding Finney's veto.

"They don't want to," she said. "No one wants to have a confrontation with the governor."

Reser said some of the opposition to the package reflects fear of the untested.

"Some people may think our system works now, so why mess with it," he said. "A kind of fear of the unknown."

Reser said the package does have language in it designed to safeguard against abuse by organized special interest groups.

The main concern of the governor's office is the two-thirds majority vote needed for the bill to pass in the House, Reser said.

"Any time you need two-thirds it makes it extremely difficult," he said.

The governor still wants her original package, he said.

"We'll work hard with both parties to get the governor's package amended on the House floor, so it will be closer to her original bills," he said.

Ofra Ben-Yaacov, Israeli consulate general, discusses the history of Israel to a small crowd in the K-State Union Wednesday. Ben-Yaacov related how the recent war in the gulf is one of several conflicts.

Consulate speaks to panel about Arab-Israeli conflicts

JIM STRUBER
Consumer Reporter

Ofra Ben-Yaacov, consulate general of the Israeli embassy in Chicago, Ill., discussed the history of Israel and the current Arab-Israeli conflicts in the Middle East to eight K-State students and faculty Wednesday night in the K-State Union.

The one-hour panel discussion was followed by a question and answer period for the panelists and audience members.

Yael Carmi, graduate student in theater and Hillel counselor, said Ben-Yaacov's visit was sponsored by Hillel, the Jewish student union at K-State.

Ben-Yaacov, briefly explained the formation of Israel to the audience members. Most of the discussion, however, eventually centered on the Arab-Israeli conflicts and the question of a Palestinian homeland.

Ben-Yaacov said the Arab nations still don't want Israel, and they still believe there is a chance to destroy and demolish the state of Israel.

"The Arabs are very strong in their rejection of a Jewish state in this region," Ben-Yaacov said. "This is the core of the problem."

Ben-Yaacov said the Palestinian refugee camps are good public relations tools for the Palestine Liberation Organization.

Israel built homes for the Palestinians in the Gaza Strip and the West Bank, but didn't relocate them because the PLO said it would look bad.

He said Israel and the United States won't negotiate with the PLO, because they are terrorists.

"All the Arab world still believes the state of Israel doesn't exist, with the exception of a peace treaty with Egypt," Ben-Yaacov said. "Things in the Middle East are changeable, instability in the Middle East isn't just because of the Palestinian homeland."

"Hopefully, there will be a solution with the help of the United States and a new world order. However, if we know we are going to stay a very tiny state among many hostile states, we will have to maintain our security."

Ben-Yaacov said the Palestinian Covenant still exists, and students should read the document to understand why Israel won't negotiate with the PLO, because they wish to destroy the state of Israel.

Carmi said there must be stability or a cease-fire in the region with Arab neighbors before the problems with the Palestinians can be resolved.

"Israel is still in a state of war with many of the Arab countries in the region," Carmi said.

Carmi said the history of the Middle East is very long and complex, and the Arab-Israeli conflicts remain far from being resolved.

Jonathan Morris, junior in mathematics, said the presentation gave some good history on Israel and its development. He said he would like to hear more information about the Palestinian aspect of the conflict in the region.

"I realize the panelists were Jewish-Israeli nationalists, so the information was biased," Morris said. "This is such a complicated issue, you can't draw a conclusion from a one-hour discussion. Most Americans don't understand the Palestinian-Israeli conflict."

Lillian Kremer, instructor of English, said there is a great deal of inaccuracy in the media reports of the Middle East. She said she felt that the media frequently negate or ignore violence perpetrated in the Arab world.

"Case in point—the Syrian violence in Lebanon received very limited coverage when it involved the killing of hundreds of Palestinians," Kremer said. "During the same period last year, the loss of life at Temple Mount involved 19 Palestinians and was replayed night after night for two weeks. 'Students have very little sense of history — this puzzles me.'"

Soviets approve union preservation

By the Associated Press

MOSCOW — Eight of the 15 Soviet republics tentatively approved Mikhail Gorbachev's proposed treaty to preserve the union, officials said Wednesday, but there was still uncertainty about how to put the document into effect.

The Russian Federation, by far the wealthiest and most populous republic, was among those signaling tentative agreement. Basic disputes remain between Soviet President Gorbachev and Russian President Boris Yeltsin, however, on taxation, ownership of natural resources and other issues.

Eduard Kovalev, a spokesman for the national parliament, said the draft was completed Friday and returned to Gorbachev to resolve disputed points, which make up about 20 percent of the document.

"I think we have come closer to signing," President Nursultan Nazarbayev of Kazakhstan said on the government's nightly national newscast.

V. Stepanov, the leader of the northeastern region of Karelia, said on television the document was a major political step.

"I wouldn't call it a victory. ... There is hard, serious work ahead."

Gorbachev said he hopes to complete his review and publish the document before a national referendum he has scheduled for March 17 and billed as a vote on preserving the Soviet Union.

Six republics refuse to take part in the referendum or in drafting the treaty. Even those taking part in the talks and voting do not have a clear idea of their legal meaning, Kovalev said.

"No procedure on signing the union treaty has been set," he said. "They are developing it as they go along."

EDITORIAL

Great music must still stand test of time

Theo was a lad with uncommon musical ability. A truly gifted child, of this his father was certain. Of the seven children born to Leo and his wife Mary, only Theo and his older sister, Anna, five years his senior, survived. Both children were born in the 1950s, a time when music was undergoing some revolutionary changes.

Leo, a professional concert violinist, would give piano lessons to young Anna at home. Lying in a cradle nearby, little Theo could hear the music lessons. It had a significant effect on him, for by the age of 3, Theo was confidently playing simple chords on the piano, and could also peck out passages he had heard. No one fully recognized the talent the lad possessed until it was discovered that, at the age of 7, he could play the violin without any formal teaching, and the organ as well.

When Theo was 4, Leo was teaching his son short pieces on the piano. At about the age of 5, Theo actually began to write his first songs. He published his first sonatas when he was 7, his first symphonies at 8 and his first opera at 11.

As he matured, Theo eventually developed a method of composition that can only be described as astonishing. Witnessed by many, but best described by Theo, he writes, "Though it be long, the work is complete and finished in my mind. I take out of the bag of my memory what has previously been collected into it. For this reason, the committing to paper is done quickly enough. For everything is already finished, and it rarely differs on paper from what it was in my imagination."

Theo died just short of his 36th birthday Dec. 5, 1791. His full name was Joannes Chrysostomus Wolfgangus Theophilus Mozart, better known as Wolfgang Amadeus Mozart (Amadeus being the Latin equivalent of Theophilus).

During his short lifespan, he composed 626 known works, which require roughly 1,000 pages just to compile and catalog. One of the most prolific composers to have ever lived, he spent the last four months of his life writing two operas, a concerto and most of the "Requiem."

As an opera composer, he is considered by music experts to have no equal. He wrote about 50 symphonies, of which a few half dozen are considered some of the greatest ever composed in that genre.

Pitts Sanborn in "The International Encyclopedia of Music and Musicians" writes, "Mozart's genius is remarkable for its fecundity, its variety, its unflagging inspiration, its spontaneous distinction and grace. In the brief span of 36 years, Mozart proved himself the most comprehensive genius that music has known, and no other composer has transmuted with his genius everything he chanced to touch."

Mozart influenced the work of other musical greats such as Haydn, Beethoven, Prokofiev, Richard Strauss, Rossini, Wagner, Tchaikovsky, Rimsky-Korsakoff, Verdi, Donizetti, Mahler and many others.

Brad Seabourn

Collegian Columnist

This year will mark the 200th anniversary of Mozart's death, and, in his honor, 1991 has been declared the year of Mozart throughout the world. Numerous Mozart worldwide festivals will allow the celebration of the genius of the man who provided the world with such masterpieces as, "The Marriage of Figaro," "Don Giovanni," "All Women Behave That Way," "The Magic Flute," the "Jupiter" symphonies and many other works.

We have been fortunate, recently, to have the opportunity to experience the magic of Mozart through events sponsored by the McCain Auditorium Performance Series. The 1990-1991 season has brought the performance of Daniel McKelway and Friends' "Mozart: Music for Winds" Feb. 1, and the New York City Opera National Co.'s performance of "The Marriage of Figaro" Sunday.

However, at an institution of higher learning such as K-State, none of these performances were considered of any consequence to rate a review in the student newspaper. I find this disturbing. Particularly in light of the fact that some of the most recent reviews have concerned rock concerts at Bramlage Coliseum featuring the bands Poison, Damn Yankees, Bad Company, C.C. Deville and an album review of the incoherent, psychotic babblings of a group called the Jesus Lizards. These reviews generated a number of letters to the editor documenting the earth-shaking controversy over the merits (or lack thereof) of various forms of rock music and its treatment in the media.

This obvious lack of discriminating taste in music reminds me of an incident that occurred eight years ago in Huntington Beach, Calif., at the Blarney Stone bar to John Teasley, lead guitarist for a rock group called McDowell County Line. Due to a spilled beer, which had been placed on top of an amplifier, Teasley was nearly electrocuted when the amplifier short-circuited, sending hundreds of volts of electricity through the guitar and into his body.

Teasley leaped from the stage and began writhing on the floor of the bar trying to throw himself free of the amplifier. The crowd whooped and cheered thinking Teasley was putting on quite a show as he was being electrocuted before its very eyes.

Teasley managed to work the guitar free of the amplifier and avoid death, yet I have to wonder if the crowd would have cheered that horrific event as well. This is the kind of "discriminating" taste I am talking about; where one cannot distinguish between the so-called music emanating from a performing musician and a man being electrocuted.

As with a great number of things, one's taste in music is a matter of opinion and each is certainly entitled to his or her own. I find music enjoyable because of the fact it has such a large number of forms. I like country and classic, as well as rock and reggae just to name a few — my choice depending a large extent on my mood at the moment.

Yet, from a music appreciation standpoint, one must make distinctions based upon fundamentals, one of which is perdurability or diuturnity ... that unique ability to appeal to a broad spectrum of listeners over a long period of time.

Another is quality. Kind of like the difference between a diamond and cubic zirconia. Both are nice and perfectly acceptable choices. Yet, one possesses enduring brilliance, and the other, well ...

Tonight we have another opportunity to witness the magic of Mozart. Malcolm Bilson, a first-class, world-renowned Mozart pianist, will perform four of Mozart's piano sonatas on the fortepiano at 8 p.m. in McCain Auditorium. Take advantage of it.

And should anyone like to debate the issue of what constitutes great music with some specific contemporary writers and musicians in mind, I suggest we wait a few hundred years, and leave it to succeeding generations. However, I suspect that given today's pop music and a sufficient amount of time, it is highly questionable there will be much for anyone to talk about.

Vietnam's lessons remain even as we lick syndrome

Friday, President George Bush said the United States had finally licked the Vietnam syndrome with the clear and easy victory in Iraq.

The president didn't explain what he meant by "Vietnam syndrome" and there is probably no consensus by the public on the meaning of the term. It might be guessed the president meant the reluctance of the American public to support large military involvements abroad and the lack of success of the U.S. military. If so, then indeed the recent conflict did put the Vietnam syndrome behind us.

The American people are justly proud of the performance of the military in the war, in which U.S. troops quickly accomplished the goals established by the administration.

Conservatives have long argued Vietnam instilled an unwarranted weariness of foreign involvement in the American public, and the events of the last two months demonstrate the United States can effectively intervene abroad.

However, the victory in the gulf was a military solution to a military problem — the Iraqi occupation of Kuwait. It was not an attempt to impose a U.S. solution to a political problem in a foreign country, as was the case in Vietnam.

The lesson of Vietnam is that such interventions should be avoided, a lesson relearned with the deaths of 237 Marines in Beirut in 1982.

If the president means, by licking the Vietnam syndrome, we should forget the costly lessons of the limitations of American power demonstrated in Vietnam, it would be a serious mistake.

Another perspective

The big question now, in the wake of the Persian Gulf War, is who will suffer more — Saddam Hussein or the Democratic Party?

If Rep. Doug Bereuter, R-Neb., has his way, it may be the Democrats. He said Saturday they should be accountable for, and be able to justify, their votes against the resolution authorizing the use of force in the Persian Gulf.

Bereuter is just one of many Republicans who have begun to use "the mother of all wars" to work toward an election-year mother of all landslides.

With George Bush's approval rating hovering around 90 percent and a patriotic euphoria sweeping the country, it looks like next year's key issue will not be about the future of America, but about a past decision made by many Democrats to give economic sanctions more time.

Bereuter is twisting the vote — which was a gray, ambiguous and excruciatingly difficult act for both Democrats and Republicans — into a black-and-white battle between traitors and heroes.

Voters must remember that, for both Democrats and Republicans, the outlook for Desert Storm was quite different from its outcome. Only then will the 1992 election rise above name-calling to become a forum for the discussion of legitimate issues.

Arab-Israeli conflict deserves U.S. intervention, resolution

The mainstream American media have a tendency to polarize political issues and present some conflicts in a simplified way that emphasizes one side of the debate. This is especially true when it comes to the Arab-Israeli conflict, where the Israeli side is presented in a much more favorable way than the plight of the Palestinians.

We have found the Collegian to be usually concerned about presenting a balanced picture of an issue and giving both sides of an argument equal weight in controversial stories. Unfortunately, this approach was not evident in Tuesday's article about the Arab-Israeli conflict.

In the five columns of the article, the Israeli viewpoint was presented and documented by manuals and authorities, while the opposing viewpoint was given only marginal space in the last column with quotes that were simplified and reduced.

Other than the overall biased approach, there were also factual errors, some of which we would like to clarify at this point.

First, the article repeatedly made reference to the "Arab nations." While there are a number of Arab states, there is only one Arab nation. People of this nation share a common language, history and culture.

Second, the 1917 Balfour Declaration did not "divide the remnants of the Ottoman Empire into French and English spheres of influence." It was merely a promise made by the British government to establish a Jewish homeland.

Third, the article stated that the Palestinian

Motaz Alhourani

Graduate Student in Political Science
Guest Columnist

presence in other Arab countries caused "much concern and resentment" in those countries. The Palestinians were, in fact, received with open arms by the populations of those countries, and the only resentment felt by anybody was toward Israel for forcefully displacing the Palestinians out of their homeland.

Fourth, the entire argument of the Israelis having to defend themselves against Palestinian or Arab attacks is not founded historically. Israel has been, and remains, an aggressor. It occupied Arab lands in 1967 against the will of the international community and the United Nations, and it was Israel that invaded Lebanon in 1982, killing more than 20,000 Palestinian and Lebanese civilians, also against the will of the United Nations.

The United Nations has issued one resolution after another reaffirming the right of Palestinians to self-determination and independence. It has also called upon Israel to withdraw from all the occupied areas including the West Bank, the Gaza Strip and the Golan Heights.

The Israelis refused repeatedly a settlement with the Palestinian people by rejecting all the U.N. resolutions and by refusing to negotiate with the PLO — the chosen representative of the Palestinian people. The Palestinian people should be free to choose their own representation, just as the Israelis have a right to choose theirs.

The United States has displayed great interest in implementing the 12 U.N. Security Council resolutions concerning the Iraqi-Kuwaiti conflict, but has vetoed the resolutions concerning the Arab-Israeli conflict repeatedly. Now is the time to end this double standard once and for all. The Palestinians, the Arabs in general, would like for the United States to show the same kind of enthusiasm in implementing the 168 U.N. resolutions concerning the Israeli occupation of Arab land, and thus achieve true peace in the Middle East.

An important step for the United States, toward a more responsible stand, would be for the media to provide a more accurate picture of the conflict. This type of reporting would present both sides of the issue and would not rely on the "facts" contained in a propaganda manual issued by one side that disclaims the other.

Missile hits professor's Tel Aviv home

Doors, windows, ceiling damaged from nearby explosion

SHANNAN SEELY
Agriculture Reporter

A K-State associate professor recently returned from his home near Tel Aviv, Israel, which was attacked by a Scud missile during the Persian Gulf War.

Elieser Posner, associate professor of grain science and industry, works at K-State, while his family lives near Tel Aviv.

"It was natural for them to stay," he said. "They have their life activities over there."

"I couldn't sleep (during the war)," he said. "I called every time I learned there was a Scud missile attack. My phone bill had to be more than $300 that month. Sometimes it was three or four phone calls a night."

He said he could not concentrate and felt uptight, but when he called, his family seemed calmer than he.

He said he was watching television in his Manhattan apartment Feb. 11 when Dan Rather reported a Scud missile attack east of Tel Aviv.

The bomb fell about 50 yards from his home at 5:50 p.m. CST.

He said he tried to contact his wife, Oma, and sons, Nimrod, 20, and Tomer, 13, right away.

"Usually, you first try to call in two to three minutes after an attack," Posner said. "Otherwise, the lines are busy and it's hard to get through."

Two to three hours after he heard the report, he finally reached his family.

They were sitting in a bomb shelter next to the house, and Posner's son said the neighborhood houses just rumbled.

"My son said the whole shelter moved," he said.

He was in Israel in January and originally planned to go back during spring break.

"I had a feeling I had to go over there then," he said.

He said it was a challenge to get a flight because El-Al was the only airline flying into Israel. He finally got a ticket to leave Feb. 14.

"After arriving there, I went on a walk to put things back together. The attacks and alarms still went on," he said.

Every house had a bomb shelter, he said. In the beginning, people would retreat to a tight room in case of gas warfare. Eventually, they tightened up the bomb shelters so they could be protected from chemical and conventional warfare.

He said he felt calmer waiting with his family in the shelter than watching the news in Manhattan.

"In the shelter, you're a lame duck, you cannot move and you just wait until the radio announces that the Scud missile had dropped," he said.

The attacks were sometimes two times a night.

"At 2 a.m., the alarm would sound and we had a five-minute warning before the Scud attack," he said.

"There were two attacks, one at 3 a.m. and another at 5 a.m., as it took about two hours for Iraq to refuel."

Most times the missiles were hit by Patriots and fell in empty fields. The warhead of the Scud must be hit to destroy it in the atmosphere.

"But at such high speeds it wasn't always accurate," he said.

In Israel, he said he carried a gas mask with him everywhere.

Some people suffered from cuts and bruises and some houses will need to be rebuilt, he said.

He said he thought his family house is probably safe to live in now. The house needed new doors, ceiling and windows, along with complete repainting.

"It's unbelievable how glass splinters stuck in the walls," he said.

"Now looking back, you might call it a miracle. I don't know what you call it when only one person was killed (from the bombing)," he said.

About 11 people died from heart attacks and other causes due to panic about the war, he said.

Posner said he was glad Israel did not retaliate.

"I was really surprised and felt good Israel didn't retaliate," he said. "It was a very sensible decision to not interfere."

"It's shown to certain Arab countries that Israel has a sincere responsibility in keeping things stable and safe and peaceful with the whole region," he said.

Because Israel did not retaliate, he said he thought it would be easier to negotiate with countries like Saudi Arabia and Syria to form agreements.

"We don't want Saddam Hussein to stay in power," he said. "In the Middle East, with many dictators, we are used to dictators that are sensible and moderate. He's different. He wants to dictate his opinions on neighboring countries."

"The most terrible thing about his attitude is letting his own people go through tremendous hardship," he said. "I don't feel the causes against Iran or cause against Kuwait was justified. Nothing was gained or could have been gained."

He said we should find ways to prevent dictators like Hussein in the future.

Posner is a partner of a flour-milling business in Tel Aviv and will probably return to Israel in June.

"My wife is very optimistic and she understood what was happening. Nobody was hurt and everything else can be fixed."

"The morale is very high," he said. "Now it's business as usual. People understand they should continue with everyday activities."

"Everybody is glad it's over. Last Saturday, they were really relieved when the cease-fire was declared. I felt the relief in the air."

'Cats knock off No. 4 WSU, 3-2

Hipp gets third win

DAN WICKER
Sports Reporter

It was the kind of baseball ending that fans love but causes coaches to have heart attacks.

K-State was clinging to a slim two-run lead heading into the top of the ninth inning against the No. 4-ranked Wichita State Shockers Wednesday evening at Frank Myers Field, and the Shockers were simply not going to give up without a final fight.

Greg McNamara was working his second inning of relief for starter Kent Hipp (3-0). McNamara yielded a leadoff walk to Todd Dreifort, and Mike Jones followed with Wichita State's eighth hit of the evening, a double into right center, moving Dreifort to third.

With the next four batters, McNamara took each to a full count, recording two strikeouts but also yielding two bases on balls. The second walk pulled the Shockers within one and left the bases loaded for Jim Audley.

This brought the estimated crowd of 3,500 to its collective feet. Audley crushed a high fly towards left center on McNamara's delivery, but K-State leftfielder Brian Culp had time to get under the ball and make the catch at the warning track.

The final read K-State 3, Wichita State, 2.

"(McNamara) had great stuff — had tremendous stuff — and it was just a matter of getting it in the strike zone," K-State coach Mike Clark said. "I thought he was overthrowing his fastball, and that is what I told him when I went out there."

"I said, 'I am not here to take you out. It is a situation where you've got great stuff. Just tone down, relax and concentrate on the mitt, and we'll be in great shape.'"

K-State put a halt to what would have been Wichita State's best-ever beginning by dropping the Shockers to 9-1 in the season. K-State moved to 7-3, and it was the Wildcats' first win over Wichita State since 1978.

"It was a super win, and the guys hung in there," Clark said. "They're No. 4 in the nation, and a darn good ballclub. We've played Arkansas and these guys now, and I don't see a lot of difference at this stage of the game. It sure gives these guys a lot of confidence to beat a team in the Top 10 of the polls."

After Hipp threw five scoreless innings, Wichita State was the first team to get on the board in the sixth. After Chris Wimmer failed to reach first by laying a bunt down the third base line, Audley slammed a triple to the fence and scored on a wild pitch by Hipp. It was the first run Hipp had given up since throwing against Wichita State late last season.

K-State threatened a frame earlier, when Lance Wilson was hit by a pitch and Craig Wilson singled. Culp was then called out by the home-plate umpire for interfering with the Shocker catcher.

"I could sense a little bit of frustration in the fifth inning. We had a couple of opportunities, and let them slip by. And they got a run on the wild pitch," Clark said. "I can't say enough about Kent Hipp. He really showed his guts in the sixth and seventh innings when he was losing his stuff."

K-State climbed back into the game in the bottom of the seventh. After Scott Stroth reached on an infield single to start the frame, Bill Baird was inserted as a pinch runner. Van Torian followed by moving Baird over and reaching first himself on a Shocker error on his bunt attempt.

Lance Wilson followed Torian with another bunt attempt — this one popped up. The result was a force of Baird at third. Torian and Wilson were safe at second and first.

Craig Wilson then got his second hit of the evening on a ball hit through the infield that was not touched. It was ruled a hit and an error, and it scored Torian to tie the game at 1-1.

Chris Hmielewski then recorded K-State's fifth hit on the night, with a double that scored both Wilsons to give K-State a 3-1 advantage they would not relinquish.

"It really showed the character of the guys coming back to get a three spot, taking advantage of an error on a bunt and a big hit by Hmielewski," Clark said.

K-State pitcher Kent Hipp (22) pitches against the nationally ranked Wichita State Shockers during a game at Frank Myers Field Wednesday evening. Hipp got his third win against no defeats this season.

UNI next on slate

TODD FERTIG
Sports Reporter

The K-State baseball team must now be sure it takes care of business. After knocking off the No. 4-ranked WSU Shockers in the non-conference highlight of the season Wednesday night, and with the Texas A&M Tournament just around the corner, it would certainly be understandable if the players had their minds on other things than playing another game.

Sandwiched in between the hyped matchup with the Shockers and the week of baseball in the Texas sun, however, hides a date with the University of Northern Iowa baseball team at 3 p.m. today at Frank Myers Field.

Coach Mike Clark acknowledged the potential for a lapse in intensity, which could result in an upset loss for the Wildcats.

"That's certainly a possibility, but hopefully our kids are focused on what we're trying to do," Clark said. "We've been playing pretty well and been pretty serious about what we have to do."

Because of the length of the season and brevity of time between contests, the chances of a lapse are less threatening for a baseball team than in other sports, Clark said.

"Baseball is such a long season, playing 60 games in a year, that you can't really focus on one game or on a rivalry like you can in football," Clark said. "We just mention our long-term goals to the team, and make sure that we play up to our capabilities every day."

While the Wildcats are taking care to not look past an opponent, there are few opponents that the UNI Panthers can afford to overlook. With a schedule that is ranked the fourth-toughest in the nation by Baseball America magazine, nearly every contest is an opportunity for the Panthers to score an upset.

A member of the Mid-Continent Conference, UNI makes a practice of beefing up its non-conference schedule with nationally ranked opponents. Last season, the Panthers recorded a 20-39 mark with wins over opponents like Kansas and Iowa.

"They are in a process of building a strong program under a new coach, and I think they have done an excellent job of competing with the tough teams they have on their hands," Clark said.

Under new coach Dave Schrage, however, the Panthers have encountered opposition from more than just their scheduled foes so far this spring. The March weather, in fact, has kept the team from encountering many scheduled foes at all.

UNI is led by senior Mike Morony, an all-conference performer at shortstop.

K-State official scorer Pete Cooper (center) has been chosen by the Big Eight officials to serve as the official scorer at the Big Eight Postseason Tournament, which begins Friday in Kansas City.

Scorer afforded high honor

SCOTT PASKE
Sports Reporter

Pete Cooper has never seen a postseason college basketball game in person. He's seen several on television, but never live. Friday ought to be quite an icebreaker.

Cooper's first trip to the Big Eight Tournament in Kansas City, Mo., will be highlighted by one of Kemper Arena's finest views.

Cooper, a K-State civil engineering professor and official scorekeeper for the Wildcats since 1970, was chosen to head the scorer's table for all seven games of this year's tournament.

The word came from John Erickson, the Big Eight's director of basketball operations.

"I don't know what motivated him to ask me," said Cooper, who began his duties as scorekeeper during the first season of former coach Jack Hartman's tenure. "Maybe I've just been doing it longer than everybody else."

Erickson said his decision was based on recommendation by league officials who evaluate crews during the conference season.

"I inaugurated this last year thinking it would be an honor for the guys who give their time during the season," Erickson said. "Before, we always had a competent scorer from the Kansas City area. I just thought we'd do this as a type of payback."

Last year, Erickson chose scorers from Missouri and Oklahoma State to run the table. He said Cooper will be the only representative from a Big Eight school this year.

"I thought doing it this way would bring a cohesiveness to the crew," Erickson said. "This year, Pete was almost a unanimous choice by the officials."

"They all told me the K-State guy and his crew did an excellent job."

Cooper said there have been many fond memories for his crew, which consisted of assistant scorekeeper Bruce McCallum, timer Rod Franz, scoreboard operator Frank Mosier and 45-second clock. See COOPER, Page 9

Smith leads All-Big 8 picks

By the Associated Press

KANSAS CITY, Mo. — The most effective players in the Big Eight this year seem to be those whose heads are nearest the basket.

Such things run in cycles, of course. But in this era of "big men," there isn't an athlete on the first unit of the 1990-91 Associated Press all-Big Eight under 6-foot-7.

The relative shorty is Oklahoma State's forceful junior, Byron Houston, who is also the only non-senior on the first team.

Houston and 6-10 Doug Smith of Missouri were the sole unanimous selections on a first team selected by a panel of writers and broadcasters who regularly cover the Big Eight.

Joining them on the top unit are 6-9 Mark Randall of Kansas, 6-10 Shaun Vandiver of Colorado and 6-9, 266-pound Victor Alexander of Iowa State.

While the first unit is devoid of guards, the second contains three. Stevie Wise of Colorado was the top-vote getter among the guards. Also on the second unit are guards Adonis Jordan of Kansas and Anthony Peeler of Missouri — a first-teamer last year as a sophomore. Rich King, Nebraska's 7-2 senior, and Oklahoma's 6-8 freshman Jeff Webster round out the second team.

It was suggested voters try to identify a first-team point guard, somebody "to bring the ball down court." But six declined, and two specifically cited Smith as a point guard equivalent in this era of the big man, since his versatile talents include br-

It wasn't surprising Houston and Smith were both unanimous. The two have vied for top honors all season and finished in a virtual tie last week when Big Eight coaches were asked to name a player not on their team they'd pick to build a team around.

Smith, last season's Big Eight player of the year, had his jersey retired at Missouri's Hearnes Center this week in honor of only the third man in league history to pass 2,000 points and 1,000 rebounds.

Averaging 22.9 points and 10.4 rebounds this season, the intense Detroit native will wind up his college career at the Big Eight tournament this week as his school's all-time leading rebounder and No. 2 all-time scorer.

The 235-pound Houston averaged 22.6 points and 10.5 rebounds this year, finally reaching the vast potential everybody said he had.

Brave knights, fair maidens

Anachronism society preserves medieval ways, chivalry

BETH PALMER
Collegian Reporter

Jousting knights and fair maidens usually conjure up images of an era long ago. But in Manhattan, the tradition of knights and maidens is kept alive.

The Society for Creative Anachronism Inc. was organized for the preservation of medieval ways and the age of chivalry.

"Primarily, it is education. To do research and keep alive the Dark Ages and the traditions of the Medieval Period," said Bill Adams, professor of journalism and mass communication and adviser for the society.

Manhattan's chapter is known as the Shire of Spinning Winds and belongs to the kingdom Calontir, which includes Kansas, Nebraska, Missouri, Iowa and part of Arkansas.

"We're part of a kingdom and there are several kingdoms in the U.S.," Adams said.

Members become fully emerged in the period, Adams said. There is jousting and combat, weaving, costume-making, cooking, dancing and music.

"We take the things from the Middle Ages that we find most engaging, and we leave the others behind," said Michael Prohaska, president of the Manhattan society.

Prohaska has taken the persona Lord Toke Ormsson and is Seneschal. This is equivalent to president in the society's terms.

"I'm the king's representative in this area," Prohaska said. "I delegate various tasks to the members, and I do what's left over."

The club lives by an ethic of honor, Prohaska said.

"In this group, if you do something that's interesting or neat, there are people that appreciate it," Prohaska said.

People in the club choose an area and a particular time during the Medieval Era they want to come from.

"This determines heraldry, costumes and designs," Adams said. "Everything traces down to be as authentic as possible."

The Medieval Era spans the years A.D. 1000-1600. Some of the clubs go back to the year A.D. 800, but that is getting into barbaric times, Adams said.

Some clubs choose a particular period, and everything they do is built on that whole period. Manhattan members choose whatever period and area they want.

The best-played persona in this kingdom is a man who plays a Samurai warrior, Prohaska said.

"He lives it to the bone," Prohaska said. "He is wonderful."

Members can also choose names for themselves, though the process is not easy.

"Members have to track it down to make sure it's authentic and that it's not taken by someone else," Adams said.

The Society for Creative Anachronism is an international organization and originally began in Europe. It was started in the United States during the 1960s. It began in California and spread out from there, Adams said.

Members of the society get to travel somewhat. Delegates are sent whenever they are called in by the kingdom for conferences or wars. Adams said the last war, War of the Lilies, was started when a knight insulted a queen of another kingdom.

There are national conventions open to all members. The largest U.S. convention is in San Francisco and there are larger meetings in Europe.

Adams said those are a little too expensive, especially when some of the members are students.

"Most of ours tend to be regional that our people get to," Adams said. "Several kingdoms usually get together."

There are currently 64 members on record. Most of these members are students and people from the community, Fort Riley and Junction City. The membership is quickly growing, Prohaska said.

"Our numbers are rather small compared to other kingdoms, but we fight together better than any group," Prohaska said.

The other kingdoms' greatest fear about Calontir, is its ability to fight as a shield wall. The kingdom is drilled on this and uses it during warfare.

"It's a really intense experience," Prohaska said.

The society will participate in Open House this year, where it has won several awards in past years.

"When they show up in armor, it tends to draw attention," Adams said. "It helps to draw more student members."

The first Tuesday of the month is a meeting for the whole club to get together and discuss business. Meetings are also twice a week: one night for combat practice and the other for group meetings such as cooking and embroidery.

"We require no greater time or money investment than to dress the part," Prohaska said.

Big Brothers, Sisters have goals

ALISA DIETZ
Collegian Reporter

Podluck dinners, picnics and a trip to Rock Springs Ranch are just a few of the activities Big Brothers and Big Sisters of Manhattan offer throughout the year.

Big Brothers and Big Sisters is a program that provides activities and companionship.

Children are referred to the program by their school or teacher, social worker or even a single parent who has a busy schedule that doesn't allow enough time for special activities with their child.

Gwyn Crumplar, Executive Director of the program, said applications are taken throughout the entire year, and anyone is welcome to apply.

The process of becoming a Big Brother or Sister involves filling out an application, having a KBI check and three reference checks.

A home interview is also done to see where the applicant resides and what type of people to which the child may be exposed. An office interview and a personality test help match compatible volunteers and children.

"The process of getting a child takes anywhere from one to six months," Crumplar said. "We need more male volunteers. We have 55 boys and 10 girls on our waiting list." Trisha Perrigo, junior in human ecology and mass communications, has been a Big Sister for almost a year.

She said one of the main reasons she became interested in the program is because, as a college student, it is nice to interact with different age groups.

She spends about three to four hours per week with her little sister.

"We go out to eat, to the mall, we make dinner and cookies and go bowling," Perrigo said. "It is so good for the kids, and they get so much out of it."

The children have goals to meet, and volunteers who are able to help them meet those goals are chosen as a match. Volunteers must spend three to six hours per week for one year with their little brother or sister.

Big Brothers and Big Sisters made 157 matches last year and have 65 children on their waiting list. Children on the waiting list have activities three to four times per month that are sponsored by sororities and fraternities during the school year.

Workshop to assist in handling of stress

KIMBERLY KOHLS
Staff Reporter

A workshop about how to handle employees' stress as a result of the Persian Gulf War will be today in the K-State Union Big Eight Room.

"Weathering the Storm" is for all University supervisors, managers and directors and is sponsored by Personnel Services. The workshops will be at 9 a.m. and 1 p.m. They will last about 1-1/2 hours and University personnel can use personal leave to attend the workshops.

The workshop will tell how supervisors can deal with employees' stress associated with the war. It will also cover the aspects of stress management, coping, separation and loss as a result of war and how this will pertain to the work environment.

The idea of the workshop was started by Linda Paige, supervisor at Farrell Library before the cease-fire. Since then, the organizers have decided the workshop is still needed.

"I have three loved ones in the gulf and found it hard sometimes to concentrate on my work," Paige said.

Organizers are afraid employers will not attend the workshop because of the cease-fire.

"I think this workshop is still important. Just because the war is over, the troops are still in danger," said Lori Peterson, graduate student in marriage and family therapy and the workshop speaker.

"The troops are not back yet. Yesterday, I heard that it may be August or September before they come back," Peterson said.

People here are still dealing with death and other experiences that happened during the separation, Peterson said. The unknown is also frightening to people left behind. All this anxiety can cause stress in the workplace.

"The intensity of the anxiety has diminished some," Peterson said. "But now they are a different color."

Spouses, girlfriends and families of those in the gulf often say they feel they should be tough and strong for their loved ones, Peterson said. It is often hard for them to get out of this stigma and be open with their feelings.

"Some supervisors on campus also have loved ones still in the gulf, and they are in a double bind," Peterson said. "They are responsible for the atmosphere in the workplace, and they are also experiencing stress because of these two things."

Peterson is planning to have the workshop structured so specific questions and instances can be addressed.

Professor speaks about poverty

Miller says programs exclude women

DARLA GOODMAN
Collegian Reporter

"The treatment of women in the social welfare system does not always provide work incentives or encourage self-support," said Dorothy Miller, assistant professor in the Center for Women's Studies at Wichita State University.

Miller spoke to about 80 people about "A Theory of Women's Poverty" Wednesday in the K-State Union. The presentation was co-sponsored by the K-State Women's Studies Program and the Social Work Organization.

Miller said analyses of the social welfare system of the United States usually assume it is based on the demands of the capitalist economy and is designed to support the work ethic. This means welfare benefits are set at a low enough level to promote the desire to get work and ensure that low-wage laborers are available.

"While women on welfare are ostensibly pressured to work, programs to get them into the work force usually exclude, by design, large numbers of them," she said.

Many problems of the social welfare system can be traced to society's system of masculine dominance known as the patriarchy, she said.

Miller said she does not intend for this to imply all women are dominated by men. Certainly, she said, many men are dominated by women in a clear hierarchy.

"Patriarchy, capitalism and racism are all hierarchical systems; patriarchy is not the only hierarchy."

Miller cited four changes that may help to improve the system.

"I would look for child support to be a percentage of the non-custodial parent's income across the board."

It would also be important for this to be exempt from changes on an individual basis through judges or the system, she said.

Miller also said pay equity is essential, and more women need to get into policy-making positions.

"The point here is that in our culture one way of thinking, a way that is male-dominated, is considered superior by most people and essentially determines how social policy is formulated and implemented and how the country is run," she said.

Finally, Miller said more education reduces the chances of being poor.

Cherri Harper, assistant professor of social work, helped bring Miller to K-State. She had heard Miller speak about two years ago, and said she felt her presentation could inform people about the making of public policy.

"I think it's really important to use a gender lens when we look at social issues," Harper said.

Miller's research in the subject of women in poverty is compiled in her book "Women and Social Welfare: A Feminist Analysis."

Cameras survey campus parking

New system protects automobiles from being vandalized, stolen

WADE RAMSEY
Collegian Reporter

The K-State Police have a new tool to help fight crime on campus — cameras.

Since fall semester, five cameras have constantly surveyed major parking lots on campus. Three more cameras are soon to be installed, said Captain Charles Beckom.

"The cameras have had a direct impact on the criminal activities in the parking lots around campus," Beckom said.

Currently, two cameras monitor the K-State Union parking lot and two cameras monitor the parking lots north of Haymaker Hall. Another camera surveys Seaton Court Drive.

Two cameras still to be installed will survey the West Stadium parking lots and another will add to the cameras recording activities in the lots north of Haymaker.

"The areas with cameras were never havens for crime — just an occasional auto burglar. This is just added protection for the people who park on campus," Beckom said.

The cameras feed images by fiber optic cable to the dispatch office at the campus police headquarters in East Stadium. The cameras also record everything on videotape.

The dispatch officer is not able to watch all five television screens at once, Beckom said, but because the images are all recorded, officers can look back at videotapes if something unusual does happen.

There is a dispatch officer or trained student on duty 24 hours a day, and the system is fairly simple to operate, he said.

"The cameras can pan a wide area, sweep across an area, or zoom in on one spot," Beckom said.

The quality of the image is exceptionally good, one dispatcher said.

"We can easily read the license plate number of a car parked on the other side of a lot. We can get good close-ups of people. The image quality is great," said Laurie Harrison, daytime dispatcher.

The cameras are not designed to replace a patrolling officer, Beckom said, but to supplement the officers. Officers still patrol the monitored parking lots.

"The cameras give us the extra advantage of constantly looking at the lots and recording whatever we see," Beckom said.

Last semester, he said, two juveniles and one adult were arrested by campus police when the dispatch officer realized the three were breaking into a car in a surveyed lot.

"The dispatch officer noticed the brake lights of a parked car go on. He zoomed in and clearly saw them vandalizing this car. Before they knew what hit them, we had three officers there to make the arrest," Beckom said.

The cameras produce a high-quality image in day or night. Each camera is designed to operate normally with less than candlelight available to see by, Beckom said.

"There is only a marginal deterioration of image quality at night, nothing remotely important," Beckom said.

The only occasional problem with nighttime viewing is glare from passing headlights, Harrison said.

The cameras are encased in environmental housing to protect the cameras from rain, sleet and other elements. The cameras can operate in temperatures from 150 to minus 34 degrees. Each is equipped with a cooling fan and heater to keep the temperature range within normal levels, Beckom said.

The current system, installed for $130,000, can be expanded to include up to 64 cameras and many accessories.

"Eventually we will invest in a piece of hardware that will enable us to take a 8 by 10 photograph of any area taped. That will be very useful," Beckom said.

There are still a few bugs in the system, he said, but nothing serious enough to be alarmed about.

"It's been a little slow to install, but we're pretty happy about the system. The cameras are not a cure-all, but they certainly help a lot. It's been well worth the money and time spent on it," Beckom said.

The remaining three cameras will be installed as soon as more fiber-optic cable arrives.

"We're looking at adding cameras to other parking lots and specific areas of campus," Beckom said. "We could put one in rooms with expensive equipment and hook it up to an alarm. If someone enters the room after a certain time, the camera would go on and feed the image to the big screen in the dispatch office. There's a lot we can do with this system."

Beckom said the University of Oklahoma has contacted the campus police about installing a similar system on the OU campus.

"I told them to go for it," Beckom said.

Industry resisting change

High-definition television not expected in near future

DAVID PRITCHARD
Collegian Reporter

Technology is changing the face of television, and the industry is digging in its heels and resisting the change.

One area the industry is dragging its heels to introduce is "high definition television," said Bill Adams, professor of journalism and mass communications.

Television is sent out as a series of lines, and by the time it reaches the viewer, the number of lines is down to about 300. High definition television sends out about 1100 lines that are pressed together to give a much finer picture, he said.

"It's television such as the public has never seen before," Adams said. "It's a picture equal to the best reproductions done in magazines, and the sound quality is the same as digital compact discs. High definition television will allow a viewer to see individual hairs on a person's head or a weave pattern in clothing."

One of the reasons for stalling is because it won't increase their profits, but it will cost them drastically, he said.

"To send out that many more lines takes a larger part of the spectrum," he explained. "If you sent it over the airwaves to be broadcasted, instead of twelve VHF channels, you could only get three. It would take about four channels to send out one signal. The way to get around that is to not broadcast the signal, but send it by fiber optics. A fiber optic system could handle about 100 channels of high definition television and all of your telephone calls."

The major problem with a fiber optic system is the broadcast industry is never going to give in to having its broadcasts sent by telephones, he said.

"The technology has been around for years, but the industry will probably be able to stall for another five years," he said.

One advancement changing the television industry and the way people get their news, is the uplink satellite, which allows for instantaneous information, said David MacFarland, professor of journalism and mass communication.

"Television is now just as instantaneous as radio used to be, and that's a relatively new phenomena, where people know they can go there, be there and be in the midst of it, and have the sense of participation of seeing it with their own eyes," he said. "You don't settle for a film of the Grand Canyon, you go there, and that's what people can get with television."

"That's what happened with people watching the gulf war on CNN and some of the other networks," he said. "That's a different event in the history of the world. I think it had something to do with the outcome of the war, and it certainly something to do with the way diplomacy proceeded."

The Educational Communications Center at K-State has been using this technology to produce over 200 television programs a year, said David Deitch, professor of journalism and mass communications.

Deitch said K-State has the best video production facilities in the Midwest. ECC has two satellite uplinks, one is a fixed unit mounted on top of Dole Hall, and the other is attached to a mobile production truck.

All programs produced this year were done in the mobile production unit while Dole Hall was being constructed, Deitch said.

ECC produces educational programs that are sent to high schools in about 10 states.

"We're primarily oriented towards serving the community. The main users of our programs are rural high schools," Deitch said. "It allows them to talk with scientists and professors, and makes it viable for the get educational opportunities they normally couldn't afford."

The programs work on a two-way audio and one-way video system.

The program is sent to a receiving site, and if someone wants to participate, they can call in and talk to the presenter, he said.

The equipment is used for many other purposes as well. It has been used to make programs for the grain science industry and the American Bar Association and has done feeds to other networks when they wanted to interview someone from K-State.

"During the gulf crisis, we used this quite often because people wanted to interview people on campus," Deitch said.

The programs also allow students enrolled in video classes to get hands-on experience with state-of-the-art equipment.

There are three video classes offered at K-State: Video 1, Video 2 and Video Participation. Video 1 teaches students the basic applications of the production equipment, Video 2 allows students to get in the roll of director or producer and Video Participation is more for hands-on teaching instruction, he said.

"It's very unique that the students are involved in every aspect of production," he said. "Nebraska or Oklahoma University might have similar capabilities but not the kind of student involvement we have."

Soldier mistakenly listed as killed

By the Associated Press

DENVER — A Kansas soldier mistakenly listed as killed in Iraq said Wednesday the Army has tried to give him VIP treatment since he was found alive in a field hospital.

Pfc. Clayton Carpenter of Humboldt said Wednesday he learned his parents had been notified of his death when he was awakened by a nurse at 1:30 a.m. in a field hospital in Saudi Arabia.

"The nurse said a colonel wanted to talk to me. He said by mistake I had been listed as killed in action," Carpenter said at a news conference at Fitzsimons Army Medical Center.

While the Army tried to get a line from a hospital phone, Carpenter went to a field phone in the desert and got through to his mother, Ruth Dillow of Chanute.

Carpenter said it took about a half hour to convince his mother it was really him.

But Carpenter said he told his mother of an accident he had in the fifth grade and details of a friend's death in an auto accident one year ago to convince her.

Carpenter's war experience as a tank mechanic has not gone well from the beginning. He said when the ground war started, he was in an armored convoy heading into Iraq, but the convoy got lost.

"Our convoy turned around and stopped to take a break. Some of the guys walked around looking for souvenirs. Carpenter said one of his buddies picked up a small box about 2 inches square, wrapped in tape and with a little screw or nut on one end.

"We found out later that was the fuse," Carpenter said.

The box exploded, killing two enlisted men and wounding Carpenter in the hand and leg.

Carpenter enlisted in June 1989. He said he is looking forward to getting out so he can go to college.

Carpenter, who admitted he had never had so much attention in his life, said he was looking forward to returning to Kansas in a few days to see the grandmothers, cousins and friends who had been so much support while he was in the front lines.

Paperwork worthwhile at financial aid office

Frustration doesn't outweigh rewards

VICKI KNIGHT
Collegian Reporter

Some students complain about the frustration involved with applying for financial aid, however, most agree the frustration doesn't outweigh the rewards.

Debora Hawthorne, senior in industrial engineering, said all the paperwork is worthwhile to receive money, and even though the lines are sometimes long at the Office of Student Financial Assistance, they do move fast.

Travis Hearn, freshman in commercial art, also said the work is worth the money.

"There is a lot of paper to fill out, but they're dealing with a lot of money," she said.

Anita Huff, interim assistant director, said financial aid is a complicated process. Whenever you're dealing with government funds, you have many forms and regulations to follow.

Students realizing this, and understanding the way the system works, may help with their frustration, Huff added.

A lot of information is needed, Huff said.

"The information we need is as diverse as the student body."

The goal is to get as much student aid to the students as legally possible.

—Larry Moeder

Acting director of student financial assistance

Huff said the best advice she could give students is to read everything and understand it. She said students need to make sure they provide all the information and turn it in on time.

The most important thing students need to remember, Huff said, is to meet the March 15 priority deadline.

Larry Moeder, acting director, said the students' applications that are in for the first round of awarding will receive the more attractive forms of financial aid and will receive award letters around the third week of April.

A lot is taken into consideration when dealing with financial aid, Moeder said, but the criteria for financial aid is not decided by the K-State office, but by a federal formula set by Congress.

Moeder said students can appeal the results of their financial aid by reporting any circumstances that aren't reflected on the application, such as medical bills, farm losses and unemployment.

During the appeals process, financial aid counselors try to help the students get the best financial aid package possible by giving them advice on how to fill out the forms correctly.

"The goal is to get as much student aid to the students as legally possible," Moeder said.

Even though there is much frustration, Huff said, students are grateful when they receive answers and get help on a personal level.

Kafity

"Then we had to stand in line for bread. Hundreds stood in lines to get it. It was hard to find things. If you could find it, it was three times more expensive than usual," Kafity said.

"I myself used to love Saddam Hussein during the Iran-Iraq War. Kuwaitis gave him money. Then he went berserk."

"They stole everything out of Kuwait," he said. "They even stole the big cranes from the ports. They burned palaces and took the marble tiles from the floors."

Until the Iraqis invaded, the Kuwaiti people did not believe it would happen, Kafity said. The common people didn't know anything, and the governments hid the problems from the people.

Kafity said the Iraqis destroyed mail and telecommunications centers. There was no Kuwaiti television, but his family could get stations out of Saudi Arabia, Bahrain and other places.

They could also receive radio stations, including the BBC and Voice of America. He said the Iraqis tried to jam the stations several times.

"After the invasion, there were no newspapers other than Iraqi ones. We didn't open the paper sometimes even though it had announcements about school. We didn't rely on it," Kafity said. "A television station out of Bahrain had cable from 9 p.m. to midnight, and we would watch CNN."

Kafity left Kuwait in early November with his uncle, after going through the difficult process of getting new identification from the Iraqis, he said.

He traveled through Iraq into Jordan by bus before flying to Detroit to his aunt's home. Kafity returned to K-State in January.

"Now I've lost all my friends; I have lost all contact. They are all over the world now. One of my friends is in Russia studying," Kafity said.

Kafity said his family has been trying to get a green card so they may come to America and live.

Cheerleaders qualify for Nationals

By the Collegian Staff

For the second-consecutive year and the fourth time in the last six seasons, the K-State Cheerleading Squad has qualified for the National College Cheerleading Championships.

K-State placed fourth in its region and is one of just 16 teams in its division to qualify for the national championships, which will be April 5-6 at SeaWorld in San Antonio, Texas.

"This is a great honor for Kansas State, especially to go two years in a row," said Scott Johnson, cheerleader adviser. "We've put in a awful lot of hard work because this competition has become very competitive in the last couple of years."

To qualify for the championships, K-State submitted a video of various routines and cheers, which were graded on technical merit. The tape also included a segment of highlights from various sporting events throughout the year, showing the cheerleaders' ability to lead and work with the crowd.

In a separate competition, Willie the Wildcat was chosen as one of four mascots in the nation to compete in a similar event at the national championships. John Bartel, who plays Willie, qualified as the third-best mascot in the country.

Cheerleaders to compete in the championships include team captain Tara Calgren, Tara Farley, Mary Kunkel, Michelle Oetting, Brenda Paquette, Angie Smith, Jill Washington, Gary Hicks, James McDuffett, Dean Robbins, Mike Powell, Kurt Stoner, Brian Shelinbarger and Greg Winn.

The championships are scheduled to be televised on a tape-delayed basis by ESPN, although a date has yet to be determined.

Common Questions About AIDS

What is AIDS?

AIDS is characterized by a defect in natural immunity against disease. People who have AIDS are vulnerable to serious illnesses which would not be a threat to anyone whose immune system was functioning normally. These illnesses are referred to as "opportunistic" infections or diseases.

What causes AIDS?

AIDS is caused by a virus HIV (human immunodeficiency virus). Infection with this virus does not always lead to AIDS. Many infected persons remain in good health. Others may develop illness varying in severity from mild to extremely serious.

How is HIV transmitted?

HIV is spread by sexual contact, needle sharing, or less commonly, through transfused blood or its components. The risk of infection with the virus is increased by having multiple sexual partners, either homosexual or heterosexual, and sharing of needles among those using illicit drugs. The virus may be transmitted also from infected mother to infant.

Can AIDS be spread through casual contact?

Casual contact with AIDS patients or infected persons does not place others at risk for getting the illness. No cases have been found where the virus has been transmitted by casual household contact with AIDS patients or infected persons. Infants with AIDS or HIV infection have not transmitted the infection to family members living in the same household.

What is the difference between the infection and the disease?

Having HIV infection indicates that you have been exposed to the HIV virus and are carrying antibodies against the virus in your blood. Some of those who demonstrate the presence of HIV antibodies do not develop any clinical signs of the disease. When a person begins to show clinical signs, then they are considered to either have AIDS-related complex (ARC) or AIDS itself, depending upon the clinical signs exhibited and the type of disease complex that is present within that individual.

Who gets HIV infection?

Ninety percent of the AIDS cases have occurred with two groups of people: sexually active homosexual or bisexual men, and present or past abusers of intravenous drugs. Another 8 percent has been accounted for by persons who require blood transfusions, infants born to infected mothers, or heterosexual contacts with someone with AIDS.

What are its symptoms?

Many individuals infected with AIDS virus have no symptoms and feel well. Some develop symptoms which may include tiredness, fever, loss of appetite and weight, diarrhea, night sweats and swollen glands (lymph nodes)—usually in the neck, armpits or groin. Anyone with these symptoms which continue for more than two weeks should see a physician. It must be emphasized that these symptoms are seen with many diseases and by themselves are not indicative of AIDS.

How is HIV diagnosed?

The diagnosis of HIV depends on the presence of opportunistic diseases that indicated the loss of immunity. Certain tests such as Elisa and Western Blot, which demonstrate damage to various parts of the immune system, such as specific types of white blood cells, support the diagnosis. The presence of opportunistic diseases plus a positive test for antibodies to HIV can also make possible a diagnosis of AIDS.

How is AIDS treated?

Currently, there are no antiviral drugs available anywhere that have been proven to cure AIDS, although the search for such drugs is being pursued vigorously. Some drugs such as AZT have been found that inhibit the AIDS virus. Though no treatment has yet been successful in restoring the immune system of an AIDS patient, physicians have had some success in using drugs, radiation and surgery to treat the various illnesses of AIDS patients. Therapeutic agents are needed for all stages of AIDS.

Can AIDS be prevented?

YES! Cases of AIDS related to medical use of blood or blood products are being prevented by use of HIV antibody screening tests at blood donor sites. Personal prevention can also be practiced to assure safety from infection. In simplest terms personal prevention can be practiced in two ways: Don't use intravenous drugs. If you do, don't share needles or syringes. Secondly, don't have sex. If you do, practice safe sex. Safe sex means not having sex with people who may be infected or protecting yourself by taking precautions to prevent contact with the person's body fluids. Further information is provided through materials disseminated at the Lafene Student Health Center, Riley County Public Health, The Counseling Center or contacting the referral sources listed below.

STUDENT CONCERNS

1. If a student suspects that he or she has AIDS what should the student do?

If the student is uncertain of his or her medical condition and seeks help, the University encourages the student to get a medical evaluation. Lafene Health Center offers confidential testing. If the student prefers, the health center can refer the student to an off campus physician or agency familiar with AIDS for a confidential medical evaluation. Riley County Public Health offers confidential and anonymous testing. In any case the evaluation will include counseling before and after diagnosis.

2. How will the University respond to complaints of discrimination or harassment against students with AIDS, or who have positive HIV test results, or who simply are perceived to be in high-risk groups?

The University will respond to any conflict or harassment first by using informal means to counsel and educate the individuals involved. However, if harassment continues, such conduct will be dealt with as a student disciplinary matter under the established procedures for hearing discrimination complaints. There is a five member Student Discrimination Review Committee that will hear the complaint and report the findings to the President for necessary action. If a student has a complaint of discrimination or harassment, he or she should call the Affirmative Action Office (532-6220) or the Dean of Student Life (532-6432).

3. What are the provisions of the University's student health insurance program that relate to AIDS?

The current contractor, Blue Cross Blue Shield, treats AIDS as any other illness. However, there is a clause prohibiting payment for any preexisting condition. This contract is negotiated annually.

4. What are the guidelines regarding participation in campus activities?

A. Housing: Residence Halls and Organized Living Groups

Residence hall, family housing and employment opportunities in Department of Housing and Dining Services will be made available to persons having tested positively for HIV under the same conditions as applicable to any individual. In addition, attempts will be made to meet the special housing needs of its residents. The Department of Housing and Dining Services has established guidelines, educational programs and resources to meet the needs of all residents and employees.

1. What will the University do if a professor has AIDS?

The first response to an individual who has AIDS must be compassion. The University will seek to accommodate a faculty member's medical condition to permit the individual to remain actively at work so long as possible. Since casual contact does not cause AIDS, a professor with AIDS, so long as he or she can teach and function in an academic setting, remains eligible to teach and to perform research and other responsibilities. The University's response to concerns of this nature will be to offer education about AIDS, including appropriate counseling and medical information, to those involved.

If a professor has AIDS and is unable to teach a class, arrangements will be made for others to teach the class. The University has personnel guidelines on medical disability; if this professor is totally unable to carry out assigned duties, he or she can be placed on leave. Disability income benefits begin after 180 days of continuous and total disability.

2. What if an employee in a food service has AIDS?

The University will follow the Center for Disease Control recommendations of "exercising care in the handling of food." Those recommendations state: "All epidemiologic and laboratory evidence indicates that bloodborne and sexually transmitted infections are not transmitted during the preparation or serving of food or beverages," and no instances of HIV transmission have been documented in such circumstances. However, the CDC guidelines do recognize the need for special training and precautions in this area.

It is recommended that all food service workers should follow standards and practices of good personal hygiene and food sanitation. All food service workers should exercise care to avoid injury to hands when preparing food. Should such an injury occur, both aesthetic and sanitary considerations would dictate that food contaminated with blood be discarded. Food service workers known to be infected with AIDS need not be restricted from work unless they have evidence of other infection or illness for which any food service worker should be restricted. Again, the University will offer education about AIDS and appropriate referral for counseling through the Employee Assistance Program (EAP).

3. How will the University respond to concerns by an employee that his or her co-worker or supervisor has AIDS?

The University will seek to accommodate a staff member's medical condition to permit the individual to remain actively at work so long as possible. Again, it must be stressed that casual contact does not cause AIDS.

The University recognizes the independent nature of Greek Chapter Houses and offers them the educational, health, and student service resources of the University community in dealing with problems relative to AIDS or positive HIV tests.

B. Classrooms and Laboratories

The risk of contracting AIDS in the classroom is considered so unlikely that no particular procedures are recommended. If, in fact, fellow students and classmates have fears and concerns regarding AIDS, it would be in their best interest to obtain information about the disease and to address the issue directly through an educational program.

Should a person with AIDS be involved in a laboratory accident that breaks the skin, the laboratory instructor or anyone who may assist the injured person should be aware of the situation. In other words, the injured person should inform the people assisting him or her of the circumstances.

C. Athletic Activities

Most sports are contact sports where contact with others is encouraged, allowed, or occurs on a regular basis. Injuries in contact sports may result in wounds to participants. Persons with AIDS or positive HIV antibodies should discuss the advisability of participation in sports with their physician taking particular care to avoid contact sports which may produce collision injuries or wounds. When wounds occur to carriers of the HIV virus, a spread of disease conceivably may occur. Should wounds occur, the participant has the responsibility to inform the others of the possibility of contamination.

5. What will be the University's response to a student who has AIDS and as a consequence has difficulty completing the work of a course?

The University will not discriminate against a student because of AIDS. The University's existing policies regarding students who suffer from a medical problem that prevents them from completing their classwork would apply to a student with AIDS.

6. Will a student-employee who has AIDS be permitted to continue working?

Yes, as outlined below under "Personnel Concerns."

PERSONNEL CONCERNS

The University would hope that these concerns would be resolved by counseling and education about AIDS. Unless medically justified, the University will not transfer or change working conditions because an employee has AIDS or because of concerns about a co-worker having AIDS.

4. What will the University do if an employee has AIDS?

The University will seek to accommodate a staff member's medical condition to permit the individual to remain actively at work as long as possible. For assistance in determining reasonable accommodations the Affirmation Action and Personnel Services offices should be contacted. Decisions in all situations will be made on a case-by-case determination, based on the medical facts of each case and with concern for the best interest of all involved. The University will offer education about AIDS and appropriate referral for counseling through the Employee Assistance Program (EAP). The University also can provide counseling and education to co-workers to better understand AIDS.

5. What are the provisions of employee health and life insurance policies, including disability and survivorship provisions?

There is no provision in any of the University's current employee insurance policies specifically regarding AIDS; it is treated as any other chronic illness.

Disability insurance would be paid after 180 days of continuous and total disability. Life insurance benefits would be paid to the named beneficiary. It should be noted that the life insurance program provides that an employee may name any individual as a beneficiary.

6. What office should be contacted if there is a complaint about discrimination?

The Affirmative Action Office handles complaints of discrimination. The Rehabilitation Act of 1973, Section 503 and 504, prohibits discrimination against persons with AIDS (or any communicable disease).

7. Will the University require that prospective employees be tested for this HIV antibody?

No.

8. Are employee records confidential?

Personnel who handle records are instructed on the confidentiality issue. It is a violation to University policy for employees to improperly release information from personnel files. The University will not give out confidential information about students or employees except where required by law or when authorized to do so by a student or employee.

If you have any questions about AIDS, HIV, testing, etc., please call Cindy Burke, Health Educator at Lafene Student Health Center, at 532-6595, or Don Fallon, Chair, Communicable Disease Committee at 532-6432. In a hangar on the Marshall Air Field at Fort Riley, about 1,000 people attend a memorial service for the 18 service men and women killed in Operation Desert Storm.

Soldiers remembered with memorial

ELVYN JONES
City/Government Editor

Lives are lost in all wars, even ones as quick as the recent battle for Kuwait. At Fort Riley Thursday, the 1st Infantry Division and surrounding communities took time away from the joy and celebration of victory to remember the 18 soldiers of the 1st Division who died in Operation Desert Storm.

At the start of the memorial,

Chaplain Thomas Decker called the roll of the 1st Division dead. Those killed were Spec. Melford R. Collins, Spec. Kenneth J. Perry, Pfc. Robert L. Daugherty, Spec. Steven Trautman, Pfc. Mark Miller, Sgt. David Douthitt, Sgt. Cheryl L. O'Brien, Warrant Officer John K. Morgan, Warrant Officer George Swartzendruber, 1st Lt. Donald P. Tillar, Sgt. Lee Belas, Sgt. 1st Class Gary E. Streeter, Spec. Jason C. Carr, Staff Sgt. Jonathan H. Kamm, Pfc. Rueben G. Kirk, Spec. Roy T.

Damian, Warrant Officer David G. Plasch and Spec. Troy M. Wedgewood.

Acting base commander, Colonel Gary LaGrange told the crowd of about 1,400, which included family members of the dead, their presence at the memorial was a continuation of the outpouring of support the surrounding communities have shown the 1st Division since their deployment to the gulf. He asked the people to remember the value of the sacrifice the soldiers made.

The small number of dead from the war did not diminish the grief felt by those who lost loved ones, LaGrange said.

Chaplain Marion Pember said there is guilt among the survivors of the 1st Division and the surrounding communities because the joy everyone feels about the quick victory seems to overshadow the grief for the few deaths.

People can deal with that guilt by making their lives a living memorial to those who died, he said. To do so, they should make the cause the soldiers died for, freedom from aggressors, their own.

"I knew all those who were in aviation," he said. "It's hard."

"The many friends of the dead soldiers will keep their memory alive at Fort Riley," Wiseman said.

1st Infantry Division soldiers expected to return home soon

By the Associated Press

FORT RILEY — As negotiations continue with Iraqi leaders, 1st Infantry Division soldiers hold their positions on the Iraq-Kuwait border.

Maj. Gen. Thomas Rhame, commanding general of the Big Red One, said his troops will remain until a formal agreement is signed.

"Immediately upon that signing you can expect that we will withdraw from here well within the central portion of Saudi Arabia where our living conditions will be much better," Rhame said during a telephone press conference from northern Kuwait.

Rhame could not specify when the troops might return to the base, but he said he has heard speculation ranging from two to four months.

"This was an unprecedented attack in terms of speed and distance," he said. "The division covered more than 150 miles in less than 100 hours of constant combat. And within that time, the division destroyed more than 400 Iraqi tanks and more than 400 other Iraqi armored vehicles and captured 10,100 Iraqi prisoners of war."

The division engaged elements of the Republican Guard, he said.

"We have a magnificent quality of soldiers. They executed very violent attacks against the enemy and at the same time showed a great deal of compassion on dealing with the enemy who desired to surrender."

He said his division captured the portion of Iraqi soil where peace talks are taking place and that the Iraqi delegation has been escorted to and from the talks by his soldiers.

Some U.S. troops will be streaming home from the Persian Gulf at a pace of 5,000 a day barring a new outbreak of fighting, Defense Secretary Dick Cheney said Thursday.

Freed American prisoners of war will return almost immediately, perhaps for a Sunday ceremony at Andrews Air Force Base near Washington, the Pentagon said.

Cheney, in an interview, outlined chances for a far speedier return for most of the 540,000 U.S. troops than had been disclosed.

The defense secretary disclosed the plan as Pentagon spokesman Pete Williams said all the U.S. POWs who had been Iraqi captives would be returning on a single plane within a few days, perhaps as early as Sunday.

Local church service honors Women's Day

Minister uses feminine reference to Christ

ERWIN SEBA
Staff Reporter

Above the circle of 23 worshippers in All Faiths Chapel Thursday night was a photograph of a statue of the Crucified Savior.

In the framed photograph resting on a music stand, the arms are spread because of nails driven through the hands. The left knee is bent so the left foot rests on top of the right, both held in place by a single nail.

In death, her head, crowned with thorns, is bent forward and to the right.

As the worshippers listened, the Rev. Susan Sawyer, an Episcopal priest and the American Baptist campus minister, explained that the service celebrating International Women's Day would be an experiment in using exclusively feminine language to refer to God and Christ.

"Many of our mystics referred to Jesus as mother and sister," Sawyer said. "As Christ, Jesus really does transcend gender roles."

Sawyer said she was not advocating using gender-exclusive language in all worship services.

"I think it would be just as crippling to use feminine nouns and pronouns exclusively as using masculine pronouns and nouns exclusively is," she said.

As the worship celebration progressed, the 20 women and three men heard the creation story from Genesis, in which God created woman in her own image and gave woman dominion over all the Earth.

And in the crucifixion story from the Gospel of Matthew, Christ remained silent when Pilate asked her if she was the queen of heaven.

Many of our mystics referred to Jesus as mother and sister. As Christ, Jesus really does transcend gender roles.

—the Rev. Susan Sawyer Episcopal priest and American Baptist campus minister

After the service, Sawyer led the worshippers in a discussion of their reactions to God and Christ described exclusively as women.

Judy Deaton, sophomore in social work, said the service diminished the alienation she felt toward the Christian religion.

"I always sort of felt on the outside," Deaton said. "It wasn't fully a part of me. This helps me to internalize it so much deeper."

Another participant said she found her view of spirituality changed because of the service.

"This is my first contact with any spirituality that is nurturing and caring and vulnerable, too," said Jana Leep, senior in psychology, women's studies and English.

Sawyer said she had a similar feeling of empowerment as she worked to change the crucifixion story from masculine-exclusive language to feminine-exclusive language.

"Well, if she could be up there on the cross, I felt closer to her rather than distant. I was feeling empowered and sort of scared at the same time," Sawyer said. "In my business, bishops are sort of it, and I just saw all of the bishops going 'bad girl.'"

The Rev. Jo Anne Wright, priest at St. Luke's Episcopal Church in Wamego, explained the relationship between the historical Jesus and the Christ story.

"On the one hand, without the historical Jesus, we have a nice fairy tale," Wright said. "On the other hand, the story is much bigger than a historical person. I believe in a historical living figure. That's one of the reasons I have trouble with feminine language when it comes to Jesus. It's important to me to know that God came into the world through a living, breathing person."

Senate approves activity fee hike

ANDY CAPPS
Collegian Reporter

After three hours of confusing arguments and formal legislative procedures, Student Senate passed a line-item increase for College Council, but decided to further review amendments to the bill.

The bill, proposed by the Student Senate Finance Committee, would increase the student activity fee 25 cents for full-time students and 8 cents for part-time students.

This would increase the line item to $1.75 for full-time students and 50 cents for part-time students.

The line item for College Council has not been increased in 16 years. All previous bills allow a College Council to retain its unused funds in individual reserve accounts.

The increase in the amount of money available to a council through its reserves account may decrease the amount of special allocations forwarded by a specific council.

Because of the confusion the bill created, senators voted to send seven amendments to the bill back to the finance committee to be written in an understandable manner.

Jim Struber, education senator, said the proposal was causing confusion and should be reviewed again by the finance committee.

The seven amendments to the bill concern Student Senate's handling of the additional funding made available. The increases from the activity fees could raise as much as $8,700, depending on enrollment.

As many as four motions to the bill were discussed at once, and some senators said they had no idea what was being talked about.

In normal legislative procedure, bills are brought to Senate, heard by the body and then either approved or rejected.

Thursday, the finance committee introduced two different bills with additions and omissions during the first two hours of Senate and a recess.

Because it was viewed as unacceptable procedure by some senators, the amendments to the bill were not considered at that time. Senate voted to send the amendments back for review by the finance committee.

As it stands now, the finance committee will review and draw up another proposal to be heard by Student Senate no later than March 28.

Senate also passed a bill that would allow the communications committee to spend $375.80 for 3,000 pamphlets to be printed by K-State Printing Services.

A resolution discussed in last week's Senate meeting was read again and turned down by Senate. The resolution designates the second week of April Disability Awareness Week.

Joel Gruenke, graduate student senator, said it was useless for Senate to become involved by just attaching a title to the week.

The resolution was drawn up as a bill to be voted on by Senate. The bill, as proposed, would allow Senate to create a committee to coordinate the week's activities and to select a senator or intern to serve on the committee.

House approves cut to highway fund

JIM STRUBER
Collegian Reporter

The Kansas House of Representatives Appropriations Committee recently approved a $30 million cut from the Kansas Department of Transportation budget for fiscal year 1992.

The move was approved by an 11-10 decision in the committee, but there is bipartisan support in the House for the highway cuts for differing reasons.

However, there is also opposition to the measure, and it may not pass both houses of the state Legislature.

Appropriations Committee Chairman Rep. George Teagarden, D-LaCygne, said he supported the committee's decision to cut $30 million from the KDOT budget request of $740 million for fiscal year 1992.

Currently, 10 percent of the state general fund goes to KDOT. The committee decision didn't affect any current laws because the 1/4 cent tax increase dedicated to the highway fund won't be used on other programs.

"If you take $30 million out of the KDOT budget, it still amounts to only a 5 percent cut," Teagarden said. "We made a transfer from the highway fund to the general fund. We didn't cut its budget. We required them to make a payment to the general fund. I don't believe it will be very harmful to the overall budget."

Teagarden said that unless additional revenue measures are approved, the highway program should share in some of the current budget cuts.

"We have to cut $58 million from the 1992 budget to make everything balance," Teagarden said.

A committee member, Rep. Jim Lowther, R-Emporia, said he also supported the KDOT cut.

Lowther said the highway fund should sustain a major reduction because the general fund can't be hit for $78 million. He said he reluctantly voted for increasing the transfer of general funds from 6.5 to 10 percent for the highway fund three years ago.

However, since that time, the highway proposal has increased several million dollars, and there are now serious deficiencies in spending for education and social service funding, he said.

"The money cut from the KDOT budget could be spent better to prevent the devastating cuts to the Regent's system, especially K-State," Lowther said. "We should fund these prior commitments."

"We need that money for many other things, but the highway supporters feel it must remain intact," he said. "I feel there was a commitment to fund the Margin of Excellence. Those commitments don't seem to mean a great deal because things change from year to year."

"This will be a one-year cut. I don't see it damaging the highway program," Lowther said. "$30 million will fund the MOE, plus provide needed money to help fund the gifted-student program and aid for infants and dependent mothers. I feel that is more important than 30 miles of newly-constructed highway."

Committee member, Sheila Hochhauser, D-Manhattan, also voted in favor of cutting the highway fund.

Hochhauser said there was enough support in the House to approve the committee decision, and she said the cuts wouldn't hurt the highway program or delay any projects.

"It won't. The department of transportation even said it won't hurt the highway program," Hochhauser said. "This is a one-time transfer delay of funds. The funds will stay in the state general fund."

However, Sen. Don Montgomery, R-Sabetha, said the money was part of the long-range plan to improve Kansas highways. The Legislature approved a 25 cent tax increase and increased registration fees for vehicles to fund the highway program.

Montgomery said there was another proposal to cut $300 million in a span of eight years from the highway fund. The bill would reduce the demand transfer for the highway fund from the general fund from 10 percent to 6.5 percent.

"This was all done in the comprehensive highway plan we passed a year ago," Montgomery said. "I hope we don't touch the money designated for highways because it was specifically earmarked for highways and not to use in other budgets."

"The governor says she isn't supporting the measure, but she did know about the request to put the construction of highway 177 on hold. We are having a meeting with her today (Thursday) to discuss this."

Authorities control Albanian ports

VIENNA, Austria (AP) — Albanian authorities Thursday clamped military control on three major ports to halt a chaotic exodus of people.

Authorities stepped up security in the capital of Tirana after at least one person was killed in clashes with police.

The move came as Italy asked Tirana to stop the flow of refugees and pledged more aid to Europe's poorest nation.

Tens of thousands of Albanians have fled Albania the past week, many across the Adriatic Sea for Italy and others overland to neighboring Yugoslavia.

Sudafed manufacturer offers reward

SEATTLE (AP) — Burroughs Wellcome Co., the manufacturer of Sudafed 12 Hour decongestant capsules, offered a $100,000 reward Thursday for information leading to a conviction in a cyanide tampering case that caused two deaths.

Philip Tracy, president and chief executive officer of the North Carolina-based company announced the reward at a news conference in Seattle.

Also Thursday, the FBI reported laboratory tests found cyanide in one of three altered capsules recovered after the tamperings were announced and a nationwide recall of Sudafed 12 Hour capsules was issued.

William Gore, FBI special-agent-in-charge in Seattle, said the cyanide-laced capsule was recovered March 3 from a Kmart store in Lakewood, a Tacoma, Wash., suburb.

Two people died of cyanide poisoning and one fell seriously ill last month in Washington state after taking Sudafed capsules.

In all, six tampering cases are suspected. Three capsules that appear to have been tampered with were recovered this week.

KU, state plan cleanup of dump

LAWRENCE (AP) — The University of Kansas and state officials have agreed on a plan to clean up a school waste dump near DeSoto.

The university and its medical center buried laboratory by-products at the Sunflower Research Disposal Site, a federally licensed landfill on KU property, from 1965 to 1982.

A family which owns land next to the dump, just east of Lawrence, filed a lawsuit last year claiming cancer-causing materials leaked from the landfill into their well water.

KU maintains the landfill poses no health risk, but wants to prevent future groundwater contamination from buried chemical solvents.

Frances Horowitz, KU's vice chancellor for research, graduate studies and public service, said the agreement will permit work to proceed so that concerns about the landfill may be addressed.

Chancellor Gene Budig and Stanley Grant of the state Department of Health and Environment signed the agreement this week, outlining monitoring activities.

The agreement specifies a timetable for KU to gather information and for the department to act on various reports and recommendations.

Kansas corporation receives grant

TOPEKA (AP) — The Kansas Technology Enterprise Corporation has received a $12 million grant to assist small manufacturers gain expertise in the latest technology.

Gov. Joan Finney announced Thursday that the U.S. Department of Commerce has awarded KTEC the money to help build a $12.9 million Mid-American Manufacturing Technology Center in Overland Park.

KTEC, a state agency that provides financing for new businesses, was selected by the National Institute of Standards and Technology.

The new center for technology transfer will help smaller companies in the region with various types of technology, including sensors, robots and computer-aided design.

House tentatively approves tax breaks

TOPEKA (AP) — The House tentatively approved a plan designed to give property tax breaks to home owners and small businesses, but rejected proposals to cut car owners' property taxes.

Representatives advanced the measure, 79-41, to a final vote Friday. It is a proposed constitutional amendment to change the figures counties use to determine how much different classes of property are worth on the tax rolls.

Proposed amendments must garner a two-thirds majority, or 84 of 125 House votes, to win adoption. Supporters must pick up five votes if every representative who voted to advance the measure votes for it on final action.

The proposed amendment would cut the value of homes, apartment complexes and business real estate for tax purposes. It would increase the value of utility property and business machinery.

Huet-Vaughn charged with desertion

FORT LEONARD WOOD, Mo. (AP) — An Army doctor who left her unit as it prepared to deploy to Saudi Arabia has been charged with desertion.

The Army said Thursday that Capt. Yolanda Huet-Vaughn was formally charged Wednesday.

Huet-Vaughn has been performing administrative duties at the base hospital while the Army investigated the case, the military said in a news release. She will continue that work but now will be confined to the base.

An Army officer has been assigned to further investigate, the military said. The officer then will recommend action to Huet-Vaughn's commanding officer.

The recommendations could include dismissal or modification of the charge, a court martial or administrative action, the Army said.

The stiffest penalty faced by Huet-Vaughn is five years hard labor, dismissal from the military and forfeiture of all future pay.

An attorney for Huet-Vaughn, Louis Font of Boston, said she would defend herself by arguing that an officer has a duty to disobey any order he or she considers immoral. Huet-Vaughn maintained that going to the Persian Gulf and providing medical treatment would have been immoral because it would have supported military attacks on Iraqi troops and civilians.

Bo Peep crowning to end symposium

1991 Sheep Day has kickoff tonight starting with trade show, workshops

ARLOAH FAIRCHILD
Collegian Reporter

The 1991 Kansas Sheep Symposium-KSU Sheep Day will start tonight at 7 p.m. with the Early Bird Trade Show and continue Saturday at 8 a.m.

"During the day Saturday, several workshops will be given by experts from K-State, veterinarians and professionals in the sheep business," said Clifford Spaeth, associate professor of animal science and industry.

Spaeth said despite the lower pre-registration numbers, organizers of the symposium hope to have 300 people attend.

"There aren't that many registered yet, but that doesn't mean much since there is no reason to pre-register," he said.

Speakers to be featured will be from the American Sheep Industry Association, Kansas Sheep Association, K-State, U.S. Department of Agriculture and Southwestern Technical School, Spaeth said.

"Later in the afternoon, there will be programs designed specifically for youth," Spaeth said. "We are trying to make this day one the whole family can enjoy."

He said one of the events planned for young people is the lamb scramble.

Mary Mertz, coordinator of the trade show, said while the children are wrestling with the lamb, the adults will be viewing the products of 25 different exhibitors from Kansas, Minnesota, Indiana and Colorado that will be at the trade show this year. Among these, will be four purebred exhibits.

"The breeds that will be represented are Rambouillets, Polypay, Horned and Polled Dorset and Targhee," Mertz said. "Other exhibits will include sheep equipment dealers, veterinary supplies, feed bunks and pharmaceutical suppliers."

"K-State will have two exhibits using computers. One display will have a program called 'What If' and the other computer display will have information on early sheep pregnancy detection."

The KSA banquet will conclude the symposium Saturday night at the Ramada Inn. Tom McBeth, poet, will be the featured speaker. Kansas 1991 Miss Bo Peep and Princess will be crowned; the winners of the lamb scramble will be announced and door prizes will be awarded.

Women celebrate day with worldwide events

VICKI KNIGHT
Collegian Reporter

Thursday was International Women's Day.

Margaret Mara, instructor in Women's Studies, explained International Women's Day began in 1975 when the United Nations declared 1975 as "Year of the Woman."

Mara said after seeing a year was not enough time to devote to it, the U.N. extended it by declaring 1975-85 the decade for women.

Since '75, women have been celebrating this day with different events throughout the world.

Mara said communities have speakers or parades. She said one community dresses up as historical female figures, such as those who worked for suffrage reasons or women's rights.

The Women's Studies department at K-State planned a walk to commemorate International Women's Day, but they thought since it was the day before spring break, participation would be small. Instead, Mara said, they are starting efforts for planning next year's celebration.

One activity organized to celebrate International Women's Day was a church service led by Susan Sawyer, the campus American Baptist minister, Thursday night at All Faiths Chapel.

The service was structured as a traditional Christian church is today, but all gender words were feminine. All masculine words, even those pertaining to God and Jesus were changed to feminine words, Sawyer said.

The service was a experimental program to provide people with the opportunity to hear "she" and "mother" instead of "him" and "father," Sawyer said.

Sawyer said she presented feminine images of God exclusively and then provided an opportunity to reflect, regardless of what the reactions were.

Sawyer said she presented feminine images of God exclusively and then provided an opportunity to reflect, regardless of what the reactions were.

"It (International Women's Day) is an opportunity to give thanks for the diversity of sisters in the world and a chance to reflect on how we might recognize our sisterhood more completely."

Marlene Howell, instructor of Women's Studies, said this day connects women from around the world.

She said she has friends as far away as Nicaragua who celebrate International Women's Day.

Group aids inner selves

Expressing unconscious focus of program

BETH PALMER
Collegian Reporter

To passers-by it looks like they are talking to an empty chair, but in actuality, they are talking to their dreams.

The new Inner Journey to Awareness group at the Women's Resource Center teaches individuals how to get in touch with their inner self.

"It is getting in touch with our own creative process," said Marilyn Mick, coordinator of the group.

The group does this by using expressions of the unconscious such as dreams, fantasies and active imagination. While sitting in a group, individuals focus on their dreams and let their minds interpret the symbols.

"We use Gestalt methods of awareness," Mick said. "We become the dream symbol and let the symbol speak to us."

One person in a group of four will sit in the middle, facing an empty chair, and envision his or her dream symbol sitting in the chair. The group will then speak to it and ask it questions.

Next, the person changes places and becomes the dream symbol. As the symbol, the person tries to answer their own questions by answering how they think the symbol would.

By doing this, they try to experience the symbol, Mick said. Dreams serve to give people the symbols needed to understand conflict.

"This is based on the idea of a lot of uneasiness within our personalities," Mick said. "It is due to parts of ourself fighting with one another."

You learn how to interpret dreams and fantasies by experiencing the dialogue that emerges from the symbols, Mick said.

"Dreams speak in a symbolic language, which is different than left-brain thinking," she said. "Left-brain is based on dualism and concepts."

Nightmares are an interesting part because they are a part of ourselves, Mick said. It's a part of ourselves we're not aware of. An ignored part often tries to be seen and recognized into the personality.

The work is based on Dr. Carl Jung, a Swiss psychiatrist, who believed we all have our own uniqueness, she said.

"Sometimes our cultural conditioning interferes with that uniqueness being expressed through our

Chicago jerks conventions into public view

Thank goodness for Judy Chicago. For those of you who missed her University Convocation lecture Feb. 28, you missed out. This battle-worn, social scrapper presented a two-hour "no bones about it" speech that prompted some people to leave fired up and feminist and others cursing and offended.

Her very history is a study in conflict. Since her undergraduate days at UCLA, Chicago has been struggling to come to grips with her identity as a female artist and a citizen in a country where the white, male, middle-class system has been the maintained paradigm. One of her major works is the infamous "The Dinner Party," a mammoth work celebrating a collection of women who have suffered the injustice of being buried in history without acknowledgement of their impact within it. This work has been labeled pornographic, obscene and unfit to be seen by the general public. Guess who took it upon themselves to tattoo these stigmas. That's right, the mostly white, male dominated Congress that just happens to be filled with extremely experienced art critics.

However, even a few critics in the mass media, namely the staff of the Washington Post and the New York Times in particular, have found her work far removed from their universal list of morals. These are also the same critics who refer to her fantastically intricate needleworks as "craft" and not "art." I'll save my opinions on that subject for some other discussion in order to get at what I think is the more important issue.

What I believe many critics miss about Judy Chicago's work is the impetus that fostered such controversial products. In merely the attitude she used throughout her speech, one can gather she finds much room for improvement in our society, especially in the realm of gender roles—to mitigate the whole thing about as much as anyone could.

Her method, in its true light, right or wrong, is to literally jerk perhaps unconscious conventions right into the public sphere. Because of this, she has been labeled a feminist in the meanest sense of the word. I'm inclined to label her as a feminist as well, but with an entirely different intention. People like Judy Chicago don't give words like "feminism" a bad rap, it's people like Jessie Helms who do.

As an aside, I think I'm treading on somewhat dangerous ground. I'm leary of what has been called "political correctness" in light of a current popularity increase in the areas of cultural criticism and liberalism. Now that Birkenstock sales are on the rise,

Roblin Meeks

Collegian Columnist

phrases like "racist sexist homophobic pig" are a dime a dozen and too quickly used. (Ed Skoog did a pretty good job of presenting this problem last semester, so I won't retread old ground.)

But in this case, I don't think I'm guilty of that fallacy. Chicago explicitly stated she is not personally attacking particular men, or men as individuals in her work, but is challenging the established male dominance ingrained in our society. So, I do not want to call those who left disgruntled or find Chicago's work offensive sexist. That's not what I'm saying at all.

What I am trying to get across is art exists foremostly as a vehicle to provoke a sentiment in a viewer while allowing a creator expressive freedom. The interpretations of the viewer may differ greatly from the intentions of the creator, but that is a chance taken in any form of creative expression.

On another level (and one that I think Chicago's work is extremely successful), art is a means to challenge established institutions, whether they be governmental, precedential, or otherwise, by provoking the viewer to rethink certain precepts she has come to live by. Oftentimes, pictures or scenes can easily slice through euphemistic standards of obscuring rhetoric and lay bare a question important in the eyes of the creator.

Is that really what Chicago is trying to do, or is she waging a personal war against every single man on the face of the planet? Although I am by no means an expert in her artwork (or art in general for that matter), just by hearing her speak and viewing the few pieces I have, I don't think she's out for masculine blood.

In fact, I think she is trying to promote a new sense of masculinity, one in which a man can easily and without ridicule express his innermost feelings, even if those feelings include the softer and more traditionally feminine qualities. Chicago's collection of paintings as sculpture, titled "Powerplay," is a wonderful illustration of this.

But what about those viewers who don't see it that way, like the people who left personally offended by her aggressive stance and treatment of the slide projectionist? To them, I say I'm sorry it was painful. No one should have to feel apprehensive about his or her sex, which is exactly why she does the things she does, as society has left her feeling apprehensive about her sex.

Is her art pornographic? That is a decision each person should have the opportunity to make for themselves.

I'm not going to attempt to describe any of her artworks, as they are best experienced without bias, mine or any other. I encourage each of you to look for her pieces, whether it be reading her many biographies or actually witnessing a display. If you find it either egregiously obscene or strikingly beautiful, you will at least be moved to react.

Finally, cheers to K-State Convocations for bringing such a valuable speaker to our campus. After all, the University should be a forum for the free exchange of ideas, whether controversial or undisputed. And as long as people like Judy Chicago receive the university exposure they deserve, steps toward a more egalitarian society will continue to be made.

Safety necessary on break

Spring break is finally here. Time to hit the beaches, hit the slopes or go home. Whatever the case, have fun, be careful and use common sense.

Spring break and alcohol seem to go together like hamburgers and french fries. It doesn't matter if you are drinking or not; the person driving in the other lane may be. So buckle your seat belt.

Alcohol is directly involved in 50 percent of all young-adult vehicle deaths. So as you drive to Padre Island, Daytona Beach or the Rocky Mountains, remember, don't drink and drive. Don't let your friends drive drunk. In other words, the sober person drives; the drunk person rides. And if no one is sober, stay wherever you are or call a cab.

Don't think you are an immortal. While you are drinking that enormous amount of alcohol, don't go jumping off balconies. Alcohol is also involved in 50 percent of all deaths from falls.

Another area where safety is a must is sexual activities. If you are going to engage in sexual activities, wear a condom. Comdons are an effective way to be protected from sexually transmitted diseases and AIDS.

Have fun. Use common sense. Come back alive.

Cartoon insulted

Editor,

I would like to respond to the cartoon "Double Barreled" by Daryl Blasi in the March 5 edition of the Collegian. I thought cartoons were supposed to be funny, but insulting a woman's intelligence by condemning her to a life with an abusive husband is uncalled for and degrading. No woman deserves to be punished in that way.

Personally, I was offended with this comment, as were my roommates, friends and women's studies class. Unfortunately, this isn't the first time a comment like this has been made in "Double Barreled."

I am referring to the "Double Barreled" cartoon when it was mentioned that Wonder Woman had a nice butt. Do you think derogatory comments like that are funny? I certainly do not. Daryl, in the future it might be wise to start being a cartoonist instead of a woman basher.

Womyn celebrate

Editor,

International Womyn's Day, March 8, is a day in which womyn all over the world celebrate, reflect upon, renew our commitments to and enjoy our connection with the global family of womyn. This is not a day to be oblivious to the differences among womyn, or to assert that there is a worldwide womyn's movement that touches the lives of all womyn. Rather, it is a day to take a pause to remember the struggles of womyn in the womyn's movements throughout the world, movements defined by the womyn in them, movements that recognize the difference and define it as a source of strength, movements that have indeed challenged injustice and created positive change.

For womyn, it is a day to remember our heritage, the lives of womyn who came before us and womyn who went about the work of setting in motion many of the expanded opportunities we as womyn can enjoy today.

Even those of us who have no interest in the current feminist movement cannot deny that our forefathers' sacrifices opened doors for us. Regardless of our own personal politics, we can honor the politics of our heritage, womyn who recognized that the personal is indeed political and took risks to challenge, and change, their communities and our lives.

International Womyn's Day is also a time to think about, and perhaps thank, womyn in our own lives who are making a difference in our communities. Womyn's work, ideas and dreams have been at the heart of every movement for social justice, and that is as true today as it ever was. When I personally think about womyn in our Manhattan community who touch my life through their example and perseverance, womyn who are taking risks to say what too many of us often do not want to hear, womyn whose political work comes from a deeply rooted commitment to justice, the names do not stop emerging from my heart. Many, many womyn have had a profound and lasting influence on me.

In celebration of International Womyn's Day, I would like to mention just one of them: Talat Rahman of the Manhattan Coalition for Peace in the Middle East. Rahman has taken the risk here on campus, and in the larger Manhattan community, to speak about the current war in the Persian Gulf (No, it's not over). She has put countless hours and energy into making public a point of view regarding this war which many people would like to dismiss as simply "not supportive" or "troublemaking." She is encouraging our community to educate itself, and in so doing, is not only challenging us, but she is educating us as to what a democracy in action can really be about.

In making some people angry and others uncomfortable, she is doing her part to make sure that active dialogue about the war not be silenced in the name of patriotism. It goes without saying that the Manhattan Coalition's work is the combined effort of many people, and at the same time, that Rahman's commitment to justice—not only the theory but the daily grind of the work—is an inspiration that motivates action.

Happy International Womyn's Day, Rahman, and thanks. Happy International Womyn's Day to all womyn.

Posters taken

Editor,

In promoting a Students For Life meeting, posters and fliers were recently distributed across campus. Unfortunately, in less than 24 hours all but one poster had been taken down. It is probably safe to assume this act was perpetrated by a pro-choice faction on campus. It is disappointing that their lack of respect for life is coupled with a lack of respect for property and the free exchange of ideas.

Also, comments were written on some of the fliers that had been tacked up. However, this may actually prove beneficial to the free exchange of ideas; some thoughtful concerns were included. One concern centered on the belief that many women would die if subjected to illegal, unsafe abortions. Some reflection on these facts, though, debunks this myth. According to the National Center for Health Services, deaths from illegal abortions numbered about 120 per year before 1966. By 1972, the year before Roe, the number fell to 39. On the other hand, abortions number 1.5 million per year in the United States.

Some pro-choice factions exaggerate statistics to make their case. In his book "Aborting America," Dr. Bernard Nathanson, who was at one time the director of the largest abortion mill in the United States, admits that claims of 5,000-10,000 deaths per year from illegal abortions were "totally false." He adds, "But in the morality of our revolution, it was a useful figure widely accepted. So why go out of the way to correct it with honest statistics?"

My advice to pro-choicers? Stick to slogans; the facts are not on your side. On the other hand, those who have kept silent need to stand against the deception of the pro-choice movement and stand up for the unborn.

Are you a registered voter in the city of Manhattan? If not, why not?

"No, I am registered in my home county. Since that's where I am during the summer and that's where my permanent address is, it's simpler for me that way."

Jennifer Blanton, freshman in business

"No, because I live near Topeka, and it is just as easy to have it there. I usually vote on the absentee ballot down there."

Alex Johnson, sophomore in business

"No. I just haven't looked into that sort of thing. I guess I should. I will probably change it to here; it may help me get in-state tuition eventually."

Wildcats ready to begin playing in tournament

DAVID SVOBODA
Sports Editor

Every team is 0-0 beginning at 12:10 this afternoon.

That's the scenario — and it's been that way for a few years now — as the Big Eight kicks off its annual conference postseason basketball tournament in Kansas City's Kemper Arena.

Even K-State, who struggled through the league's regular season with a 3-11 mark, has a legitimate shot at the Big Eight's automatic berth in the NCAA Tournament, which goes to the winner of the three-day event.

The Wildcats open play in the tourney at 2:20 against No. 1 seed Oklahoma State. K-State coach Dana Altman said the pairing was not quite what he would have liked.

"We'd have liked to have played Quincy College, but they're not in the Big Eight," Altman said. "But we'll go out and play anyway."

The Cowboys don't even vaguely resemble Quincy. Coach Eddie Sutton's crew is 21-6 overall and earned a share of the conference regular season title with a 10-4 record, including a pair of wins over the Wildcats.

The victories by OSU over K-State were two of the most physical games the Wildcats took part in all season.

"They're big, they're physical," Altman said. "For some reason, Oklahoma State is apparently the most physical team in the Big Eight right now."

The eye in the middle of the Cowboy storm is All-Big Eight performer Byron Houston, who averaged 22.7 points and 10.2 rebounds in his junior campaign.

Houston was one of the combatants in a much-celebrated fight during the second meeting between the two schools. Wylie Howard was the K-State participant.

A Houston elbow ignited the fuse of the otherwise reserved Howard. "As far as elbows are concerned, I don't think anyone can consider that basketball," Howard said.

If you get the idea that the contest might resemble an episode of American Gladiators, you've got great insight.

"We're going to go out and fight you hard, regardless of the situation and our record," said Howard of his teammates, who are 13-14 overall.

K-State will need every bit of fight — not the kind with fists flying — it can muster to down an O-State club that is beginning to age rather nicely, Altman said.

"The last two years, they've started a bunch of freshmen and sophomores," Altman said. "They played Byron as a freshman and a sophomore."

"Those guys have played so many minutes now, it really has helped them. When you get so many combined minutes between some great players, you have a natural process of growth."

Golf squads will travel to Florida

Duo sparks improvement

ERIC BROWN
Sports Reporter

If team trophies were given out for pre-tournament self-expectations, K-State's women's golf team would already be at the award stand in Tampa, Fla., at the Tampa Public Creek Country Club, site of the Northern Illinois Snowbird Classic.

The meet, which will be during spring break, begins March 10, and as coach Russ Bunker said, the team is excited about the opportunity.

"The girls' confidence is a lot higher after beating No. 25 Northern Illinois and three Big Eight teams," Bunker said. "I think the girls feel they could win it. They have set their sights a lot higher and that is going to make us a lot better."

A reason for this confidence starts with this week's Co-Big Eight Players of the Week.

That's right, the Wildcats sport both of them in Adena Hagedorn and Valerie Hahn. The tandem tied for fourth place in leading K-State to a fifth-place finish at the North/South Invitational Feb. 18-19 in Jacksonville, Fla.

Golf in the Sunshine State is also in the spring break plans of Chris Adams, Julie White, Theresa Coyle and Denise Pottle.

Warm temperatures throughout February have given the team a pleasant, yet unexpected, head start.

The team will arrive a day early in hopes of playing two or three other courses in preparation.

Even with the nice weather, Bunker said he felt the past couple of days have been closer to average for this time of the year.

"The weather hasn't been that great recently, so we feel it's more beneficial to get some playing time in before the tournament," Bunker said.

Valerie Hahn puts during golf practice at the Manhattan Country Club Tuesday afternoon. The men's and women's golf teams will be traveling to Florida for different tournaments during spring break.

Men await big trip

DAN WICKER
Sports Reporter

While many K-State students are trying to scrounge up enough money to make it to their spring break destinations, some of the varsity athletic squads are reaping the benefits of free vacations.

One of these groups is the K-State men's golf team. The team will be leaving March 14 for Florida to compete in the 8th Annual University of South Florida Invitational.

The invitational will be at the University Golf Course in Tampa. K-State coach Russ Bunker said he did not know all the teams competing in the meet, but said it is one of the more prestigious meets in the state.

"I don't have the list of all the teams competing, but it is usually a pretty strong field. It is one of the nicest tournaments in Florida," Bunker said.

Bunker had not known K-State will see some action against Big Eight schools, which they have not played much against. Kansas and Iowa State will both be in the South Florida tournament.

"It will be our first chance to compete against Big Eight schools. We will be able to use that as a comparison as to where we stack up before the Big Eight begins," Bunker said. "KU had an up-and-down fall season and may be putting its emphasis toward spring because that is when the Big Eight Championships are."

Making the trip for the men will be Richard Laing, Brett Vuillemin, Bill Graham, Chad Judd and David Sedlock.

"It is the first year since I've been here that we've got to go anywhere for spring break. I am excited and the kids are excited, so I hope we can do well for the University," Bunker said. "They just need to believe in themselves, and go out and get the job done."

Cali Repeat takes all-U hoop crown

DAN WICKER
Sports Reporter

The ever-important big man in the middle proved to be not so important in the all-University intramural championships Thursday evening at the Chester E. Peters Recreation Complex.

The 6-foot and under champions, who call themselves Cali Repeat, used their quickness and intense defense to claim the all-University title over the much taller independent champion, Malo, 52-45.

"We played these guys last year in the semifinals of all-U. We play these guys everyday out at the rec center, and most of us have been playing here four, five or six years," Cali Repeat captain Bart Heinz said. "It is just a good group of guys that play good defense and hustle. Just call us Hoosiers."

Cali Repeat started the second 20 minutes with a five-point advantage, but Malo quickly erased the lead with a 5-0 run and tied the score at 26. Cali Repeat then got back into the groove and built back the five-point lead and would never let Malo get any closer.

Cali Repeat got its lead to swell to nine at the eight-minute mark, when Malo got whistled for an intentional foul, and John Wright converted the two charity shots.

"Coming into this game we thought if we played well, we would win. That was just the confidence we had because we played these guys last year, and they beat us in the last second," Wayne Counts said. "We had a better team than last year, and we did not come in here thinking that we were the underdogs."

Cali Repeat also used a very balanced scoring attack, putting four players in double figures. They were led by Heinz with 12 points, with eight of those coming from the charity stripe where he was 8-of-9.

Free throws also posed a problem for Malo when they were battling to get back into the game. During the final two minutes, Cali Repeat went 9-of-13 from the line.

"During the season, one guy would have 20 one game and five the next. It really didn't matter as long as we were winning," Heinz said. "We knew we had to be unselfish because as many good players as we've got, somebody is going to have a better game."

The first half went back and forth between both teams before Cali Repeat was able to build the 26-21 halftime advantage. With less than two minutes remaining in the first stanza, Kerry Kaiser hit his second trey of the game to lift Cali Repeat to a 22-19 cushion.

Both teams added a bucket and Heinz nailed two free throws as time expired to give Cali Repeat the momentum before halftime.

Malo was led by Dennis Deshaizer's 17 points, and Dave Lackey added another 13 points.

Track athletes to compete at nationals

JENIFER SCHEIBLER
Sports Reporter

Seven K-State track and field athletes will be spending the first weekend of their spring break exactly where they want to spend it.

These athletes will be in Indianapolis competing in the NCAA Indoor Track and Field Championships.

Several K-State athletes have had previous experience competing at national meet.

All-American Angie Miller will return to the national competition hoping to improve upon her fourth-place finish in the shot put last year, and high jumper Connie Teaberry, who placed sixth last year, is expected to better that performance this year.

"Connie Teaberry has a good chance to finish in the top three in this meet," Coach John Capriotti said.

Sprinters Markeya Jones and Latricia Joyner have both qualified for the indoor meet in years past, but due to injuries were not able to complete the competition.

Jones will compete in the 200-meter dash and Joyner in the 55-meter dash.

Senior Clifton Etheridge will be attempting to add two All-American indoor titles to his outdoor long jump title. Etheridge will compete in both the long jump and triple jump in Indianapolis.

First-time NCAA competitors for the Wildcats will be high jumper Gwen Wentland and sprinter Thomas Randolph (55-meter dash). Both achieved automatic qualifying marks to enter the meet.

Capriotti said the number of competitors in the field events will range from 12 to 16, and for the running events, from 10 in distance races to 20 in sprints.

Athletes finishing in the top eight places in their respective events receive All-American honors, he said.

"We are hoping to place and have as many of our athletes become All-Americans as possible," he said.

Capriotti said qualifiers for the meet have already set good marks to get into the field.

"There is no question that there will be good competition in every event," he said.

Netters to battle top teams in Arizona

DAVID SVOBODA
Sports Editor

The rough road traveled by the K-State tennis team thus far this spring doesn't get any smoother in the next week.

The Wildcat netters, 2-10 in dual competition, journey to Arizona to face four teams in head-to-head matchups.

Of those four, two — Arizona State and Arizona — are nationally ranked, and a third is a perennial power.

"Arizona State, I think, is No. 7 in the nation right now, and Arizona is No. 10," said K-State coach Steve Bietau. "And Trinity is a Top 25 team most seasons."

Doesn't sound too promising for a reversal of team fortunes, does it, coach?

"That we may come back with nothing to show in terms of record is a possibility," Bietau said. "But we want each player and each doubles team to perform to a standard we've set."

"You can play well and still lose against some of these people."

The Wildcat netters enter the competition minus the services of Rosemary Hunter, who left the team Thursday to return home to Australia.

"It just didn't work out," Bietau said of Hunter's choice to come to K-State. "Conditioning-wise, she wasn't anywhere near where she needed to be to be a competitive Division-I player."

With Hunter gone and health of players a lingering concern, Bietau said his players have little margin for error.

"My only regret this season is that our players haven't had any breathing room," he said. "Usually, you'd like to get them a match or two that they could work out some things under less trying conditions."

Michele Riniker will occupy the No. 1 singles position, and Tracy Parker will play No. 6. Rounding out the K-State singles players will be Suzanne Sim, Neeli Wilcox, Angie Gover and Theresa Burcham. Bietau said the No. 2 through No. 5 positions would vary.

'Cats down UNI; Texas A&amp;M tourney next

BILL LANG
Sports Reporter

After surviving for a narrow win over fourth-ranked Wichita State Wednesday night, K-State turned around and played a less-impressive game, though winning easily 14-5 over the University of Northern Iowa Thursday afternoon.

In the second inning, the Wildcats were the beneficiaries of three Panther errors and jumped to a 5-0 lead.

"They sort of helped us early on in the game," said Wildcat coach Mike Clark. "Today we sort of went through the motions. This is the first game where we didn't play up to our capability, and I'm disappointed in that aspect."

Freshman pitcher Dan Driskill received his first collegiate start and his first collegiate win with five innings of work. He struck out four, walked one and allowed one run.

Impressive as this may sound, Clark still saw room for improvement.

"Dan threw really well this afternoon," he said. "He was getting the ball up, and he'll have to work on that. He'll have to get the ball down and keep it in the strike zone. The next opponent will be a lot tougher than this team."

Although the Northern Iowa gloves helped get the 'Cat offense rolling, K-State was still able to pound out 18 hits on the afternoon.

To open the third inning, K-State third baseman Brad Rippelmeyer managed to get aboard with the help of another UNI error. Blair Hanne-man moved Rippelmeyer to third, and he came home on Jeff Ryan's single to make the score 6-0.

In the fifth inning, the Wildcats put the game out of reach as Brian Culp smashed a three-run homer, making the score 11-1.

"I don't know how that one got out, but I'll take it," said the leftfielder.

Tim Churchman came on in relief of Driskill in the sixth and struggled, surrendering four runs, three of them earned, in the top of the sixth. In the seventh, Churchman settled down a little, giving up UNI's last run and striking out three.

"Tim did a good job for us," Clark said. "He needed to see some action. He hadn't pitched yet this season, and he did a good job coming in relief."

With the win, K-State moved to 8-3 on the season and heads off on its annual spring break road trip. The 'Cats first stop will be College Station, Texas, for the Texas A&M Tournament.

More nationally ranked foes await

TODD FERTIG
Sports Reporter

The baseball team looks to continue its assault on ranked opponents during spring break, traveling to Texas for the Aggie Continental Classic.

After beating No. 4 Wichita State Wednesday and No. 7 Arkansas Feb. 16, the team could move closer to national ranking with a good showing in the tournament.

The squad encounters another ranked team to open the tournament, taking on No. 19 Texas A&M Saturday night in the first round of play. Also competing in the tournament are Illinois, who placed in preseason Top 20 polls, and Washington.

Coach Mike Clark called the tour-namment at College Station a proving ground for the team. Competing against such high-caliber opponents for several days is the atmosphere needed to drive the team to a higher level, he said.

"This is a tremendous opportunity for us to play six games in a row at the level we've got to play at if we're going to compete for the Big Eight Championship," Clark said.

"What we've got to do is go down to Texas A&M and play at that level for about a 10- to 12-day period of time. That would let us have the confidence to know we can play at that level all the time, not just once in awhile."

The Wildcats are off to an 8-3 start, adding wins over WSU and Northern Iowa this week to provide momentum for the tournament. The good start hasn't put the team over a hump, Clark said. He emphasized that the team can't afford to let up following such a good start.

"The guys really believe in themselves. We think we're going to be a good ballclub," Clark said. "But it's one thing to think it, and it's another thing to go out and actually do it. If you're going to talk the talk, you've got to walk the walk."

The high level of competition in the early season has given the team added confidence. Wins over ranked opponents served as fuel for the fire that already burned, members of the team said.

"This doesn't change anything, really. We had high expectations," pitcher Greg McNamara said.

IN FOCUS

Bat Nelson has cut hair for the people of Alta Vista since 1916 when haircuts were 25 cents and a shave was 10 cents. Nelson, 90, is the second-oldest person in town. He is a veteran of World War II and is a past First Exalted Cyclops of the Ku Klux Klan.

Eyewitness to History

Bat Nelson watches small town change for past 75 years

There were no customers in Bat Nelson's barber shop Wednesday afternoon. Clippings of grey hair lay unattended under the barber's chair as cars and trucks drove up and down the empty Alta Vista streets. The morning had been good, but Bat was content in leaving the clippings go in an otherwise spotless barber shop. He was busy looking at a scrapbook remembering that Feb. 12, 1916 was a long time ago.

Bat walked into the barber shop at 6 a.m. that cold winter's day, 15-years-old with a head full of dreams. His mother had awakened him early so he would be on time for the first day on the job. When it came time for him to leave, she walked him to the door.

"Sonny-boy," his mother said. "You work hard. Mother knows you'll make it all right."

There were four chairs in the old barber shop. Bat worked in the fourth, the farthest from the door, where all the rookies began. Four hours passed before Ollie Johnson walked in from the cold.

"Ah, a new boy," Ollie Johnson said, hanging up his coat and hat and climbing up into the chair. "Anything I like, it's a new barber."

Bat made $1.65 before the 11 p.m. closing time that day, 58 cents of which went to the shop. With the remaining $1.07, Bat treated his two bosses to supper. He went home around midnight with 17 cents in his pocket, happy as a lark. 17 cents for 17 hours work. Feb. 12, 1916 was a long time ago.

Bat traced his 90-year-old fingers across the photographs of the days when he had a full head of thick black hair. Pictures of times when haircuts were a quarter, a shave was a dime, a permanent wave was 95 cents, and there were no electric clippers.

In those times Alta Vista was a blossoming trade territory placed on a hill above miles and miles of rolling pasture. There were two hotels in the town then, along with two banks, three hardware stores, five grocery stores, four restaurants, two undertakers, three doctors and a dentist. It was a time when the town had a chapter of the Ku Klux Klan, with 105 robed members.

It was past 9 p.m. on that hot July night in 1924, and Bat was late for the meeting. He pulled his old Ford to a stop in front of the old country schoolhouse and jumped out. The full moon seemed almost spooky to him.

When Bat walked in, Clem Fisher stood up and made a speech about a young barber in town who would be perfect to lead the group. And after a show of hands, R.S. "Bat" Nelson was elected First Exalted Cyclops of the Alta Vista chapter of the Ku Klux Klan.

"We did a lot of good for this community, helped a lot of people," Nelson said, closing the scrapbook. "I served 19 months in that position. We needed 50 members to get a charter, and I had 115, 105 in robes. So you know, with that many men in a town this size, it was just about 100 percent solid."

But those days are gone, too, Bat reminds himself. Gone with the old shop that he bought in 1922 from the men who gave him his first job. Gone with the beauty shop Bat opened in 1931 next door for his wife, Helen, to work in.

A fire claimed the old shops on the night of July 13, 1937, 13 days after his insurance policy ran out. In one of his scrapbooks, he still has the banknote for the money he borrowed to rebuild the shop.

He rebuilt and remodeled, and in 1942, he got the call from Uncle Sam. Bat left his wife behind with his partner Jay Rinabarger. Bat returned from World War II in 1945.

Times were good in the post-war world. The town grew and businesses prospered. He watched his first customers pass away, but their sons and daughters replaced them. Times were good in Alta Vista.

And then came rock 'n' roll.

"The Beatles," Bat said with disgust, looking out the store window at the long-haired man outside taking pictures of the town. "The Beatles ruined the barber business. When they would play you'd see those gals jump up and down and, y'know, just touch those guys. I thought it would pass, last a couple of years maybe. But, hell, it just gets worse and worse every year."

He misses his wife being next door. She was forced to retire after an accident at church three years ago. "She was so active all her life," Bat said. "Now she's shut down, and she doesn't quite know how to deal with that."

Children and grown-ups in Alta Vista remember Helen best as the lovable old Sunday school teacher who hugged the children, each and every one, before lessons each Sunday.

"That's the thing that breaks her heart — not being able to be with the kids," Bat said. "Breaks her heart that she has to stay home."

Bat got up and went over to sit in his barber chair. It was a high-seated, ornate piece of metalwork that he said was the most comfortable chair in the world. It was getting late. He wasn't going to close until 6 p.m., but there was no sign of anyone coming in. So Bat sat alone. Alone in a town that each day is growing more different from the yellowed photographs. Alone in a barber shop with scrapbooks of memories of a time that used to be.

"This town will always be here," Bat said, to no one in particular. "I'm a little partial to it, but we have held on better than any small town I know of."

The rolling prairie surrounding Alta Vista has been fenced off. There is a tavern where one of the old undertakers used to work. The restaurant Bat took his bosses out to eat at after that first day of cutting hair has been replaced by a farm equipment shop.

There is only one restaurant in town today. Just one bank, one hardware store, one grocery store, no dentist and no hotels. The only doctor around is a woman who comes to town once a week from a bigger town 14 miles away.

But there is a barber. An old-time barber with mirrors in his shop, neon around his clock and $3 haircuts.

"Hair has been kind to me," Bat said, setting down a scrapbook. He looked out the window and watched a young boy ride by on a skateboard. He noticed that the boy's hair was getting a little long.

Races, parade St. Pat's activities

RYAN HAYTER
Collegian Reporter

Aggieville's St. Patrick's Day celebration will feature the 13th annual St. Pat's 10 kilometer road race, along with a variety of other entertainment March 16.

"Thirteen years ago, Kansas State Bank created the road race as a means to bring Manhattan people down to Aggieville for a good time," said Dianna Welliver, an assistant cashier at Kansas State Bank's downtown location. "Only 300 runners participated in the first race."

The bank, along with co-sponsors Ballard's Sporting Goods and KMAN/KMKF radio, has developed the celebration into a regional event. About 5,000 people attended last year.

Welliver said they are predicting 800-1,000 runners this year. She has already received entries from Nebraska, Oklahoma and Colorado.

"So far, the entrant's ages range from three to 77," she said. "A 70-year-old man is even running in the 10 kilometer."

Entertainment for all ages will run throughout the day.

"We've arranged to have many fun activities all day long," said Cheryl Sieben, executive director of the Aggieville Business Association. "This way families will be able to do things together before and after the race."

The day will begin with a parade at noon featuring clowns, floats, horses and local celebrities.

Sieben said a bagpipe band from Kansas City will be a new addition, along with many of the old favorites such as the Jaycees' marching lawn-mower brigade.

More than 100 women and children in the Waiting Wives of Soldiers organization will march in support of the troops

Candidates debate city annexation

Positive relationship vital to campus, city

DAN SCOTT
Staff Reporter

With the topic of annexing K-State into the city of Manhattan flaring up again, the relationship between the two is vital if any headway is to be made.

"The University and the city of Manhattan have, in the past, had a very positive relationship," said Jim Dubois, candidate for the Manhattan City Commission and associate professor of interior architecture. "They both can benefit from each other."

Candidate Edith Stunkel, assistant director of social anthropology and social work, grew up in Princeton, N.J. The relationship between that school and the community was adversarial, she said.

Stunkel said the business community would call the University an ivory tower, and businessmen would be labeled entrepreneurs by the college students and administration.

"Ivory tower is a stereotype," Stunkel said. "Putting a segment of a community in an us vs. them situation creates stereotypes."

Although Stunkel said the relationship in Manhattan is a reversal of the one found in Princeton, she said the stereotypical names can be heard at K-State as well — this needs to be lessened.

Candidate Craig Raborn, junior in geography, said the relationship has areas that could stand improvement as well.

"At the administrative level, the relationship is pretty good," Raborn said. "The problem lies in a more social level."

The community has a concerned view about irresponsible students,

Raborn said. The people think students don't care about the city. The students trash the town and leave.

"I'm trying to get rid of that image," Raborn said. "I'm trying to get students to be aware that while they're here, this is their town too."

Still, Stunkel said the strong points in the relationship outweigh the negatives.

"There is a lot of appreciation for each other's talents here," Stunkel said. "This community is one of the more enlightened ones."

Having strong, positive connections is good common sense, said Roger Maughmer, the only incumbent in the race.

He said K-State is the largest employer in Manhattan, which makes the community and the University dependent on each other.

Other candidates agreed the working atmosphere between the two entities is a productive one. They did not agree, however, on when and if the annexation of K-State by the city should occur.

Annexing K-State is not something either side should jump into blindly, said Candidate Helen Cooper, management analyst for facilities planning. The commission has more homework to do before annexation should be considered.

"Until both sides know what the benefits and responsibilities will be, I'm not in favor of annexation," Cooper said. "Both entities have to be conscious of the economical and legal impact of it."

Among the legal aspects that could be affected by the annexation are building codes, street maintenance, city ordinances and the fire department, Cooper said.

Currently, K-State pays the city of Manhattan $86,000 for fire protection. If K-State is annexed, the city would lose this source of income.

Raborn, however, said Manhattan would collect more money from the city's 1 percent city sales tax. The tax would affect the sale of goods in the K-State Union and athletic tickets, which are now exempt.

Raborn said it is not known the exact amount the city would gain, but it could possibly be as much as $300,000.

Dubois said the annexation would project a new image of unity to outside communities. Students can become disenfranchised by not being considered a part of the city.

This argument is not valid, Cooper said.

"When people come to K-State or Manhattan, they don't see a black line separating the two," she said. "It's not that clean cut."

Editor speaks at Sunset Zoo

Human concern for environmental problems needed daily

DARLA GOODMAN
Collegian Reporter

Noel Grove, senior assistant editor for the environment at National Geographic magazine, shared "Lessons from the Earth" with about 75 people Thursday night in the Manhattan Holiday.

"We are now the dominant species on this world, and we're finding out we haven't been very good stewards," Grove said.

He said that while people are very concerned about big problems like the nuclear accident at Chernobyl, the Alaskan oil spill and global warming, they often forget the environment is harmed by daily activities.

Grove said the pouring of used crank-case oil into drains is a bigger pollutant than oil spills.

"This becomes one of the major pollutants of the marine environment, of streams as well as the oceans," he said.

Grove said he does not intend to downplay the gulf war, but he said he worries that people may forget the daily dangers to the environment.

"I hope the interest in the environment does not diminish with the gulf war," he said. "It is sometimes easy for us to look at things in a wartime situation and forget what we're doing to ourselves every day."

Biodiversity is important to the environment, Grove said. A quarter of prescription medicines come from plants, but less than 1 percent of known species have been tested for possible use — we don't know how many species there are.

In his work, Grove has snapped a picture of a rhino in a head-on charge, rounded up buffalo in Nebraska, met a bear on an Appalachian trail and observed a silver-backed mountain gorilla in Zaire.

"I treasure these moments of interaction with animals," he said. "From a philosophical standpoint, I think that they remind us that we do live in a very rich and diverse world."

Grove spoke as part of the 1991 Friends of Sunset Zoo Winter Education Program Series. The program benefits members of the Friends of Sunset Zoo, whose fees are used to support the zoo, said Ron Schulze, curator of education at the zoo.

Allergy effects can be reduced with doctors' help, medication

House dust, weeds, trees, grass cause students' seasonal allergy problems

SCOTT FOWLER
Collegian Reporter

More students are having difficulties with allergies and should see a doctor, said Pat Schooler, director of the allergy clinic at Lafene Student Health Center.

Most of the time, the doctor can prescribe an oral medication to relieve the symptoms.

—Pat Schooler director of the allergy clinic at Lafene Student Health Center

"If anyone is having seasonal symptoms, they should see a doctor and discuss the need for an oral medication," Schooler said. "Most of the time, the doctor can prescribe an oral medication to relieve the symptoms."

Schooler said house dust is an important cause of allergic symptoms and decreasing one's exposure to house dust can decrease or eliminate these symptoms.

"The dust mite, to which people may be allergic, is the most important component of house dust," Schooler said.

According to a flier distributed by Allergy Control Products, this is a microscopic, insect-like creature living primarily in mattresses, carpets and upholstered furniture.

Each mite produces about 20 waste particles everyday, and these particles continue to cause allergic symptoms even after the mite, which has produced them, has died.

The flier said an important dust control measure is to encase the mattress, box spring and pillows in airtight covers.

Cindy Burke, health educator at Lafene, said weeds, trees and grass are increasing people's problems with allergies. The budding of trees has caused allergy problems for many people, and pine trees are also troublesome at this time of year, she said.

Over-the-counter drugs, such as decongestants or antihistamines, can be taken to relieve moderate allergy problems.

Burke said allergies can cause a runny nose, itchy eyes and headaches, which can result from clogged sinuses.

"Sometimes there are clear indications of a nearing allergy attack such as dark circles, 'allergy shiners,' under the eyes," Burke said.

People who have serious allergy problems should talk to a doctor about further testing, Schooler said. Skin testing can be done at Lafene to

Household tips to prevent allergies

These are household cleaning suggestions that may prove beneficial for people with allergies:

- Change fiberglass filters on central furnace and air conditioning units at least once a month.
- Keep windows closed.
- Eliminate knick-knacks and other objects that collect dust.
- Dust wood furniture weekly with a product designed to pick up dust.
- Vacuum weekly. Low pile carpets are preferable.
- Wear a dust mask when cleaning. Also use a dust mask when doing lawn work.
- Use hypo-allergenic pillows and mattress covers.
- Spray carpets, air conditioner vents, automobile vents, etc., with a fungicidal product, such as Lysol, to eliminate mold spores.
- Dehumidifiers are recommended to minimize the growth of mites and to reduce mold growth.

identify a person's allergies, she said. Schooler said shots are expensive, and people must come in frequently to get them. About 30 people get tested at the clinic each year, and students who need testing should check their medical insurance to see if it covers skin testing for allergies, she said.

Burke said a person who gets shots is given a serum that includes the element causing the allergy problem. A person allergic to a dog or to mold would be given a serum including samples of those elements, she said. "The dosage is gradually increased and hopefully the person can become immune to it," she said.

lives," Mick said. "I think it is an empowering process, which allows us to be powerful inside instead of manipulating everything outside."

The group works together, but with one person at a time. The others observe and give feedback. Mick said they also report their own experiences, which gives insight to the dream.

"This is not therapy," she said. "It's a creative growth process by looking inward and getting to know ourselves more intimately."

Currently, there are four groups with four people in each, including both men and women. People ranging in age from 19 to 60 attend the groups. Mick said there are openings, and she is open to starting additional groups.

Many group members said the work is different and asks a lot, but self-support is developed and a freedom to be whoever you are is created, Mick said.

Sieben said 75 organizations participated last year, and she said she expects more this year.

The Shamrock two-mile Fun Run, designed for the non-competitive runner, will start at 1 p.m. Men will run in the first heat and the women's heat will follow.

The St. Pat's 10km Road Race will begin at 2 p.m. There will be 15 age groups, plus a wheelchair division in both the two mile and 10 kilometer.

The new Leprechaun three-mile Walk has been added this year for people who want to exercise but don't want to race.

Welliver said the walk is a way for people to participate in a non-competitive way.

All entrants of the three races will receive a free T-shirt and a ticket to the 4 p.m. barbecue.

Other events throughout the day include pony rides, Fun-cycles, a caricature stand and concessions.

The Kansas City Caledonian from William Jewell College march down Moro Street in Saturday's St. Pat's Day Parade, sponsored by the Aggieville Merchants Association. The appearance was the first for the pipe band in the history of Manhattan's parade.

Manhattan celebrates St. Pat's Day

Performance of pipe band in parade, three-mile walk added to festivities

RYAN HAYTER
Collegian Reporter

Shamrocks sprouted from the pavement, and leprechauns ran amuck through the emerald streets of Aggieville Saturday.

More than 1,000 people from around the Midwest braved the weather to show their Irish spirit during Aggieville's 13th Annual St. Patrick's Day Celebration.

The celebration kicked off with a parade featuring a barrage of animals, clowns, celebrities, local businesses and organizations.

Four separate color guards from local American Legion posts and K-State ROTC members led the parade followed by a clan of bagpipers. The Caledonian Pipe Band from Kansas City made its first appearance in the parade's history.

"The band usually performs in the Kansas City parade, which in the past has conflicted with the Manhattan celebration," said Cheryl Sieben, executive director to the Aggieville Business Association.

"The pipe band was a real crowd pleaser," she said. "We were lucky to get them this year."

Animals, far from the ordinary, marched alongside their human counterparts.

One man rode a wagon guided by a team of goats, and another straddled a Brahma steer through the route.

Vietnamese pot-bellied pigs strolled along, and Shetland ponies and dogs accompanied the Claire and Cherry Law group.

The Buck Brush Saddle Club tailed the parade with more than 20 horses.

About 850 entrants participated in the St. Patrick's Day 10k road race, two-mile fun run and Leprechaun three-mile walk.

Besides a few hard-core race walkers, the participants took a leisurely pace following a route through the K-State campus. People of all ages and a few dogs participated.

The celebration concluded with a not-so-Irish barbecue in Triangle Park.

Gorbachev predicts victory in referendum

By the Associated Press

MOSCOW — Millions of people voted Sunday in a landmark referendum on whether to preserve the fracturing Soviet Union.

Violence prevented some people from casting ballots, while others were lured to the polls with scarce goods.

Hanging in the balance in the first referendum in Soviet or even Russian history was not only the fate of this vast country and its more than 100 ethnic groups, but also the future of Mikhail Gorbachev.

The Soviet president lobbied heavily for approval and predicted victory in the referendum, which asks citizens whether they want to stay together in a renewed federation.

No results were immediately available from the vote, but public opinion polls indicated it would pass, giving Gorbachev the popular mandate he seeks to crack down on separatists.

He has been pushing for the referendum since December to bypass democratically elected legislatures in the republics that he contends are dominated by nationalist extremists.

Gorbachev wanted to appeal directly to the people to restore national unity shattered by sometimes violent ethnic, legal and political disputes.

The country, however, is already so divided that six of the 15 Soviet republics, or 10 percent of the 200 million eligible voters, refused to vote in the referendum.

Violence in Moldova on Sunday reflected the fractures.

Hundreds of nationalist Moldavians, aided by police, enforced a local boycott by blocking access to the seven polling stations the Red Army set up in the republic's capital, Kishinev, said Associated Press correspondent Dan Petreanu. The nationalists beat up ethnic Russians and Ukrainians who tried to vote. No serious injuries were reported.

Moldavia is among the six republics whose parliament decided not to hold a referendum. The others are the Baltic republics of Lithuania, Latvia and Estonia, plus the Caucasus republics of Georgia and Armenia.

A smiling Gorbachev declared himself confident of victory as he voted near his home in southwest Moscow.

He told reporters the issue was larger than his political future.

"It is the fate of the people, of hundreds of peoples, of such a great state, and if you will, the fate of civilization," said the Soviet leader, as his wife, Raisa, stood at his side.

He has repeatedly tried to turn the referendum into an issue of patriotism, of preserving the motherland for which millions lost their lives.

Polls were open from 7 a.m. to 10 p.m. Preliminary results were not to be available before Monday. By midday, turnout ranged from a low of 18 percent in Leningrad to a high of 80 percent in Kazakhstan, according to an Associated Press check of several regions of the country.

The referendum, a lead-up to approval of a new Union Treaty that would delegate more power to the republics, asks: "Do you consider it necessary to preserve the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics as a renewed federation of equal, sovereign republics in which human rights and freedoms of any nationality (people of all ethnic groups) will be fully guaranteed?"

Violation of copyright laws common in education

Laws broken in spite of allowances made for instructors

DAVID PRITCHARD
Collegian Reporter

Violation of copyright laws is one of the most violated laws in America, said Robert Shoop, professor of education administration.

"People who would not dream of stealing money or goods make photocopies of books, duplicate records and video and audio cassettes, copy televised programs and make copies of computer software with no sense of guilt," Shoop said.

Copyright laws were updated in 1976 for the first time since 1909, mainly due to changes in technology, he said.

Teachers and educational institutions are the most likely to infringe on copyright laws because of ignorance of what the laws entail, he said.

The law states that the owner of the copyright has exclusive rights to reproduction, and all a person has to do is create the document and indicate it is copywritten with the little circle with a C in it, their name and the date, he said.

There's an area of the law that's called "Fair Use." It basically states that for research purposes, one can copy portions of work without permission. However, there are guidelines to this.

Teachers are allowed to make multiple copies for students in their class, provided they only make one copy per student, and the copying meets the tests of brevity, spontaneity and cumulative effect, he said.

"Brevity means a teacher may copy an entire poem if it contains no more than 250 words and if it is longer, no more than 250 words may be copied.

"A copy may be made of a complete article, story or essay of less than 2,500 words or an excerpt from any prose work of not more than 1,000 words or 10 percent of the work, whichever is less. A teacher may use one chart, graph, diagram, drawing, cartoon or picture per book or periodical issue," he said.

Spontaneity means the copying must be done when time constraints won't allow a teacher to get permission to use the work without losing the work's maximum teaching effectiveness, Shoop said.

To meet the cumulative effect test, a teacher may only copy the material for one course in the school. The teacher may also only copy a limited amount of material from the same author or collective work during one class term, he said.

Students are also allowed to make only one copy of such items, but if a person makes a copy for a friend, he is breaking the law, he said.

Many students at K-State may have gone to Kinko's Copies to get a textbook, only to find it was on copyright hold. This is because the instructor of the course has used copyrighted material and Kinko's must get permission to use it.

"Up until a few years ago, we could just call and get permission, but now many of the larger publishing companies are asking for permission in writing," said Mary Brinker, campus representative for Kinko's Copies.

Some of the larger companies charge a fee if a request for permission is to be considered in two weeks or less, Brinker said.

"Kinko's has agreements with certain publishing companies that automatically say yes or charge us a fee to help speed things along," she said.

Although the law was updated in 1976, Brinker said the law is still very gray.

"It's a very antiquated law," she said. "Everyone has a different view on how the laws are interpreted, so we are very conservative."

Three areas of the law that are being abused more and more are copying computer disks, "booting" a program into the memory of more than one computer and "networking" a computer program, Shoop said.

"Bootting a program requires the program be memory resident, which means it can be totally loaded into the random access memory of the computer," Shoop said. "The disk containing the program is then removed and transferred to another computer. This process can be endlessly repeated.

"Storing a copy of a program on a network file server and sending that program to any computer on the network would appear to be a violation of copyright," he said. "This has not been tested in court, but as more public schools connect their computers into networks, the issue of networkable software will receive more public debate."

Penalties for copyright infringement are decided in civil court, where the copyright owner may sue for damages. The penalties may range from $100 to as much as $50,000, he said.

"Congress has extended protection to teachers, librarians, archivists, public broadcasters and non-profit institutions with a 'innocent infringer' clause," he explained. "If these individuals are acting in the scope of their employment, or believed that what they were doing constituted fair use, the court will not require them to pay damages."

Many publishers already raise the price of their product to make up for copyright infringements that will probably occur, he said.

Shoop also said publishers have representatives who actively look for violators of copyright laws.

Reality of violence conveyed by poetry

PAUL NOEL
Staff Reporter

A graphic interpretation of violence may seem harsh to some people, but for the members of the Graphic Art Theatre, it is necessary.

The Graphic Art Theatre, sponsored by the Women's Resource Center, is a new project of the center's Sexual Violence Prevention Program and will have a poetry interpretation at 7:30 tonight in the Espresso Royale Cafe.

The interpretation will last about two hours. The group will be reading original and published works.

Members from Hispanic-American Leadership Organization, Ebony Theatre, Speech Unlimited and K-State Players will also make guest appearances.

Penny Cullers, Graphic Art

Theatre member, said the concept of the group was created by Judy Davis, director of the Women's Resource Center.

"The theater is a great way of educating students because it not only touches them intellectually, but emotionally as well," Cullers said.

Shirlyn Henry, senior in theater, said the poetry will demonstrate the violence and injustices of society. The poetry will graphically describe domestic, job and sexual violence of society.

"We want our community to become aware of what is going on," Henry said.

The group will be experimenting with different ways of reading poetry, said Tamara Grothaus, senior in theater.

"We're trying to be as true to the piece as we know," Grothaus

Need for highway discussed

Four-lane crucial to future economy, city officials say

CHRISSY VENDEL
Collegian Reporter

Local government and business officials met with Gov. Joan Finney March 7 to discuss Manhattan's need for a four-lane highway.

"K-State is the only Big Eight school not connected to a four-lane highway," said Randy Martin, Manhattan Chamber of Commerce president.

"It would create jobs and enhance the local economy. We need it for those reasons."

Also, more accessible transportation is necessary if K-State is to grow as a research institution, he said.

Manhattan Mayor Richard Hayter said to recruit new industries to Manhattan, there must be a four-lane highway.

"Two-thirds of industries looking to relocate look for a four-lane highway," he said. "Without one, Manhattan reduces its pool by two-thirds of its potential."

Existing industries wanting to grow need better transportation, Hayter said.

Marsha Tannehill, Manhattan League of Women Voters president, said the meeting was in response to rumors that the K-177 enhancement project was being put on hold by the governor and recent objections from her organization to the project.

Tannehill said the league opposes the expansion project for two reasons.

"The League is opposed because the local money that will be used should be used for other community commitments, and the expansion will cause damage to the environment," she said.

Expansion in jeopardy

GREGORY A. BRANSON/Collegian

Martin denied reports the project was put on hold by the governor. "No single project has been singled out for stoppage or changes," he said.

Hayter said he wants the governor to understand the importance of a four-lane highway to Manhattan's economic development and prove the request comes from broad-based input.

"I think she recognized the importance to the community, the Chamber of Commerce and the citizens," Hayter said.

"The meeting went very well, and I left confident that the project will go through as planned. I left with the understanding that if the highway program is left intact, all previously approved projects, including K-177, are on track."

Martin said K-State President Jon Wefald met with the governor the previous weekend about the issue, and it proved to be helpful.

"I think she was pleased with his input," Martin said.

Sen. Lana Oleen, R-Manhattan, said the next step is a meeting with the secretary of transportation to go over the project's status.

Albania frees 42 political prisoners

VIENNA, Austria (AP) — Communist Albania freed 42 political prisoners Sunday from its most notorious labor camp, but opposition activists said the government has not fully met its pledge to release all political prisoners.

Albania had billed the release as a fulfillment of its promise last week to free all political prisoners from the jails in which hundreds, maybe thousands of government opponents died during 46 years of Stalinist rule.

The release came amid reports of renewed clashes between police and citizens flocking to the port of Durres after hearing rumors they could board ferries for Italy.

Albanian radio, monitored by the British Broadcasting Corp., reported confrontations between police and Albanians who flocked to Durres on Friday and Saturday.

Gen. Pollo, a spokesman for the opposition Democratic Party, confirmed that there were casualties but he had no details.

After 20,000 Albanians fled recently to Italy across the Adriatic Sea, authorities declared Durres port a military zone to halt the exodus.

Entry ban on Tel Aviv, Haifa lifted

JERUSALEM (AP) — About 30,000 Arabs from the occupied territories returned to jobs in Israel Sunday after authorities lifted a ban on their entry into Tel Aviv and Haifa. Some found their jobs taken by Soviet Jewish immigrants.

Tel Aviv and Haifa had been closed to Palestinians since the start of the Persian Gulf War, when the occupied territories were put under curfew to prevent pro-Iraq unrest.

Brig. Gen. Fredy Zach, deputy government coordinator in the territories, said Tel Aviv and Haifa were reopened as part of a gradual post-war return to normal. Jerusalem, off-limits since an Arab stabbed four women to death last Sunday, was also reopened.

Teachers say Turtles bring violence

BOSTON (AP) — Those lean green fighting machines known as Teen-age Mutant Ninja Turtles are bringing violence to the classroom, said teachers from around the country who responded to a survey.

"The Turtles encourage violent and anti-social behavior among young children and have a disturbing effect on learning, behavior and play," said Diane Levin, an associate professor of education at Wheelock College who was co-author of the study.

Some adults may think the four turtles, named for Renaissance painters, are more likely to spark a child's imagination than run-of-the-mill musclebound superheroes.

The study's general conclusion from the 73 educators from 19 states who responded to the survey was that youngsters emulate the turtles' karate chopping and pizza chomping, but little else.

Ninety-five percent of the respondents provided examples of aggressive behavior linked to the turtle characters, Levin said Sunday.

Costner wins directors guild award

BEVERLY HILLS, Calif. (AP) — Kevin Costner is considered the favorite to win an Oscar next week for directing "Dances With Wolves" now that he has won the Directors Guild of America award for best feature film director.

The guild award, which Costner won Saturday night, traditionally has been a bellwether of who will win the Oscar for directing. Only three times in the last 43 years has the guild winner not gone on to win the Oscar.

Costner's win for the epic Western surprised many observers who believed the guild award would go to Martin Scorsese, who directed the critically acclaimed mob drama "GoodFellas."

After accepting the prestigious award, Costner said stepping behind the camera for the first time was "singularly the hardest thing I've ever done. The questions never stopped and the days never seemed to end. Directing's not an assignment. It's a passion."

Colorado-Kansas water battle delayed

(AP) — The 6-year-old lawsuit over Arkansas River water between Colorado and Kansas has ground to a halt after a star witness for Kansas suffered a nervous breakdown while testifying in the trial.

"I've been to trials before when things went to hell, but nothing like this," said David Robbins, Colorado's lawyer. "This is just bizarre."

Kansas now wants a seven-month delay to let the witness recover, but Colorado refuses. Colorado's lawyers said Kansas is trying to stall because the witness admitted several major errors in Kansas' case before his breakdown.

"This is certainly not a very sensitive way to behave when the health of another human being is at stake," said Richard Simms, chief lawyer for Kansas.

The suit, which has cost taxpayers $10 million so far, was filed in the U.S. Supreme Court and is being heard by a special master in Pasadena, Calif.

Kansas' main expert witness, Timothy Durbin, began testifying Jan. 14 about the technical basis for that state's case.

Closing arguments set for trial

CHILLICOTHE, Mo. (AP) — The case of an elderly farmer accused of killing five transients could go to the jury early this week, concluding a trial that some officials think should not have been held.

Ray Copeland, 76, is charged with five counts of first-degree murder in the deaths of five transients who prosecutors contend were tricked into participating in a cattle-buying scheme and then killed before it was discovered.

Defense attorneys called only five witnesses Saturday before resting their case. The witnesses were called to try to discredit two key prosecution witnesses — the transient who reported Copeland to the police and a neighbor of the Copelands.

Closing arguments were scheduled for Monday morning, the 10th day of trial, in the Livingston County (Mo.) courtroom.

First of Big Red 1 soldiers return from Persian Gulf

ERWIN SEBA
Staff Reporter

Through a door in the wall of a hangar at Fort Riley's Marshall Air Field, two small boys leaned forward and peered into the night of March 8. A few men, standing behind the boys, looked out at the four buses and the helmeted figures forming into rows in front of them.

As the figures marched toward the door, the men rejoined the audience of about 3,000, and the boys stepped out of the way of the reporters and photographers rushing inside. The figures were stopped just outside the door.

Inside the hangar, a band of cadets from St. John's Military School in Salina played a march. The audience, having heard of the buses' arrival, began to wave American flags large and small. Hand-made signs were raised along with cheers and applause that became a roar of greeting.

The boys went back to the door. One stood close to it, the other farther away. As the doorway and wall began to slide along a track in the concrete floor, the boy closest to it jumped back.

The hangar wall stopped moving for a moment. Two soldiers in green and brown fatigues waved at the boys to move back. One soldier pressed a black button in the wall and it began to move again. The roar grew louder. The wall stopped moving.

And the victorious warriors came marching in.

In single file and looking tired, wearing Kevlar helmets and sand-colored fatigues, carrying small American flags in one hand or stuck in shoulder bags, about 175 soldiers of the 1st Infantry Division walked to the folding chairs placed front and center before a podium on a raised platform in front of a giant American flag.

Men standing along the path cleared through the crowd for the soldiers to walk, shook the soldiers' hands or slapped high-fives, thanked them and said welcome home.

A woman bent over and leaned between two people standing at the end of metal bleachers. Smiling, she called out a name. A soldier stepped out of line, stopped and reached into her outstretched arms. She kissed him on the cheek. He stepped back into line.

Toward the end of line, a tall soldier walked with one arm around his wife, who had both arms wrapped around his waist. With his other hand on the head of a little boy, the soldier walked slowly to the chairs.

Another boy, carrying an upturned helmet in his hands, walked in front of the trio. He looked into it as he walked, and said, "I've got it, Daddy."

Col. Gary LaGrange, installation commander, stepped to the podium and faced the first soldiers from the Big Red One to return from the Persian Gulf War.

"Welcome home heroes," LaGrange said. "On behalf of a grateful nation, state and Fort Riley community, welcome home. You're all heroes. You family members out there are heroes, too."

"That's what makes America great," he said. "Togetherness and hanging in there and getting the mission done."

"Please join in a moment of silent prayer," LaGrange said. "Silent prayer, if you're prone to do that, in recognition of the 18 members of the Big Red One dead in the war."

Following the prayer, LaGrange asked Junction City Mayor Mike Fegan to speak to the audience.

"While you were amplifying the lightning and thunder of Desert Storm, we've been waiting for you," Fegan said in his remarks, and then introduced Manhattan Mayor Dick Hayter.

"You've won the hearts of America. You've brought America together," Hayter said in his short speech.

LaGrange again stepped to the podium and spoke the words the soldiers had been waiting to hear throughout their plane flight from Saudi Arabia to Forbes Field in Topeka.

"And now, you are free to find your spouses," he said.

Staff Sgt. Kristine Steward, an intelligence analyst with the division's Headquarters and Headquarters Company, stood next to a friend in the crowd.

"I wish my husband could be here with me," Steward said. Her husband is still in Saudi Arabia with the main body of the 1st Division, the authorized strength of which is 11,900.

Steward said her memories of the war were of a two-day road march, which started in Saudi Arabia, went into Iraq and ended in Kuwait, and of the camaraderie born in conflict.

"We had to do an extended road march to get to our brigades," she said. "We laughingly called it danger tours. We went through three countries on one road march. I remember the togetherness. There was always somebody looking out for you."

"You lost all comprehension of days after the ground war started," Steward said. "Personally, it was surprising how quickly it went. We felt we were going to be there a lot longer."

Staff Sgt. Andrew Wilson, of the 337th Armor Battalion, kissed and tightly held the hand of his girlfriend, Shari Tudor, while answering questions. He talked about the division's mission in the war.

"We were the breaching force for the corps," he said. "We were clearing out the defenses they had put up."

Wilson said he didn't expect the Iraqi army to give up so quickly.

"No, we really didn't," he said. "It's hard to describe, tanks on-line and the Bradleys on-line, helicopters on top and the close air support coming in, for five miles all around. I'm sure it's real disheartening to see that from the other side."

Capt. David Collier, 216th Infantry Battalion, stood with his wife, Heidi, and talked about the quickness of the war.

"When I left, I thought I'd be gone for six months," Collier said. "I left in the first part of December."

"Once we reached out and touched them as far along as we could, they were abandoning what equipment they had and surrendering," he said.

surrender to."

The surrendering Iraqi soldiers came out of their defense works holding up white handkerchiefs or pieces of white toilet paper, Collier said.

"Most of the time, it seemed like they were waiting for us," he said. "A lot of them seemed relieved that we got to them so they had someone to

As the division breached the Iraqi defenses, the Iraqis fired small arms and mortars until the Big Red One's tanks were able to fire back, Collier said.

Twenty minutes after the ceremony ended, most of the newly returned soldiers and their loved ones had left the hangar.

Bill Monroe and the Bluegrass Boys

Father of Bluegrass
From the World Famous WSM
Grand Ole Opry

Saturday, March 23, 8 p.m.

Bluegrass--folk music in overdrive--began in 1945 when Bill Monroe recruited a quintet to showcase his distinctive style: down-home mandolin playing and a countertenor voice that hits high notes with the impact of a Louis Armstrong trumpet. A member of the Grand Ole Opry since 1939, Monroe has taken bluegrass a long way, winning election to the Country Music Hall of Fame and recognition by the U.S. Senate as "a force of signal importance in our time." Others have taken up the style, but there's still no one who plays bluegrass like Bill does. Come to McCain, sit a spell, and listen to an American original.

Subtle differences key in comparisons

"Don't get me wrong. He's a nice guy. I like him just fine. But he's a mouth-breather."—The Jesus Lizard.

I had just sat down in my geology class when this guy plopped down in the seat next to me. He must have been strung out on something weird, and he glanced nervously around the room. He stank with sweat. He had a cup of orange juice on the desk.

He spoke, and it scared the hell out of me. Half-turned in my direction, he asked, "Why would the mouthbreathers and the buttscratches want to perpetrate a lie?"

I glanced up from the newspaper long enough to acknowledge that he had spoken, but not long enough to indicate I was about to answer him.

I could imagine what a buttscratcher was, but I had no desire to know what it meant to be a mouthbreather. The professor started his lecture, and I hoped this freak next to me would soon forget about whatever worldwide conspiracy to do something vague he was trying to solve by drinking vitamin C. He probably was a vegetarian, too.

I was trying to read my column for that day ("Preference, degree dictate all decisions," Collegian, March 4), and had no time to listen to some idiot's dark and evil ravings.

No luck. After a few minutes, whispering, he quietly, but not calmly, asked me if I was the buttscratching Ed Skoog who writes for the newspaper. I assured him I wasn't, and since I look nothing like the guy in my photograph, he believed me.

"Good," he said. "He's a rare case. Both a buttscratcher and a mouthbreather. Look here."

He pointed to my column, where it said "Gen. Colin Powell, Chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, speaks at K-State, while Timothy Leary, a marijuana advocate, lets off steam at KU."

"So what?" I said.

"So what?" he said, raising his voice slightly and attracting the attention of a few people sitting around us. "So what? Don't you understand? He's part of it."

"Part of what?"

The guy stared at me nervously and sweated. He swallowed hard. "You know. Part of it. The conspiracy. The Illuminati. The interstellar mafia. Do you understand? He's one of the lizards!" He laughed. He stopped laughing abruptly and looked out the window. "He's somewhere outside right now. Don't you believe me?"

I smiled slyly. "Oh yes. He's one of them. But how can you tell?"

"It's so clear he's trying to subvert the drug culture by placing it below the military-industrial complex in a value hierarchy. You ask me how I know? I have ways. First of all, there are definite bad vibrations coming from this page. See?" The weirdo said as he held the Collegian to the light and accidentally elbowed a guy in the next row in the head.

Ed Skoog

Collegian Columnist

"Secondly, look at that quote. By calling Powell by the title, 'General' Powell, and defining him with an honorable-sounding phrase like 'Chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff,' he comes across as a good, upstanding, non-reptilian member of his community."

"Sure, but what's wrong with that? I've seen press conferences with him. He seems like a nice guy," I said.

"Ah, but that's why he's such a mouth-breather!" He sipped cautiously at his orange juice. "Powell seems like a nice guy. You probably like him just fine. But you must recognize what he is — a trained killer/hired butcher. He is a mouthbreather, regardless of your feelings for him. You have to admit that."

"I follow you," I said. "But what about Timothy Leary? He has an appropriate attribution, doesn't he?"

The freak shook his head sadly. "How misguided you are, my friend," he said. "Dr. Leary was a full professor of the psychological sciences at Harvard University, and if Collie Powell gets a title, then Leary should be given his due also. That's justice."

"I suppose that's true. But what about the conspiracy?" I asked, noticing that the entire row behind us was listening intently to our conversation — and taking notes.

"Never mind that right now. Skoog's most heinous buttscratching crime is that he falsely accuses Dr. Leary of being a marijuana advocate. How terrible! How insane! How wrong!"

He was becoming hysterical. Orange juice sloshed around in his cup. Some of it spilled on the floor. It was clear I was going to have to do something, but I let him finish his point.

"So what should he have said Leary does?" I asked.

"Simple! Leary's not a dope advocate, he's an LSD advocate. He's not even that anymore. Now he's into biofeedlots, or something. But the way Skoog said it, the mercenary Colin Powell comes across as a noble politician, while Leary, a man who has contributed greatly to the expansion of human consciousness and thought comes across as a dope fiend."

"Only a member of the Secret Brotherhood of Buttscratches and Mouthbreathers would willfully subvert real, mental progress in such a fashion! The SBBM is alive and well and living in Manhattan, Kansas! Watch out, my friend. Now that you know, they're probably going to be after you, too. Beware," the freak said, cowering under his weird hair. His eyes were as big and wide as wastepaper baskets. It was time to act.

"I'm Ed Skoog. Boo."

The freak chuckled, then looked at me with a mix of fear and panic. I went back to taking notes, and as he crept out of the room, I pretended not to notice. He left his orange juice and I almost drank it, but someone in the back row beat me to it. He was a freak, but I think he had a valid, although twisted, point.

It is the subtle differences in comparisons that really make a difference. Who is really better, Colin Powell or Timothy Leary? Both men have affected American, and indeed global, society. Both are insidious swine within certain perspectives, but the problem with this kind of meaningless speculation is that it often gives rise to the kind of strange paranoia the weirdo in my geology class was experiencing.

But in answer to the question, I think Leary will have the larger influence on history. I mean, military buttscratches have been around since there were three men on the planet, but Leary has made it much easier for the real far-out weirdos to survive and not be crushed by the buttscratches and the mouthbreathers. Consider: If this guy could make it to an 8:30 geology class, what could stop him from becoming president?

Voters must look past war

President Bush is looking for four more years.

He will probably get it.

His popularity points are so high it would take Superman to top him in the near, or even the distant, future.

The American public has made Bush a war hero in Washington. After months of questioning Bush's judgement, most Americans are thanking him for being such a powerful, intelligent man who has saved the world from dictatorship.

And, because the multinational forces prevailed in the gulf, there really is no chance Bush will not be nominated as the Republican candidate for the presidential race in 1992.

It also doesn't seem likely he will lose the presidential race the Democrats come up with a charismatic dark horse to take the victory from him. An unlikely possibility at best.

But what Americans must remember is that one war does not a president make.

His domestic policies have been sorely amiss the last couple of years. Solutions to ease the homeless problem, funds to save the education systems and laws to end environmental woes have seen no light on the president's agenda. These areas may have been present in his official agenda, but have received little attention with all eyes on the gulf.

Additionally, Bush's war on drugs has become a joke. Even the drug enforcement officials don't believe the methods used and actions taken are having any effect on the flow of narcotics into the states. A re-evaluation of the program is needed before more tax money is wasted.

Before the election in '92, we should look past the flag-waving and emotional speeches to the real issues behind Bush's presidency. We need to look at what we want to happen in government and force those wishes to be addressed before electing Bush to four more years in office.

A pat on the back is great for his action in the gulf. But, we have to ask, what has Bush done on the domestic front lately?

History missing

Editor,

Part of the point of learning about women's history is to recognize the fact, absurd as it sounds, that women are people, and they have a history. For too long, women have been left out of history books and history courses. Not only has this resulted in poor scholarship (how could a history of, say, the United States be accurate when it pretends half of the population did not exist?) but has also robbed women of a sense of who they are and furthered the notion they are not important. Thus, I was disappointed by the article in the March 8 Collegian, in which it was erroneously reported that the United Nations established International Women's Day in 1975.

In fact, the idea was first proposed in 1910 at the Copenhagen Congress of the Socialist International by the German Marxist-feminist Clara Zetkin. Zetkin chose March 8 to honor the working women of New York, who in 1908 had organized a massive strike for the right to form a union. Zetkin said she hoped International Women's Day would become a focal point for efforts to gain women's suffrage, which at that time did not exist in even the self-proclaimed "democracies" of Western Europe and North America.

International Women's Day was first observed the following year, and it became an annual event for socialists. International Women's Day demonstrations in 1917 started the Russian Revolution.

Zetkin herself is one of the many fascinating women whose existence is so often ignored by what passes for history in our educational system. She was a founding member of the German Communist Party in 1919 and was one of the first Communists elected to the German Parliament. She wrote and spoke extensively about issues important to working women and many other subjects. She also edited the social-feminist journal "Die Gleichheit" (Equality). But most importantly, she organized women to fight for their rights.

Zetkin and the millions of women like her are important for their role in winning the few rights today's women enjoy. They are also important as sources of inspiration for today's women and men in the continuing struggle against sexism and all forms of oppression. I encourage everyone to learn and think about Zetkin and other women, not only on International Women's Day, but everyday.

'Womyn' defeative

Editor,

I enjoyed Marlene Howell's letter to the editor March 8 explaining the meaning and importance of National Women's Day. And although she never explicitly wished men a happy Women's Day, I had one. It is just as important for men to "think about, and perhaps thank, the women in their lives who are making a difference in the community," as it is for other women.

However, I found Howell's consistent use of the word "womyn" in her letter misguided. I recognize the sexism of the English language, and I can see how it is important for women to come up with appellatives that don't "owe" anything to words for men; "woman" can be seen as a sub-heading of "man" and "female" a sub-heading of "male." I understand and accept that.

But by insisting on calling it "Womyn's Day" in a letter to the editor, Howell inadvertently defeats the purpose of having such a day in the first place. People will be tempted to dismiss the day as "those militant feminists at it again."

Without explaining why such a word is important, "womyn" tends to alienate the women and men on the K-State campus who have grown up thinking "feminist" is a bad word. I know too many women who are reluctant to call themselves feminists because they are afraid that to do so will compromise their femininity. In their minds, "feminist" is roughly equivalent to "lesbian." They should take a Women's Studies class. So should I. But people will not flock to the Women's Studies Department if they think that in order to observe International Women's Day they have to be a ... (what is the singular for "womyn" anyway?).

Fee may increase

Editor,

I would like this letter printed in the Collegian to help the Chester E. Peters Recreation Complex users know about the proposed price increase of the "Rec Only" parking pass.

Do you use the Rec Complex? Do you buy a parking permit just for the Rec Complex? Did you know the Parking Council has proposed a change in the cost of parking permits for the 1991-92 school year?

The proposed change would eliminate the "Rec Only" permit. Next fall, a general campus permit would be required for all Rec Complex users from 7 a.m.—5 p.m.

The proposed costs would increase to $50 annually and $25 per semester for students and $70 annually and $35 per semester for faculty, staff and others.

I am employed by Rec Services and live close to campus, so I currently need to purchase a "Rec Only" pass. The proposed $50 cost would take half of my monthly paychecks.

If you are a struggling college student like me, can you afford to pay $50 just to work/workout at the Rec Complex? The students paid for the Rec Complex, but for some reason the Parking Council thinks we also need to pay a large amount to park at the Rec Complex. The charge is for shoveling snow and general upkeep. I think the $20 a year they already charge should cover that and more.

If you are concerned about the new rate proposal, as I am, attend the public hearing at 3 p.m. April 19 in the K-State Union Big 8 Room.

Discovering truth aim of TWIA

Thomas Woodruff Jr. founded TWIA, a nationwide consultation service specializing in interrogation and interviewing, early this year.

Resident specializes in interrogation

JENNIE DILLON
Collegian Reporter

A Manhattan man is giving individuals and corporations access to a nationwide service that specializes in interviews and interrogations.

The main goal — confessions. Thomas Woodruff Jr. founded TWIA, an acronym that means nothing, in January. This professional consulting service deals with investigations into theft, fraud and even murder.

With titles such as criminal investigator, military police investigator and Kansas police officer included in his resume, Woodruff said he feels he is a specialist in the area of interrogations.

"I have refined my skills, and I know exactly how to use them," he said. "It's a science."

In a typical case, Woodruff will meet with a client and discuss the problem at hand. After signing a contract and a certificate of liability, which exempts Woodruff from the possibility of being sued, investigations start.

He begins by talking with those persons involved in the situation. Although some suspects are not aware of Woodruff's position, most cases involve simple one-on-one conversations.

"I know how to tell when a person is deceptive," he said. "I know how to use the right questioning techniques to get to the right answer."

Woodruff has been involved with this type of investigating for more than 20 years. After retiring from the U.S. Army in 1985 with top-secret clearance, he served with the Riley County Police Department for four years. He has also completed course work in interrogation techniques at the FBI Academy.

Woodruff has worked with cases involving theft, arson, fraud, and rape. He said he claims a high confession and solve rate.

"It's a burden to hold something inside of you," he said. "An interrogator must know how to tap into that."

Woodruff said he gives 100 percent of his time to the cases he works with and said he feels this is very important in obtaining a confession.

"Try to put the blame on the other person," he said. "Sometimes you have to do that, shift the blame, give a person an out. Most police agencies don't know how to do that."

Woodruff said he is currently negotiating with police and insurance agencies.

He also said he hopes to speak with colleges concerning lectures on interviewing and interrogation techniques.

Woodruff said he hopes to eventually work on the Richard Grissom case and obtain information pertaining to the whereabouts of the bodies of the women he was convicted of killing.

Hospitals battling to win at booming baby business

MARLA ROCKHOLD
Collegian Reporter

Because choosing a hospital to deliver a baby is a patient choice, the choice of expectant mothers leads to competition among hospitals.

This competition makes hospitals offer something other than services to appear more appealing than other hospitals, said Julie Davenport, director of marketing and public relations at Manhattan's Memorial Hospital.

"We offer a wide range of things, from education classes to gift baskets," she said.

Memorial has classes in childbirth preparation, prenatal-parent preparation, prenatal and post partum exercise, sibling adjustment and infant CPR, she said.

If the mother attends the parent-education classes, Davenport said, she may choose between an infant or toddler car seat or a $50 U.S. Savings Bond.

She said every new mother gets to take home a gift basket, which has about two meals, an infant T-shirt and a diaper bag with samples.

Memorial also has a free home-visit program, Davenport said. A nurse will visit the mother one week after she leaves the hospital to answer any questions or just to express concern for her and the baby.

To increase awareness about its services, Memorial recently helped sponsor an informational baby fair, Davenport said.

"People who are pregnant have a lot of questions," she said. "We also wanted people to meet our staff."

Mark Brown-Barnett, chief executive officer at the Saint Mary Hospital, said they also offer prenatal classes and gifts for the mother.

If the mother pays for classes and then has her baby at Saint Mary, he said, the mother will get a rebate. The hospital also offers a free car seat and a coupon book, Brown-Barnett said.

Gifts are not the only thing that makes a woman choose a hospital. Women are influenced in a number of ways, such as word of mouth, past experiences at the hospital and doctor recommendations.

Mike Dorsey, administration director for the Saint Joseph Medical Center in Wichita, said the hospital does not give gifts as much as they used to.

"People are more interested in good outcomes, environment and care," he said.

About three years ago, the hospital adopted a different childbirth system, he said. The labor, delivery, recovery and post partum (LDRP) are all in the same room.

"That was radical for Wichita, but we had a tremendous response," Dorsey said.

For touring the Saint Joseph facilities, he said, mothers receive a pediatric book and bags of patient information.

Dorsey said the hospital is proud of its facilities, which have become valuable in recruitment.

"Once they (mothers) see it, they will stay," he said.

The Baptist Medical Center in Kansas City, Mo. also offers the LDRP childbirth experience said Jane Ransom, childbirth education coordinator.

"The whole philosophy of our unit is different," she said. "A woman is not sick when having a baby and is allowed to make as many choices as she wants for her comfort."

The baby is delivered in a private suite, and can stay with the parents as long as they want, she said.

Baptist also offers gifts, Ransom said. The parents get a yard sign announcing the birth, an infant T-shirt with a caricature of the doctor who delivered the baby on it and a special meal for the parents.

To cut down on separation during the hospital stay, fathers get a kitchen to use, which includes food, snacks and drinks, she said.

Bars forced into adopting privacy standards

Several bars in Aggieville will be requiring patrons to show more than I.D. to get in.

These bars will be going private and will issue club memberships because of insufficient food sales, Jim Conant, acting director of Alcohol Beverage Control, said. A drinking establishment that does not maintain 30 percent of total sales in food sales has a choice of going out of business or becoming a Class B establishment.

Bernie Norwood, legal assistant to ABC, said a Class B license allows the club to sell alcoholic beverages to club members and their guests.

Ken Snook, owner of Snookies, said there is too much hassle in setting up a restaurant, so they went private on Jan. 16.

"It's not hurting us at all," Snook said.

"If bar business is better than food business, it puts you in a bind," said Scott Sherman, owner of The Spot.

Private clubs must charge an annual membership of not less than $10. Members are allowed to bring guests with them. The number of guests is not addressed in the statutes, Norwood said.

The Spot, which will be going private the first of May, will allow members to bring up to 15 guests a night, Sherman said.

Sherman said his bar will charge a $10 membership, but members will not have to pay a cover charge the first month, even if there is a band. The Spot has already sold about 100 memberships.

"I don't think it will have a bad effect at all," Sherman said. "It's kind of a way to keep out people who will cause trouble."

The ABC makes annual visits to drinking establishments to audit food sales. If a bar does not meet the requirement within 12 months of opening, they must make the choice of closing or going private.

Once a bar has been notified that they have not met the requirement, they have 30 days to make the change.

"In some cases, they voluntarily admit they aren't making 30 percent food sales, so when it's time to renew, they switch over," Conant said.

"We've begun to conduct more audits and investigations now, since the 1987 amendments to the Club and Drinking Establishment act."

Discovering truth aim of TWIA

BRAD CAMP/Staff
Thomas Woodruff Jr. founded TWIA, a nationwide consultation service specializing in interrogation and interviewing, early this year.

Resident specializes in interrogation

JENNIE DILLON
Collegian Reporter

A Manhattan man is giving individuals and corporations access to a nationwide service that specializes in interviews and interrogations.

The main goal — confessions. Thomas Woodruff Jr. founded TWIA, an acronym that means nothing, in January. This professional consulting service deals with investigations into theft, fraud and even murder.

With titles such as criminal investigator, military police investigator and Kansas police officer included in his resume, Woodruff said he feels he is a specialist in the area of interrogations.

"I have refined my skills, and I know exactly how to use them," he said. "It's a science."

In a typical case, Woodruff will meet with a client and discuss the problem at hand. After signing a contract and a certificate of liability, which exempts Woodruff from the possibility of being sued, investigations start.

He begins by talking with those persons involved in the situation. Although some suspects are not aware of Woodruff's position, most cases involve simple one-on-one conversations.

"I know how to tell when a person is deceptive," he said. "I know how to use the right questioning techniques to get to the right answer."

Woodruff has been involved with this type of investigating for more than 20 years. After retiring from the U.S. Army in 1985 with top-secret clearance, he served with the Riley County Police Department for four years. He has also completed course work in interrogation techniques at the FBI Academy.

"I haven't found a person yet, who had criminal evidence, that I couldn't extract once I started talking to him," he said. "The brain will tell you a lot, but the heart will tell you the truth. I know how to get to the heart."

Woodruff has worked with cases involving theft, arson, fraud, and rape. He said he claims a high confession and solve rate.

"It's a burden to hold something inside of you," he said. "An interrogator must know how to tap into that."

Woodruff said he gives 100 percent of his time to the cases he works with and said he feels this is very important in obtaining a confession.

"Try to put the blame on the other person," he said. "Sometimes you have to do that, shift the blame, give a person an out. Most police agencies don't know how to do that."

Woodruff said he is currently negotiating with police and insurance agencies.

He also said he hopes to speak with colleges concerning lectures on interviewing and interrogation techniques.

Woodruff said he hopes to eventually work on the Richard Grissom case and obtain information pertaining to the whereabouts of the bodies of the women he was convicted of killing.

SPORTS MONDAY

Wildcat pitcher Dave Christensen evened his record at 2-2 Saturday as he defeated Augustana 7-3 in the second game of the twinbill.

Wildcat first baseman Chris Hmielewski stretches to tag out a baserunner during K-State's win in the second game of Saturday's double-header sweep of Augustana at Frank Myers Field. Hmielewski pitched a no-hitter in the first game of the double dip.

Spring break up, down for 'Cats

DAVID SVOBODA
Sports Editor

It wasn't a great spring break for the Wildcat baseball team. In fact, it was something akin to kissing your brother or sister.

Coach Mike Clark's crew went 5-5 during the period and currently stands 13-8.

Mixed into those 10 games were a K-State no-hitter, a power display in the first game of a doubleheader at Southwest Missouri State, and a somewhat disappointing trip to College Station, Texas.

Chronologically, here's how the break went for the 'Cats, from beginning to end.

Aggie Continental Classic

K-State opened play in the Aggie Continental Classic in College Station March 9 with a defeat at the hands of the hosts, No. 15 Texas A&M.

The team bounced back for a win over Illinois before Washington, Illinois and Washington again handed the 'Cats three consecutive defeats.

But, just when things looked really bleak, K-State got an unexpected boost in the tourney's final game.

In his first start as a Wildcat, Tim Churchman hurled a three-hit, seven-inning shutout to beat A&M. He struck out six and walked four to earn his first Division I win.

Four K-State players earned all-tourney honors. Second baseman Van Torian, third baseman Brad Rippelmeyer, outfielder Brian Culp and pitcher Tim Churchman were named to the team.

That was a bit ironic — in that K-State was the only team in the field with four selections, but yet finished with only two victories.

In the game prior to the trip and the six on it, Culp hit .545 with nine RBIs, a double, two homers and two stolen bases.

Augustana doubleheader

Chris Hmielewski, 2-2, hurled K-State's second no-hitter of the season as the Wildcats beat Augustana in the first game of a doubleheader Saturday at Frank Myers Field.

Earlier this season, Dave Christensen and Greg McNamara teamed up for K-State's first no-no since 1976.

Hmielewski threw his five-inning masterpiece on a blustery day, in which he was the beneficiary of a strong K-State offensive attack and some suspect defense by the visitors. The 10-0 win set the tone for the second contest.

In that game, Christensen got the win as K-State handed Augustana a 7-3 defeat. Christensen, 2-2, stymied the visitors in all but one inning.

SMSU doubleheader

K-State traveled to Springfield, Mo., Sunday and split a doubleheader with Southwest Missouri State.

The Wildcats put on a power display in the opener and went on to a 14-3 win in a game, in which six balls left the park.

Rightfielder Scott Stroth led the hit parade, pounding two homers. Hmielewski had three hits and Culp added four RBIs to lead the 'Cat offensive onslaught.

In the nightcap, however, K-State's offense went south and the home team blanked the 'Cats 9-0.

The team will play eight home games this week, with double dips against Washburn and Missouri Western Tuesday and Wednesday, and a four-game weekend Big Eight series with Kansas beginning Friday night.

After the Kansas series, the team will play but one more home doubleheader before hitting the road for 17 of 19 games between March 29 and April 24.

Jumpers lead track team as 'Cats end indoor season

JENIFER SCHEIBLER
Sports Reporter

The tradition continues.

K-State's reputation for producing outstanding male long and triple jumpers was reinforced as senior Clifton Etheridge earned All-America honors at the NCAA Indoor Track and Field Championships in Indianapolis March 8-9.

Etheridge's leap of 52-10 1/2, a personal record, gave him third place in the competition and his second All-America certificate.

His first came in last year's NCAA Outdoor long jump competition.

In long jump competition, Etheridge finished eighth after fouling on three final attempts.

Coach John Capriotti said he was pleased with Etheridge's ability to come back and finish the meet strongly.

"Clifton had a really good meet," he said. "He had the 12th or 13th best jump going into in triple jump competition and came out with third place."

Etheridge's efforts led the K-State men to tie for 32nd in the team competition with six points.

Also garnering All-America honors was sophomore Thomas Randolph.

Randolph's time of 6.25 in the 55-meter dash placed him ninth in the competition.

To accomplish this feat, sprinters must compete and advance in preliminaries, semifinals and then finals.

Capriotti praised Randolph for his performance as a first-year competitor in national competition.

"He really did a good job and had a good indoor season," he said.

On the women's side, a fifth-place finish by Markeya Jones in the 200-meter dash earned her All-America honors and helped the team to a 29th-place tie.

Jones' time of 24.02 was also a personal record for the junior sprinter.

A pair of K-State high jumpers competed in what Capriotti said was one of the toughest fields he had seen in a long time.

"All 12 competitors had jumped at least 6-0 during the season," he said.

Three-time All-American, Connie Teaberry, finished eighth in the competition with a leap of 5-10 1/2, and freshman teammate Gwen Wentland finished 11th with a leap of 5-9 1/2.

The indoor season officially came to a close with the completion of this meet.

Capriotti said he was pleased with the events of the season, which was highlighted by several outstanding team and individual performances.

One that particularly comes to mind, Capriotti said, was the women's second-place finish in the Big Eight Championships. It was in that competition the women scored a team-high 135 points against conference powerhouse Nebraska.

"I thought we had a good indoor season," he said. "Both teams look healthy going into the outdoor season."

Rebels outlast Hoyas

Pairings finalized for NCAA's round of 16

By the Associated Press

UNLV passed its toughest test of the season Sunday, surviving a brutal battle against Georgetown to advance to the final 16 of the NCAA tournament.

The Runnin' Rebels beat the Hoyas 62-54, extending their winning streak to 43 and reaching the West Regional semifinals for the fifth time in six years.

UNLV (32-0) played most of Sunday's game without starting center George Ackles, who sprained his foot in the opening round. But they used their speed and ferocious defense to overcome Georgetown's giants, 7-foot-2 Dikembe Mutombo and 6-10 Alonzo Mourning.

Larry Johnson led UNLV with 20 points, while Greg Anthony had 15 and Anderson Hunt 14. Mutombo led the Hoyas with 16 points.

Georgetown (19-13) never folded, fighting back from UNLV surges that would have put away most teams.

It was UNLV's first victory ever against Georgetown.

The Rebels advanced to the regional semifinals at Seattle, where they play Utah Thursday. Utah made it to the final 16 by beating Michigan State 85-84 in double overtime.

Thursday, UNLV plays Utah and Arizona faces Seton Hall at Seattle. At Charlotte, N.C., Arkansas plays Alabama and Indiana meets Kansas.

Friday, North Carolina plays Eastern Michigan and Temple meets Oklahoma State at East Rutherford, N.J. At Pontiac, Mich., Ohio State plays St. John's and Duke faces Connecticut.

N. Carolina 84, Villanova 69

At Syracuse, N.Y., North Carolina (27-5) reached the final 16 for a record 11th straight year.

George Lynch had 19 points and 10 rebounds for the Tar Heels.

Lance Miller scored 17 points for Villanova (17-15).

At Atlanta, Melvin Cheatum, Gary Waites and Latrell Sprewell each scored 21 points for Alabama (23-9).

Chris King scored 29 points for Wake Forest (19-11), which was making its first NCAA appearance since 1984.

Arkansas 97, Arizona St. 90

Arkansas started quickly, then held off Arizona State to set a school record for victories in a season.

Oliver Miller had 19 points and 10 rebounds for Arkansas (33-3), while freshman Jamal Faulkner led Arizona State (20-10) with 29 points.

Ohio St. 65, Georgia Tech 61

At Dayton, Ohio, Perry Carter had 19 points and 18 rebounds as Ohio State held off a late charge by Georgia Tech.

Jim Jackson added 16 points for the Buckeyes (27-3), including three free throws in the final 17.4 seconds.

Kenny Anderson had 25 points and six rebounds for Georgia Tech (17-13).

St. John's 84, Texas 76

St. John's ended four years of tournament frustration, using its patient offense and pinpoint shooting to wear down Texas.

Texas (23-9) tried tight man-to-man coverage, half-court traps, even an uncharacteristic full-court press. But nothing worked against the Redmen (22-8).

Billy Singleton led St. John's with 21 points, while Joey Wright paced the Longhorns with 32.

Utah 85, Michigan St. 84

At Tucson, Ariz., Josh Grant scored a season-high 29 points and the Utes overcame frigid free-throw shooting to reach the final 16 for the first time since 1983.

Walter Watts put Utah (30-3) ahead to stay at 81-79 on a dunk with 1:34 left in the second overtime. A free throw by Watts with 10 seconds left gave Utah an 85-81 lead, giving the Utes enough cushion to withstand Steve Smith's 3-pointer with three seconds remaining.

Tennis team beaten
Ranked Arizona allows Wildcats just 1 set

TODD FERTIG

Arizona colleges had the number of the tennis team during its spring break trip, handing the K-State squad three losses.

Eleventh-ranked Arizona gave the team a rude farewell from the state by collecting a 9-0 sweep Sunday. Losses to Arizona State and Northern Arizona, and a win by forfeit over Trinity extended K-State's record to 3-13 on the season.

Only five players made the trip, forcing the team to concede its matches at No. 6 singles and No. 3 doubles.

Coach Steve Bietau said he was pleased that several of Sunday's losses to the nationally ranked squad came in close matches.

The only set captured on the day was the first set of the No. 2 doubles match. The team of Suzanne Sim and Neili Wilcox defeated Danielle Kulman and Nancy Breen 6-1 before dropping the next two sets 6-4, 6-2.

"At this point, it's not realistic to think we're going to compete against teams like this, but there's no reason why we can't compete individually," Bietau said. "Today was one of our better days in that area."

Trinity, one of two opponents on schedule for Saturday, was unable to make the trip, giving K-State its third win of the season. Had the team taken a full roster to Saturday's match with Northern Arizona, it might have added another victory to its record.

Northern Arizona claimed a 5-4 win, but two of the matches came by default from the short-handed Wildcats. Wilcox defeated Jen Kasbeer 6-2, 6-2 in No. 3 singles and Thresa Burcham downed Alex Degher 6-1, 6-0 in No. 4 singles.

The team collected a sweep of the doubles matches played, which gave them four match victories.

Michele Riniker and Burcham bounced back from a first set loss to defeat Northern Arizona's Alex Koppel and Kristen Olson 4-6, 6-0, 6-1 in No. 1 doubles. At No. 2 doubles, Sim and Wilcox beat Kasbeer and Mindy Ellickson 6-1, 6-1.

Friday, the team was swept in its first day of play on the trip by another nationally ranked squad, Arizona State, which entered the meeting rated seventh in the country.

"I was happy with the way we played, but we haven't shown we can do it day in and day out," Bietau said.

Jackson may be out for year, says WDAF

By the Associated Press

KANSAS CITY, Mo. — A Kansas City TV station, quoting an unnamed source, said Sunday night Bo Jackson has been told he will definitely not play this baseball season.

"Bo Jackson's hip injury is much more serious than anyone first thought," WDAF-TV sports director Frank Boal said at the top of the 10 p.m. newscast.

"So serious, according to our source, the (Kansas City) Royals' doctors who examined Bo have already told Bo he will not play at all this season, and that all Bo's athletic activity, including football, should cease for the next nine-12 months."

Jackson, who injured his hip in a playoff game with the Los Angeles Raiders in January, has been on crutches since before the Royals began spring training near Haines City, Fla.

A report in the San Diego Tribune

Friday quoted an unidentified medical source as saying that Jackson's hip injury could be career-threatening.

According to the unnamed San Diego source, Jackson is suffering from a hip condition known as avascular necrosis, in which the bone dies because the blood supply is cut off.

Jackson is scheduled to be examined by another doctor Monday in Birmingham, Ala. The Royals, who are declining comment pending further medical tests, have scheduled a news conference for Tuesday.

Royals team physician Steve Joyce said Saturday that tests on Jackson were completed Friday at St. Luke's Hospital in Kansas City, but he declined to reveal the diagnosis.

Jackson is scheduled to be examined Monday by Dr. James Andrews, a noted Birmingham, Ala., orthopedic surgeon who specializes in sports injuries, the Kansas City Star said Sunday.

Andrews and Royals General Manager Herk Robinson have been notified of the Kansas City test results, Joyce said.

Doctors say avascular necrosis generally does not arise from a sudden injury, but is more often a progressive condition, taking years to develop. It can occur at any age.

"It is potentially a very serious and disabling condition," said Dr. James Lipsey, orthopedic surgeon at Shawnee Mission Medical Center. "It's questionable that it is the consequence of an injury. Usually it is not."

No matter how mild, the condition is not one that allows contact athletics that could damage the tissue and cause greater damage, Lipsey said. "Athletes do things that normal people don't do," he said. "I would say that for an athlete, it would curtail activity significantly."

"It is not a very cheerful diagnosis to make. It is not life-threatening, but it is a serious threat."

Ruddock, Tyson spar in media

By the Associated Press

LAS VEGAS — Donovan "Razor" Ruddock recalls watching in dismay as James "Buster" Douglas beat Mike Tyson.

He thought that should be have been him in there winning the heavyweight championship.

Douglas got the shot when Tyson pulled out of a scheduled Nov. 18, 1989, defense against Ruddock because of illness.

"I can knock him out in three rounds," Ruddock thought as he watched Douglas' 10th-round knockout of Tyson on Feb. 11 at Tokyo.

Tonight, Ruddock gets a chance to translate his thoughts into action when he fights Tyson in a 12-round bout outdoors at The Mirage.

Also appearing on the card are welterweight champions Simon Brown and Maurice Blocker, junior welterweight champ Julio Cesar Chavez and Roberto Duran, who has held world titles in four weight classes.

While no title is involved, the stakes are high for Tyson and Ruddock.

The winner will be in line for a mandatory title challenge against the winner of Evander Holyfield's title defense against George Foreman on April 19 at Atlantic City, N.J. Holyfield knocked out Douglas in the third round last Oct. 25.

Tyson is ranked No. 1 and Ruddock No. 2 by the International Boxing Federation, World Boxing Council and World Boxing Association.

The WBC wanted to withdraw championship recognition from Holyfield for signing to fight Foreman instead of Tyson, but was blocked by litigation from doing so.

"This is the fight for the legitimate heavyweight title," Ruddock said.

"No one respects Evander Holyfield as the champ. There are only two of us — me and Mike Tyson — and one of us has to go."

The wise guys say it will be Ruddock who goes. Tyson is the 5-1 favorite.

Asked why he would want to fight Tyson now instead of taking an easier path to a title bid, perhaps one against Tyson for a lot more money, Ruddock said: "I don't like the easy way."

"I want to go against the grain. On March 18 I'm going against the grain."

Most boxing people think the scheduled 12-round bout will not end in a decision, and a lot of them think the match could last only a couple of rounds.

Asked when he thought the battle of power punchers might end, Tyson said, "As soon as I hit him."

A short fight would be extremely damaging to the loser's career.

"He won't end my career," the 24-year-old Tyson said. "If anything, this will be his last fight."

Ruddock is expected to be a true test for Tyson in the wake of his loss to Douglas. Henry Tillman and Alex Stewart provided little opposition to Tyson in his only two fights since the upset.

Wildcat guard Jean Derouillere ended his career at K-State playing in the Big Eight Tournament in Kansas City, Mo., March 8. The 'Cats lost to Oklahoma State in the first round of the season finale at Kemper Arena. The Cowboys have gone on to become one of the NCAA's Sweet 16.

Season of frustration ends in 1st-round loss at Big 8 tournament

DAVID SVOBODA
Sports Editor

KANSAS CITY, Mo. — It seemed a fitting end to a season filled with frustration.

K-State battled eventual Sweet 16 participant Oklahoma State tooth and nail until the final minute, only to fall 77-66 in the first round of the Big Eight postseason basketball tournament in Kemper Arena March 8.

For the Wildcats, who dropped eight games by 10 points or less en route to a 13-15 final record, this game was indicative of the way the ball bounced — or didn't — the entire year.

"We've been playing hard, but we just haven't been getting the breaks," K-State center Maurice Britt said just after the loss to OSU. "We haven't done a good job of finishing it."

That certainly was the case against the Cowboys.

"The players put themselves in a position to win the basketball game, and again did not do it," Coach Dana Altman said. "The last four minutes of a game is when you need a player to step up and make big plays, and we didn't have that."

The final 3:39 of the tourney loss backed up Altman's contention perfectly.

After K-State took a lead of 64-63 when Wylie Howard scored inside, the Cowboys went on a 14-2 run from that point on to again send the Wildcats home disappointed.

During that stretch, K-State rushed two three-point shots and Jean Derouillere was called for a charge.

"The big play in that stretch was the offensive foul on Derouillere," Altman said of the call, which came with 1:17 left and K-State down just 68-66.

The call nullified a K-State dunk that would have tied the game and possibly have given the 'Cats an emotional lift.

Even though K-State once again failed to come up big down the stretch, the team earned an admirer in OSU coach Eddie Sutton.

"I told Dana that I thought his team played with a lot of competitive spirit and took us to the wire," Sutton said. "This was the best game K-State played against us this season."

That wasn't indicated in the OSU shooting percentage, but the Wildcats did force OSU into 15 turnovers and tied the Cowboys in the battle of the boards at 33-33.

Cowboy John Potter, who tied with Byron Houston for the team lead in scoring with 20 points, liked what he saw from the K-State defense.

"I think it was very tough. Coaches said coming in that Kansas State, Kansas and ourselves had the best defenses in the Big Eight," he said. "So we knew that they would be tough."

Derouillere led K-State with 20 points.

It was an up note of sorts on the end of a frustrating year for Derouillere, who many had projected to be the team leader so sorely needed.

Altman said that those thoughts might have been unfair from the outset.

"I knew some of the fans' expectations of him were a bit unrealistic," Altman said. "He is a good player and can score points, but look realistically at the statistics. He has always been a 42 percent shooter from the field and has always averaged three rebounds."

Women golfers continue solid performances

ERIC BROWN

K-State's women's golf team continued its torrid stretch of consistent performances during spring break's Northern Illinois Snowbird Tournament March 14 and 15.

The Wildcats finished the seven-team, 36-hole meet in Tampa, Fla., in third place, just three strokes behind tournament champion Iowa State.

Iowa State finished with a team score of 648, followed by the nationally-ranked host — Northern Illinois — which tallied 649 points. K-State followed at 651 team points.

K-State assistant coach Mark Elliott said he was pleased with his team's performance.

"It's disappointing that we couldn't win," he said "But encouraging that we were in a position to win down the stretch."

The Wildcats were led by sophomore Valerie Hahn, who finished in second place at 157, one stroke from the lead. Junior Adena Hagedorn was also among the leaders, finishing sixth with a score of 161.

"Valerie Hahn had a great tournament," Elliott said. "She's just a sophomore and is not used to feeling the pressure of winning a tournament. She handled that pressure and almost won."

Junior Theresa Coyle, on the strength of an outstanding first day, was the third scorer for K-State at 167. Other K-State finishers were senior Chris Adams at 170, freshman Denise Pottle at 172 and freshman Julie White at 181.

"Theresa Coyle had an outstanding day to support the solid performances of Adena and Valerie," Elliott said.

K-State's first day team score was a 326, good enough for third place at the half-way point, and six strokes off of the school record on 18 holes.

The Wildcats will be off until April 13-14 when they will travel to Columbus, Ohio for the Buckeye Spring Invitational.

Fan given chance to enjoy spring ball

David Svboda

Sports Editor

PHOENIX — Finally, after the 27 years and nine days that previously constituted my definition of life, I really began living.

March 11, I walked into Tempe Diablo Stadium and began my spring break Cactus League getaway.

For me, a baseball fan who depends on ESPN for a nightly fix from April until October, this was heaven on Earth. And it was a long time in coming.

Growing up, I watched baseball live or on television every chance I got. I fantasized about the time I'd spend someday watching the big leagues in Florida or Arizona getting ready to go north to begin the regular season.

But days and years came and went, and I got no closer to realizing my dream than the Cleveland Indians have come to playing in a World Series in the modern era.

Then I got my big break. My brother took a job in Phoenix managing a restaurant, and I now had lodging for free. Ya gotta love little brothers. Add a cheap America West airfare, and the dream was nearing reality.

It was well worth the wait. I saw four games in four different parks in and around Phoenix during my stay. Here's a peek into my baseball diary.

■ MONDAY — San Francisco Giants vs. Seattle Mariners, Tempe Diablo Stadium. The Mariners won a lopsided affair, but seeing Giant first baseman Will Clark cutting it up with the fans was the real treat for me.

Clark has the sweetest left-handed swing I've seen in years, and he's got a disposition to match. He bantered freely with the fans before the game, and seemed at ease with all of his teammates.

He's a superstar's superstar.

■ TUESDAY — Oakland Athletics vs. California Angels, Phoenix Municipal Stadium. The A's rode a Jose Canseco three-run shot to another lopsided win.

Though Jose is an impressive physical specimen, my eyes were glued on one of my all-time favorites: Reginald Martinez Jackson.

I absolutely hated Reggie during his playing career, but now that he's not beating the Royals anymore with mammoth homers, I like the guy. And when he looks right at me through the green lenses of his sunglasses while I take his picture, I know that the guy still knows how to catch just a bit of the spotlight.

■ WEDNESDAY — California Angels vs. Milwaukee Brewers, Chandler Compadre Stadium. The Angels bounce back from Tuesday's thrashing to hand the Brewers one of their own.

It's a cloudy day, the wind kicks up, and I'm glad I'm wearing jeans and a jacket.

Another similarly-attired gentleman grabs my attention early and keeps it.

He wears a Lite Beer hat, a jean jacket and a smile.

He's Mr. Baseball, Bob Uecker.

■ THURSDAY — San Diego Padres vs. Chicago Cubs, Mesa Ho Ho Kam Park. The Cubs win a close one.

If you listen to the fanatics who watch baseball in Chicago, this should have been the highlight of my trip. That's why I saved it for last.

I've got to say that I wasn't all that impressed. The park was nice, but it didn't have Diablo's backdrop or Compadre's serenity.

The game did give me a look at the spiffy new uniforms the Padres are wearing this year. Navy blue beats the hell out of brown on a baseball uni.

All in all, I had a blast. But before this becomes too much like those "What I Did on Summer Vacation" essays we wrote as kids — if it hasn't already — it's time to record the final out.

Damn, baseball's a great game.

'Doors' overcomes hype with deep insight, mood

ERIC MELIN
Collegian Reviewer

Director Oliver Stone has another remarkable film on his hands. His widely-anticipated and over-hyped new movie "The Doors," actually has an intoxicating effect on the viewer.

More a biography of lead singer Jim Morrison than anything else, the title refers not only to the name of the legendary band, but more importantly, Morrison's philosophy on life. He believed in testing the bounds of reality by altering the "doors of perception."

In 1966, when the Doors appeared on the Los Angeles scene, rock music was much more than entertainment. The world was changing. UCLA film students Morrison (Val Kilmer) and Ray Manzarek (Kyle MacLachlan) put a band together for the same initial reason most bands got together, to make millions.

But Morrison's lyrics were far from ordinary, reflecting his personal attitudes about society.

As they grew more comfortable with audiences, the Doors began to change. They turned into rock theater, being as much of a visual presentation as a musical one. It wasn't long before the group was signed, and after its 1967 debut album, the members became idols. However, Morrison was always the focus.

All along with Morrison was Pamela Courson (Meg Ryan), his girlfriend/companion. Morrison had countless other lovers, but Courson was the one he called his "soul mate."

The scenes with Ryan and Kilmer, unfortunately, don't click very well and seem out of place. There are so many other things going on in the movie that their relationship never develops fully.

The movie works best when it documents Morrison's maturity as a poet/songwriter. Morrison soon gets as disillusioned with his new position of authority as his fans are with the world. Art becomes blurred with life, and the two become impossible to separate with the help of his two favorite drugs, alcohol and LSD.

Reviewer says ...

'Intoxicating'

The most consistent thread in the movie is the implication that Morrison has the soul of an American Indian. It isn't closely examined, but at the beginning of the film, a young Morrison sitting in his family's car sees a car wreck and watches a mortally wounded Indian. Morrison always said the spirit of that Indian went into his body that day.

Still, the movie's strongest points are the structure and cinematography. The songs, along with Morrison's poetry, are used as narrative while the story progresses. There is hardly a minute onscreen without music. Stone also interprets Morrison's internal thoughts by expressing visually what might be going on in his mind.

Throughout the film, Stone's camera bobs wildly in all directions. This, combined with constant camera flashes and lighting effects, especially in party or concert scenes, makes the viewer feel the way Morrison felt his entire life.

Stone gives the audience a feel for peyote in the Mohave Desert with the band, and through the rest of the movie, maintains a kind of drunkenness.

The performance scenes are absolutely incredible. The best moments in the "The Doors" are with the band onstage. Kilmer has every Morrison move down perfectly. Compared to a live videotape of the real Doors, it's uncanny how real it looks.

Kilmer does many of the vocals, and Stone encouraged the actors to improvise within the songs, giving it an authentic live feel.

That helped recreate the spontaneity of the Doors' shows. Kilmer plays everything from playfulness to uncontrollable rage, traits all-too-common in a Doors concert. Stone manipulates the theater audience into a totally frozen silence twice, much like the band did to its crowd.

This is also the first film in recent memory to contain a mostly rock soundtrack. Robert Shaw and the Atlanta Symphony Orchestra does "Primo Vere" for one scene, but every other song is by the Doors or the Velvet Underground.

The songs set up different moods, and Stone uses them to complement the screen action. Many times, they serve as an emotional charge.

"The Doors" captures the late 1960s era and offers some insight into the life of Morrison without going too deep. Another whole movie could be made about Morrison and Courson. Yet, Stone has crafted the best rock picture ever made.

Seniors teaching to learn

Students in education work in classrooms before graduating

STACY HILBURN
Collegian Reporter

Students pursuing education degrees find themselves, during their senior year, staring out at a sea of unfamiliar young faces on the first day of class.

The day is the first day of student teaching — something all students majoring in education must experience before graduation.

This half-semester of student teaching, called the professional semester, is not only required, but education students said it also teaches lessons that could never be learned sitting in a college classroom.

Matt Hirsch, senior in secondary education, said the courses required for a degree in education prepare students for the technical things, but student teaching is an eye-opener.

"It shows you just what you will be getting into as a teacher," he said.

Pamela Holdsworth, senior in elementary education, said, "Nothing beats hands-on experience, but you have to have the background before you can practice it."

Before being admitted into the professional semester, students must complete 90 credit hours, pass a skills test comprised of reading, writing and math and complete an earlier field experience (teacher aide). They must also have an overall GPA of 2.5.

Students teach under cooperating teachers, who have volunteered to allow student teachers in their classrooms.

Alumnus enjoys Antarctica expedition

MEREDITH JONES
Collegian Reporter

K-State alumnus Chip Lagerbom has just returned from an expedition that took him to the bottom of the world — Antarctica.

Lagerbom was one of five men chosen to go to Antarctica for 95 days and study with the Quaternary Institute at the University of Maine. The expedition was funded by a National Science Foundation grant and headed by George Denton.

Lagerbom said he was chosen because he was at the right place at the right time.

The five men traveled to Antarctica in October and set up camp in the 1 percent of Antarctica not covered by snow or ice. The camp was located 80 miles from McMurdo Station.

The men set up two camps, and Lagerbom stayed in a camp with two people.

Lagerbom said one man at the other camp was injured about half way through the study and had to be sent back. The other man at that camp had to get back to start classes for the spring semester, leaving Lagerbom and two others to finish the study.

Lagerbom, a field assistant, said the group studied the glacial geology of the area and glacial history to help determine warming and cooling trends.

They would do up to 200 pushes to keep their sweat from freezing after digging for awhile, he said.

The group had to go through a survival school and wear dog tags, he said. He also said they had to call in every morning.

Lagerbom said they worked long days and didn't have to worry about daylight to work in; the sun was up 24 hours a day. He said the sun just circled in the sky, and it was always light.

"We didn't know we were putting in such long days," Lagerbom said of working 12- to 14-hour days. "We could have worked 24-hour days," he said.

Since he's been home, Lagerbom said his mom noticed him sleeping with his arm over his eyes, probably just habit.

Antarctic temperatures ranged from minus 30 degrees without the wind chill factor to the 20s for a couple of weeks at the peak of summer. "Not as bad as you think," Lagerbom said.

The men ate a lot of food, such as steak, lobster and chocolate, but they could only have fresh vegetables and fruit the day a Navy helicopter brought food to them every three weeks. The produce had to be eaten that day so it wouldn't freeze, Lagerbom said.

New Italian restaurant offers pleasing change

Avantis gives traditional gourmet a twist

REBECCA SACK
Collegian Reviewer

There is a new restaurant in Manhattan, and what a relief it is. Avanti's offers a choice selection of gourmet Italian food, a good variety of fine wines, appetizers called, "Spuntini" or "little bites" and gourmet pizzas.

Avanti's offers traditional Italian entrees and a Sunday buffet especially designed for students and families, but its forte however, is clearly the choice it offers to the distinguishing palate — gourmet fare.

Toasted walnuts and gorgonzola cheese make the house salad especially exciting. The homemade garlic croutons are a fine example of the freshness of everything. Even the herbs and spices are prepared from scratch.

Avanti's also offers a Caesar Salad, Chef Michael Gray's own version, and judging from the house salad, Gray's Caesar Salad creation should be a delight.

Avanti's gourmet pizza is not to be missed. It is a lovely appetizer, though you'll then have to forfeit the Spuntini selection.

The vegetarian pizza combines grilled eggplant, wild mushrooms, gorgonzola and fontina cheeses with a pesto sauce on a very thin crust. It is not an American pizza at all, and the flavors of each of the toppings, especially the wild mushrooms, are best without the burden of a thick crust and rampant tomato sauce.

Reviewer says ...

⊕ "What a relief"

Other appetizers on the Spuntini list include homemade Italian bread, grilled shrimp, calamari fritti, fried ravioli and much more.

Avanti's main courses include fish, shrimp, poultry, steak, veal, eggplant and spaghetti with meatballs. It is easy to speak generally of all the entrees after sampling only one or two because the quality evident in their preparation guarantees a great meal of any of the menu items.

The Chicken Vesuvio seems to be a popular choice — sautéed chicken breast with cream marinara, mushrooms, peas, parmesan and artichokes all served on angel-hair pasta. The delicate flavors are combined in a way enhancing all without any being disguised.

The Petto di Pollo is marinated, grilled boneless spring chicken with pearl onions, pancetta, mushrooms, artichokes, roasted red peppers and light chicken coulis, served on linguini. The flavor is exquisite. The linguini is cooked to perfection, tossed in herbs and olive oil — a perfect tenderness and taste.

Some of the other entrees, like the Grilled Salmon in cucumber dill sauce and the Sautéed Eggplant, are an interesting and welcome twist in the traditional Italian cuisine.

Avanti's is not a traditional Italian restaurant. It adds a gourmet extravagance and innovation to delight discriminating tastes.

There are new creations for dessert every day to entice your mouth, even though your stomach may be full. The cheesecake is light and rich at the same time, a phenomenon in itself, plus the sweet combination of strawberry and kiwi sauces. The strawberries in cream sauce were full of flavor and light sweetness for a dessert that is less filling.

Avanti's offers excellent service, and fresh, homemade, gourmet Italian food, a relief to anyone starving for distinctive tastes and food you can savor before swallowing.

Teach

Jeanne Fridell, cooperating teacher at Northview Elementary School, said by volunteering her classroom, she is just repaying the kindness someone else showed her when she needed to serve her student teaching term to get her degree.

Hirsch said although student teachers are expected to follow the cooperating teachers' general systems, the classroom is considered their own while they are there.

Michelle Brogden, senior in business education completing her student teaching, said the cooperating teachers are very willing to help.

"I'm allowed to make mistakes, but the teacher talks about it with me after class," she said.

The planning and paper work required to run a smooth classroom are time-consuming, Brogden said.

"I thought I would be sterile to it, but it's hard to write an 'F' on a test."

Dale Bushyhead, senior in elementary education, said teaching can be a challenge, but he enjoys it because he's not only learning about the students — he's learning about himself.

Bushyhead said the reason he chose elementary education as a career was because of the lack of male role models in elementary schools.

Bushyhead is part Cherokee Indian and said he felt his heritage also gives him the unique chance to expose young children to other cultures.

"If the students are going to have a multi-cultural world view, they need to start as a young person," he said.

Renee Pennypacker, senior in elementary education, said substitute teaching or being a teacher aide is not nearly as beneficial as student teaching.

"Unless you're student teaching, you're unprepared," she said. "It's hard to know the plans when you didn't prepare them. You're coming in cold, and that does not benefit the children."

Pennypacker and Fridell said student teachers should be required to serve an entire year.

"The student teachers need more time to see what does and does not work," Fridell said.

thawed in a pan of water, and the beer had to be stored by hanging the cans from the top of the tent, so they wouldn't freeze any more than they had.

Lagerbom said he was anxious to visit with friends after spending the 95 days with just two people.

"I wanted to go a bar and drink beer," he said.

When they arrived at McMurdo Station, the group was able to take a shower for the first time since the beginning of the 95-day expedition.

Lagerbom said McMurdo officials usually limit showers to two minutes because of rationed water, but because the men smelled so bad, they were allowed to take as long as they wanted.

"Antarctica kind of looked like the Rocky Mountains on top of the Grand Canyon," he said.

Lagerbom also said the diversity there is amazing. He said he saw sea ice and an active volcano.

He said he didn't see any wildlife but did see mummified seals, one of which dated back 3,000 years. They probably became disoriented, came inland and died.

Lagerbom said when he stopped to take pictures of penguins at McMurdo Station, he saw killer whales 10 feet away.

"They saw our shadows on the ice and stuck their heads up to check us out," he said.

On the way back to the United States, the team stopped at New Zealand and then went to Hawaii.

"We thawed out on the beaches of Honolulu and Waikiki," Lagerbom said.

"I'd go back," Lagerbom said. "I'd love to go back."

Lagerbom, who attended K-State from 1982-1986, earned his bachelor's degree in history before starting his graduate studies at the University of Maine.

The interpretation is considered unusual because the poetry focuses on violence and the readings do not focus on a specific author, she said.

"We will be focusing more around the content of the poems than just the poems," she said.

Henry said the interpretation will be more emotional than what people may expect.

"We're feeling the poetry," she said.

Graphic Art Theatre also plans to perform in the K-State Union in April and present "Welcome to the Club" May 4 in the Purple Masque Theatre.

Yugoslavians wait for possible military intervention in Serbia

By the Associated Press

BELGRADE, Yugoslavia — Yugoslavia waited Sunday for a sign as to whether the military would intervene to help Serbia's hard-line Communist leadership hold the troubled nation together by force.

The army, seeking to quash reports the military was divided over whether to support Serbian President Slobodan Milosevic, said Sunday it was completely united. Reports, however, indicated the armed forces remained divided on whether to back Milosevic.

There were indications military officials were meeting, but no further statements were issued. There were no signs of increased military activity.

Also Sunday, the main opposition Serbian Renewal Movement renewed its call for the resignation of Milosevic's Socialist government, the renamed Serbian Communists.

The opposition party has been backing daily protests by tens of thousands of anti-Communist demonstrators in the last week. It blames the government for violence at a rally March 9 that left two people dead and 120 injured when police and protesters clashed.

The country was pushed to the brink of a military crackdown after Serbia, the country's largest republic, announced Saturday that it no longer recognized federal authority because Yugoslavia's executive branch — the federal presidency — refused to impose a nationwide state of emergency.

Milosevic made the declaration in an apparent attempt to induce the army to back his efforts to hold Yugoslavia together with a strong Communist government in Belgrade.

The republics of Slovenia and Croatia want the nation dissolved into a loose confederation of sovereign states, and have threatened secession if they don't get it.

The presidency theoretically commands the military, but the army is dominated by Serbian officers and is generally sympathetic to Milosevic.

But there is dissent in Croatia also. Saturday, leaders of ethnic Serbs living in the Krajina region announced their secession from Croatia and mobilized their own reservists.

"We will not allow any secession of the so-called Krajina region from Croatia," the republic's president, Franjo Tudjman, responded.

If Milosevic succeeds, the presidency would be unable to draw a quorum and would be completely paralyzed — a pretext for the military to take control of the nation.
